"I see you understand me," he said in a low, gentle voice. "I know all about poor Donald's trouble, no matter how. A few words that I heard this evening as I sat in the garden by the open window made me aware that he was anxious for your assistance, in getting the truth kept from your father. Now—"

"Did you sit and listen, Archie, to words that were not meant for your ears?" she spoke haughtily and he colored under the steady light in her eyes.

"I only heard a few sentences. But I knew all about Donald's goings on, from another friend, Jeanie. Donald must be saved. Let me help him."

"Oh, Archie, if you would," she exclaimed earnestly.

"I shall be only too glad Jeanie; but it must be through you. He must never know that I have heard anything of the matter. I must say what will pain you, dear Jeanie, just to show you how careful we must be to save Donald from himself. He has threatened to take away his own life, if his folly becomes public." She shivered and hid her face in her hands.

"Don't break my heart, dear one," he whispered. "Your suffering is mine also. But be brave and be silent, too. I will give you all the money he needs to free him from danger this time, and perhaps he will be wiser in future. You need not tell him where you got the money, you understand, Jeanie. I think he would resent my knowledge of his folly more than all. Indeed I knew something of his recklessness, when he spent last Christmas season with us in Glasgow."

"I wish you had told me sooner."

"I could not bear to give you pain, darling, till I could not avoid it. You will accept this money for poor Donald, won't you?"

"Oh, I don't know what to do! Do you know that he says he must have one hundred pounds before Monday night? Think of it!" Her misery was pitiful to see. But it gave him all the more scope for tenderness.

"Oh, that is a small sum in the gambling world, Jeanie, I am glad it is no greater. Dry up your tears, darling. I will run up to Glasgow tomorrow morning, get the money in cash, and it shall be yours to do what you wish with in the evening. Only once more, remember Donald must not know where you get the money."

"Oh, I don't think I should take it from you. It might be long years before I could repay it."

"Will you not accept it as a gift, Jeanie?"

"Certainly not Archie. And after all, I think I will speak to mother. She could give me all he wants, and dear father may be saved the pain of knowing anything about it."

"Do you want to kill your mother?"

"I would save her, if I could."

"You can save her."

"Tomorrow night, Archie, I will tell you whether I will accept your offer or not. I do not seem able to think now. My brain is on fire."

Topics of the Time

About the first of June, according to Director of the Census Durand, the first announcement regarding the results of the census taking will be made. No announcement of the population of the entire United States will be made before August or September. Chicago's population figures, as sent in by the census supervisors, soon will be put into the hands of tabulators, but Mr. Durand will not give out any figures until a complete list of the cities of more than 100,000 population is ready for publication. He said that this course is necessary because of jealousies that have arisen over premature publication of figures. The tabulating machines are being put in order and the machinery will be set in motion as soon as the detail work necessary to this process is completed. The machines are far more perfect than ten years ago and it is expected that the returns will come out more promptly. Each of the tabulating machines will complete about 27,000 names a day.

The National Farm Homes Association held a convention in St. Louis last week. Organized farmers and organized labor will work together hereafter in "preserving the rights and liberties of both classes of workers," under the provisions of a resolution unanimously adopted by the executive committee of the Farmers' Educational and Co-operative Union. The affiliation between the American Federation of Labor and the Farmers' Union has been a favorite project of Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and the adoption of the resolution followed a four-day conference between Mr. Gompers, assisted by several labor leaders, and the farmers' committee. The association proposes to capitalize for $1,000,000 and to provide 640 model farms for worthy applicants, the farms to be conducted under the supervision of skilled agriculturists. The resolutions adopted include demands for postal savings banks, provided the deposits be not centralized; for a parcels post, for restriction of foreign immigration by a head tax on each immigrant, for abolition by congressional enactment of dealing in futures, for restriction of the "white slave" traffic, and for an increased appropriation for the Agricultural Department.

Accurate reports from practical men in fifteen counties in western Michigan show that the fruit crop will be normal and in some cases better than the average despite the recent frosts. In no case was there a discouraging note heard, and the result of a roll call of counties has greatly pleased growers and shippers of the whole section. Earlier reports as to the damage to cherries are modified by later and more reliable returns, and the most that can be said of the damage is that in some limited districts it may reach 10 per cent. Some growers say that a little more frost would have aided in thinning out the blooms and would have been more satisfactory in some respects.

get Christianity pure and simple." His fearless and manly sifting has brought him to this further declaration: "It is not long ago the Apocalypse and the Fourth gospel were regarded as the opposite extremes of early Christianity, representative of modes of thought and feeling so remote and antagonistic as to be virtually exclusive of each other; but a deeper study has brought them in some respects into closer mutual relations than any books of the New Testament—in both is the same absolute distinction between that which is Christian and that which is not."

To these words Prof. Denney adds: "There is a sense in which the Apocalypse might be called the most Christian book of the New Testament." Again, speaking of the seven letters to the seven churches, he says: "Here we are in contact with the living soul of Christianity."

The deepest prayer of my heart to God for my people is that they make good the purpose of their beginning and turn away from Protestant as well as from Roman and from heathen errors, and behold the unveiled face of "the glory of God in Jesus Christ" for "where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty," and the testimony of Jesus is the Spirit of prophecy in his own self revelation.

The Foolish Little Maiden and Her Foolish Little Bonnet

H. Hammond.

A foolish little maiden bought a foolish little bonnet
With a ribbon, and a feather, and a bit of lace upon it,
And that other maidens of the little town might know it,
She thought she'd go to meeting the next day just to show it.

But though the little bonnet was scarce larger than a dime,
The getting of it settled proved to be a work of time;
So when 'twas fairly tied, all the bells had stopped their ringing,
And when she came to meeting, sure enough the folks were singing.

So the foolish little maiden stood and waited at the door;
And she shook her ruffles out behind and smoothed them down before.
"Hallelujah! hallelujah!" sang the chorus above her head,—
"Hardly knew you! hardly knew you!" were the words she thought they said.

This made the little maiden seem so very, very cross,
That she gave her little mouth a twist, her head a little toss;
For she thought the hymn they sang was all about her bonnet,
With the ribbon, and the feathers, and the bit of lace upon it.

And she would not wait to listen to the sermon or the prayer,
But pattered down the silent street and hurried up the stair,
Till she reached her little bureau, and in a hand-box on it
Had hidden, safe from critic's eye, her foolish little bonnet.

Which proves my little maidens, that each of you will find
In every Sabbath service but an echo of your mind;
And that the little head that's filled with silly little airs
Will never get a blessing from sermon or from prayers. —Selected.

The Rescue of Daniel

A True Story for the Children.

BY AUNT HATTIE.

It happened this way. Tommy was on his wheel one evening, delivering milk, and he had to pass rows and rows of orange trees, for he lived on an orange orchard in Southern California.

All at once he heard a noise from under one of those orange trees. He stopped his wheel to listen. It sounded like a little chickie. So he got off his wheel, set down his milk can, and tried to find the noise.

Finally, he saw under the tree, a wee yellow puff ball, peeping loudly, calling for help. Tommy had a hard time to catch it, for it thought he was that old coyote that had caught its mother and brothers the night before while they slept under the tree. It did not know that its mother biddie had done a very foolish and fatal thing when she led her little brood away from the hen house, out into the orchard where Mr. Coyote could find them.

At last Tommy caught the poor little frightened, trembling thing. It cuddled down between his warm, soft hands and grew quiet and happy.

"Poor little thing!" said Tommy. "You've been wandering around here all day alone. Mother and brothers went down Mr. Coyote's throat last night, I suppose. I won't leave you out here all night in the cold and the dark. You come home with me. But how'll you go? You can't get into the can with the milk. Yes! I have it! Here you go!"

And Tommy tucked chickie into his coat pocket, where, warm and cozy, it rode around while he delivered the milk.

"Well!" said big brother Bob, "Quite a smart looking little chap after all'he's gone through! Let's name him Daniel, for if not rescued from a den of lions, he's been rescued from a coyote's mouth. But what shall we do with him?"

"Put him under Greyfeather tonight. She'll think he is one of her own little chickies," said Tommy's mother, who had come to look on.

So, warm and happy, he slept in under Greyfeather that night and forgot all about Mr. Coyote, and Greyfeather and her brood adopted him without any questions.

But somehow he did not grow so fast as the rest of Greyfeather's family. Perhaps his night of exposure and fright had weakened him. He could not keep up with the others in their bug hunting expeditions. So Tommy's mother brought him into the house and kept him, for several days, in the sunny, enclosed back porch, and at night put him again in under Greyfeather.

But one day a terrible thing happened to Daniel. A piece of sticky fly paper that had been pinned to the porch wall, fell down, and of course Daniel walked right into it. The more he tried to get out, the deeper in he went. Nobody knew how long he had been there, for when found he had fallen over, glued fast to the paper, unable to struggle or scarce make a noise. It was a terrible job to loosen him. He had to be carefully cut away from his own feathers. He was a forlorn sight. It did not seem as though he could live, even. But Tom and Bob said they would do all they could for the little fellow twice rescued from horrible death. But in a few days he appeared lively again, and went back into Greyfeather's family. They all treated him kindly, though often the other little chickies would look at him as much as to say, "What's the matter with you? You don't look like the rest of us!"

But after a time, Mother Greyfeather decided that her children were old enough to take care of themselves, and she left them. They did not seem to care and went on scratching for their own living. All but Daniel—he did not like to do his own scratching, and peeped around, all day, lonesome and forlorn. At night, the others soon learned to fly up onto the rounds of the chicken house, where they were locked in at night. But Dannie would crawl into some little corner, and wait for Bob or Tom to find him and lift him up with the other chickens.

One night Dannie was missing. The boys could not find him anywhere.

"Too bad!" exclaimed Tommy, "that after all this, poor little Dannie has ditched. 'Spect that old hawk caught him this morning!"

Suddenly they heard a little noise that sounded like Dannie. And where do you suppose they found him? Old Turkey Gobbler roosted off by himself in one corner of the hen house, and there through his big feathers, little Dannie's head was peeping, making little contented noises, as if to say, "I'm all right!"

It was such a funny sight that mother had to come out from the house to see.

The next morning old Grandpa Gobbler went scratching about the yard, little Dannie following close by, picking up. The two became inseparable companions, and when visitors came to the house they had to go out to see the two friends.

But the funny thing about it was that Dannie turned out to be a hen, and later on, every other day she had to leave the old Grandpa Gobbler, for a few moments, while she went to her nest and laid a pretty white egg, which everybody thought she meant for Tommy's school lunch.

There was still another funnier thing than all, and that was to see Daniel, a couple of months later, leading about her own brood of fluffy yellow puff balls, while old Grandpa Gobbler kept solemnly by their side, all day long, as proud and happy as Mother Daniel herself.

A Springtime Wish

Isabel Ecclestone MacKay.

O, to be a robin
In the spring!
When the fleeting days of April
Are a-wing,
And the air is sweet with knowing
Where the hidden buds are growing
And the merry winds are going Wandering!

O, to be a robin
With a nest
Built upon the budding branches—
East or west!
Just to swing and sway and dangle
Far from earth and all its tangle,
Joining in the gay bird jangle
With a zest!

O, to be a robin—
Just to sing!
Not to have the pain of hating
Anything—
Just to race the foremost swallow
Over hill and over hollow—
And the joy of life to follow
Through the spring!

—St. Nicholas.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, MAY 22.

Theme for the Day.—Life's Origin and Destiny.

Scripture.—I will give thanks unto thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made: wonderful are thy works, and that my soul knoweth right well. . . . How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God! How great is the sum of them! If I should count them they are more in number than the sand; when I awake, I am still with thee.—Psa. 139:14, 17, 18.

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting;
The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar;
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory do we come
From God who is our home.
—Wordsworth ("Ode on Immortality.")

Prayer.—Holy Father, on this the day of Thine own choosing, we pause from our accustomed work, and with thankfulness we lift our hearts to Thee. From Thy hand have we come. Thou knowest all our ways and art acquainted with our secret thoughts. Thou hast made us in Thine own image and for Thine own companionship. With such a beginning, help us to be satisfied with nothing less than the destiny Thou hast planned for us. May the rest and the worship of this day inspire in us nobler purposes, and may we prove worthy of Thy love for us, made known in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

MONDAY, MAY 23.

Theme for the Day.—Paul in Arabia.

Scripture.—Neither went I up to Jerusalem to them that were apostles before me: but I went away into Arabia; and again I returned unto Damascus.—Gal. 1:17.

How have I seen in Araby Orion,
Seen without seeing, till he set again,
Known the night-noise and thunder of the lion,
Silence and sounds of the prodigious plain!

How have I knelt with arms of my aspiring Lifted all night in irresponsive air,
Dazed and amazed with overmuch desiring,
Blank with the utter agony of prayer!
—Frederick W. H. Myers ("Saint Paul.")

Prayer.—Father of Spirits, we come to Thee in every time of need. But not less in hours of courage and noble purpose we need Thee, and crave Thy presence. Thou hast called each one of us to a holy work. May we not despise Thy word, but yield our lives without reluctance to Thy purposes. If like Paul of old, we need discipline and hardship as a preparation for our work, then give us grace to enter Thy school of silence, prayer and sacrifice, that we may be ready in due season for our labors, and give us the joy which was also Paul's in the work we do. For Thy name's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY, MAY 24.

Theme for the Day.—The Coming of Summer.

Scripture.—And he spake to them a parable: Behold the fig tree, and all the trees; when they now shoot forth, ye see it and know of your own selves that the summer is now nigh.—Luke 21:29, 30.

All the land in flowery squares,
Beneath a broad and equal blowing wind,
Smelt of the coming summer, as one large cloud
Drew downward; but all else of heaven was pure
Up to the sun, and May from verge to verge,
And May with me from head to heel.
—Tennyson ("The Gardener's Daughter.")

Prayer.—O Thou, who art the Creator and the Benefactor, we grow happy at the thought of Thy wonderful work in nature. All the seasons of the year speak of Thee, but especially the summer, with its gifts of fruit and flowers. We would behold Thee in the beauties of Thy creation. We would lift our souls in gratitude for the mercy that spreads the earth with verdure and hangs the curtains of the clouds along the heavens. We would share with Thee the wonder of Thy works, and in the needs of men about us we have our divine chance of partnership with Thee. For this we thank Thee. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25.

Theme for the Day.—John in Patmos.

Scripture.—I John, your brother and partaker with you in the tribulation and kingdom and patience which are in Jesus, was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus.—Rev. 1:9.

Afterward came the message to myself
In Patmos isle; I was not bidden teach,
But simply listen, take a book and write,
Nor set down other than the given word,
With nothing left to my arbitrament
To choose or change: I wrote, and men believed.
—Browning ("A death in the Desert.")

Prayer.—Our Father in heaven, we praise Thee for the holy voices through which Thou hast spoken to our world. Prophets and apostles Thou hast given us, that we might hear and know Thy will. In much travail of soul and through bitter sufferings Thy servants have borne witness to the truth. They have marked with their blood the spots that now the church holds sacred. Aid us in making our own lives witnesses for the truth, and may we not hesitate even at the afflictions which come as the price of that high service. Pardon us for Christ's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY, MAY 26.

Theme for the Day.—The Orient for Christ.

Scripture.—And I will make all my mountains a way; my highways shall be exalted. Lo, these shall come from far; and lo, these from the north and the west; and these from the land of Sinim.—Isa. 49:11, 12.

Saviour, lo, the isles are waiting;
Stretched the hand, and strained the sight,
For Thy Spirit, new creating,
Love's pure flame and wisdom's light,
Give the word, and of the preacher,
Speed the foot and touch the tongue,
Till on earth by every creature
Glory to the Lamb be sung.
—Arthur C. Coxe ("Summons.")

Prayer.—Our Father, the nations have waited long for the coming of the light. The command of our Lord has been too much forgotten by the church throughout the years. But now at last Thy people are aroused to some fair sense of the great obligation. We would have a just share in the redemption of the world. Give us a part, we pray Thee, in so wonderful a work. May our hearts respond to the call, may our offerings be given freely to the cause, and may we see China and all the Orient awakened, even as the prophet hoped, to the glory of God's divine purpose. Amen.

FRIDAY, MAY 27.

Theme for the Day.—By the Waters of Babylon.

Scripture.—By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Sion. Upon the willows in the midst thereof we hanged up our harps.—Psa. 137:1, 2.

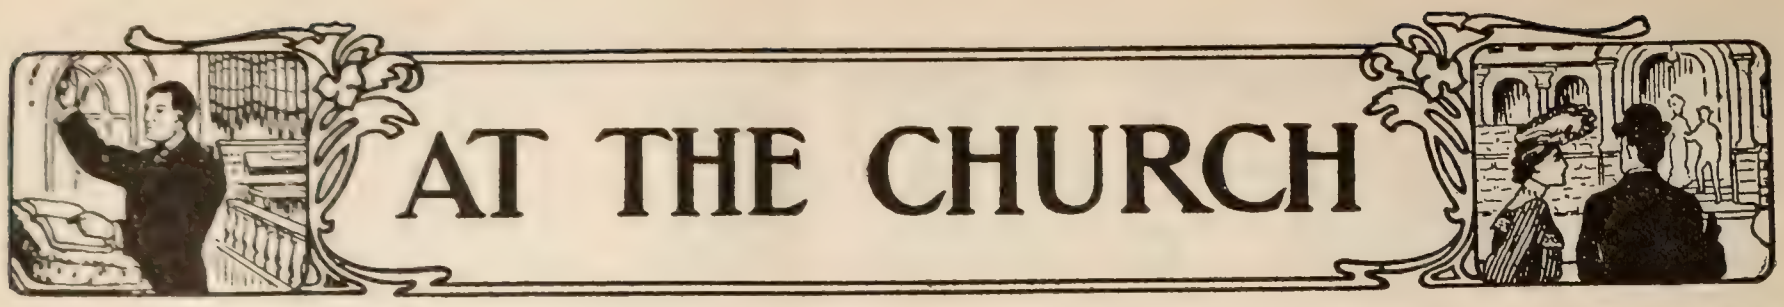
Beside the streams of Babylon, in tears
Of vain desire, we sat; remembering thee,
O hallow's Zion! and the vanish"d years,
When Israel's chosen sons were blest and free;
Our harps, neglected and untuned, we hung
Mute on the willows of the stranger's land . . .
If I forget, midst grief and wasting toil,
Thee, O Jerusalem! my native soil!
My right hand forget its cunning, too!
—Mrs. Hemans ("Sonnet.")

Prayer.—O God our Father, even as Israel sat in deep dejection by the streams of a heathen land, so have Thy people too often sat in deep distress at the overthrow of good. But may we learn that God arises and his enemies are scattered. Arm us with fresh courage as we see all that Thou hast done, and that we with Thee may do. And may the sorrows of Thy people in the past only assure us that the night is far spent, and the day of the world's salvation is at hand. Amen.

SATURDAY, MAY 28.

Theme for the Day.—Pitchers and Lamps.

Scripture.—And the three companies blew the trumpets, and brake the pitchers and held the torches in their left hands, and the trumpets in their right hands wherewith to blow; and they cried, The sword of Jehovah and of Gideon.—Judges 7:20.



Who ordered Gideon forth,
To storm the invader's camp,
With arms of little worth,
A pitcher and a lamp?
The trumpets made his coming known,
And all the host was overthrown.
—Cowper ("Jehovah Nissi, The Lord my Banner.")

Prayer.—Father, Thou hast given us the assurance that they that are for us are more than they that are against us. We comfort our hearts with the story of Thy mighty dealings with Thy people in days gone by. Thou didst save them, not by weapons of war, but by Thy protecting hand. Even so today, O Lord, open for us the gates of salvation, and show us the path in which Thou shalt go. We bring another week to its end with deep thankfulness. All the way Thou leadest us. Leave us not till the evening comes, and we reach our home. And we shall praise Thee evermore. Amen.

God's Love

God's boundless love and arching sky,
Above us when we wake or sleep,
Above us when we smile or weep,
Above us when we live or die.

God's patient love! Misunderstood
By hearts that suffer in the night,
Doubted—yet waiting till heaven's light
Shall show how all things work for good.
—Maltbie D. Babcock.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Feeder of the Nations*

The story of the feeding of the thousands - the one miracle narrative in the New Testament which is found in all four of the Gospels. This is not due to the fact that it is more authentic than other similar accounts. In fact the difficulties connected with this recital are greater than in almost any other instance of the work of Christ. Rather it is because of the significance of the act of feeding the people as illustrative of the greater work of Christ in providing the Bread of Life for the hungry world, that it has taken so marked a place in the list of Jesus' works of power.

The Difficulties Involved.

It belongs to those nature miracles which are the least easy of explanation in the New Testament. It is not so much the seeming conflict with natural law which makes the incidents of the changing of water into wine, the withering of the fig tree, the stater in the mouth of the fish, and the feeding of the crowds on the hillsides difficult of comprehension to a generation trained in the study of the events of nature. It is much more the abrupt departure of Jesus from the methods of orderly and regular supply of the needs of human life under the blessing of the Father, for which his whole ministry so conspicuously stands. It was no part of our Saviour's program to lead men into the expectation that their ordinary necessities would be supplied by miraculous means. Rather did he seek everywhere to commit them to the simple and honest laws of labor and of thrift, that thus their wants might be relieved. Yet our Savior may have regarded such acts of kindness as that of feeding the people no departure from his customary plan, but only an expression of his own good will, precisely as in the instances of healing.

The Four Thousand.

There is another difficulty connected with these records of a sudden supply of food for a large company of people. In both the first and second Gospels there appears the narrative of another similar occurrence when four thousand of the people were fed with seven loaves and a few fishes. The probability that the two events were one has been suggested by many of the commentaries. It seems difficult to account in the second instance for the total surprise of the disciples that Jesus should undertake to feed the people, if the equally impressive miracle of the five thousand had already taken place so short a time before. Nor does the fact that in the conversation with the Pharisees a little later Jesus refers to both instances as separate events greatly relieve the situation (Matt. 16:9, 10). The writer of the Gospel was no doubt familiar with the already-formed tradition of the two separate miracles, and it would be likely that the argument of Jesus against the misunderstanding of the disciples should be strengthened by such a reference.

But our concern is less with the manner of these events than their meaning. It is quite clear that whatever may have been the basis of the two narratives regarding a miraculous feeding of a great crowd of people, something happened which served as a great object lesson for the truth that Jesus was the Feeder of men, and that Bethlehem was well called "the House of Bread" because out of it there came One who was to be the feeder of the nations. In the fourth Gospel the miracles of Jesus are almost invariably connected with some important teachings which they illustrate and enforce. The sermon of the Lord on the Bread of Life which he delivered in Capernaum on the following day, was suggested and made impressive by his kindness to the people across the lake.

Across the Sea.

The periods of rest and retirement which Jesus permitted himself were becoming more frequent. They not only gave him opportunity for recuperation from the hard tasks of his ministry, but they afforded him relief from the constantly harrassing nature of scribal watchfulness and hostility, and they permitted him to enjoy the companionship and to engage in the instruction of the disciples whose preparation for the future was now his chief task.

But one who was so much in the public thought as Jesus could not easily escape the crowds of people who thronged from all the district to hear his words and behold his work. When he departed in a boat for the northeastern shore of the Sea of Galilee the news rapidly spread among the people, and they took up their journey around the end of the lake to reach the place toward which he had gone. They soon came crowding upon him in great numbers, totally preventing the rest and privacy which he had desired.

Works of Mercy.

But with sympathetic patience he looked upon them and knew that they had followed him not from curiosity but from a genuine sense of the need of such a friend as he had proved himself to be. They were like sheep without a shepherd. Their condition touched his heart with pity, and all through the day he continued to talk with them and to heal those of their number who were afflicted, and who could be really helped by his efforts. Perhaps in such a crowd as this, where the influence of faith was very great, Jesus felt himself justified in healing men who at other times and in the atmosphere of mere cold curiosity, he would have hesitated to cure, lest more harm than good should be wrought by such act. But in several instances it would seem as if the evangelists recognized the heightened sense of faith produced by the presence of a great company of convinced and rejoicing people. In that atmosphere almost anything could be done, and Jesus did not hesitate to put forth his power.

The People Fed.

But as night came on and he recognized the hardships to which many of those who had come long distances would be exposed if they were compelled to return all the way home fasting, Jesus suggested to his disciples that they provide for the multitude. Naturally this intimation filled them with dismay. If the crowd was as great as reports later affirmed, they were quite incapable of furnishing such a store of food. Their supply was very limited. A few loaves and fishes at the most was all they had. But in some manner, which the evangelists did not recount, Jesus satisfied the people so that not only did they eat, but they even had food remaining. None of the suggestions of those who have attempted to explain this event have gone very far to satisfy the minds of inquirers. All the way from a flat denial of the narrative to explicit insistence upon its every detail the thought of Christian scholars has ranged. But we may be confident that some provision was made by Jesus and the disciples which so astonished the people that ever after the incident was held in remembrance, and served as the illustration of Jesus' deeper work as the feeder of mankind.

The Larger Lesson.

This is after all the great lesson both of this and the other narrative which recounts the feeding of the four thousand. In each case the human need is emphasized. In each case the compassion of Jesus is recorded. More than this, the orderly method by which the task of supplying food to so many is undertaken leads appropriately to the personal work of the Master and the disciples in coming into close contact with those whom they desired to help.

These are the features of all Christian effort which are most impressive and convincing. In every place human need is pressing and there is but One who can help. The sympathy of the Master has expressed itself in every form of helpful ministry throughout the centuries. Some simple method, whether that of evangelism, teaching, physical uplift or institutional work is essential, that the purposes of the Lord may be realized. And just as important is the personal touch if men are really to be helped. After all the work which organizations and committees can do there is a somewhat which every individual must undertake for himself. Men want food and clothing, but they want friendship and sympathy far more, and these cannot be conveyed by any delegated means.

The Feeder of Men.

And so evermore Jesus remains the feeder of men. Their bodies he cares for because they are the instruments through which the lives of men become effective; but it is the whole man for which our Master cared. Every element of his nature must be fed in order that it may perform its suitable work. And so he stands today as then upon the hillsides of the world, looks with compassion upon the wandering and unshepherded, bids them sit down in companies so they can be reached, gives the Bread of Life to his disciples, and bids them freely hand it forth until all have received and are satisfied.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic May 29: Is Ours a Christian Nation? Psa. 33:8-22.

Whether or not we shall decide that this is a Christian nation depends upon our point of view. If we take our stand outside of the nation and view its religion, as one in no wise connected with it, very much as we are able to stand here and view the religion of Turkey or India, we will invariably conclude that it is a Christian nation. That is to say the Christian religion is the vastly predominating religion in this country.

Of course, we have no official religion such as England has in the Anglican Church, or such as Germany has in the Lutheran Church, or such as Italy has in the Roman Catholic Church. In our country there is a strict separation between church and state. Because of this fact our critics have sometimes called us a Godless nation. This is wide of the mark. We are a God-fearing people. The separation of church and state, was the way our fathers took to vouchsafe to every man the freedom of conscience in matters of religion, just as they were seeking freedom in things commercial and political. The government's attitude is not hostile but kind to religion as is evidenced by the exemption from taxes of church property. The government could not select any one sect as the church and support it out of the public funds without making some of the taxpayers support it against their wills and their consciences. To support all sects was, of course, out of the question. The only course left seems to be the one which was followed, viz., support none, but grant a welcome and freedom to all. Not a Godless nation, then, but a God-fearing nation, extending a welcome and assuring freedom of conscience to all.

The point of significance in our lesson becomes apparent when we take our stand within the nation. The nation after all is made up of individual citizens. We are all painfully aware of how many thousands of individuals of this land whose lives have practically no restraint in the ideals of life which Jesus has set before us. Their feverish desire for gain, their unbridled lust, and their outrages upon law and justice, are commonplaces in our observation. The unspeakable suffering which these fiends impose upon others for the gratification of their own selfish ends, is beheld when we see the pathetic condition of the vicious and dissipated in their evil resorts and the poverty of the tenement dwellers in our industrial centers. It is not to be wondered at that, when we behold such sights—made possible for the most part by those who have had the advantage of culture and the Christian ideals—we ask, Is this a Christian nation?

But we must not forget that we, born in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, threw off the yoke of the foreign oppressor, freed four millions of black slaves, helped a neighboring people throw off the oppression of an antiquated government, opened the ports of Japan to western civilization, enabled China to maintain her national integrity, returned to her the indemnity above what the Boxer uprising had actually cost us, and through the agency of the inimitable Roosevelt ended the Russian-Japanese war. It is not too much to say that we are a Christian nation, but like some individuals who are Christians, we are not as good Christians as we could be and ought to be. So long as there are saloons and breweries, sweat shops and filthy tenements, unsanitary factories low wages and long hours, bribe-givers and takers, incompetent and unworthy officials, immoral and vicious individuals, there is imperative need for vast improvement. We are a Christian nation but not full grown.

Business System in Missionary Finance

John R. Pepper, Chairman of the Laymen's Missionary Movement in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, of Memphis, Tenn.

Calling upon the Protestant churches of America to make a personal canvass of their 20,000,000 members in the cause of foreign missions, John R. Pepper, a banker of Memphis, Tenn., in talking on business system in missionary finance, made a number of practical suggestions. He said:

"Only one out of every four women, and only one out of every eight men of the average church have given any amount to foreign missions. When this fact is known, no argument is necessary to show the crying need for business system in missionary finance.

"The spasmodic, one-a-week appeal for foreign missions has not aroused the interest of the men of the church. Business system is needed.

Short, Sharp, Canvass Best.

"Several things are needed to put the foreign missionary offerings on a systematic basis. Every member of the church should make a weekly offering for this purpose. A uniform envelope should be used. An every-member canvass in the cause of all foreign missions should be made by the churches. This campaign is absolutely essential to reach the entire membership. A short, sharp canvass has been found to yield the best results. In some cases it has been found best to have men canvass the men and boys, and women canvass the women and girls, securing definite pledges for the year.

"One of the very first results achieved is the salutary impression made upon the membership of the church that business system is being used in the work instead of the former haphazard, intermittent, go-as-you-please lack of method.

Terrible Waste of Old System.

"A most important result of the weekly offering is found in the timely aid rendered the mission board treasurers and in many cases preventing retrenchments. It is an open secret that during the last few years some of the mission boards of strong denominations have had to pay interest on over-checks in banks in such amounts as would have supported from two to ten missions on the foreign field. This was because of the lax methods of many churches in depending upon a public presentation of missions once or twice a year, usually near the close of the year.

"The result of the weekly offering is that a weekly or certainly a good monthly remittance can be made to the general treasurer, thus preventing the actual waste in the over-check interest, a thing that should bring the blush of shame to every Christian business man.

System Sets Pastor Free.

"Business system sets the preacher free. Heretofore every time he preached a missionary sermon he had to take up a collection. This embarrassed him. The appeal lost much of its strength by carrying a sense of suspense until the collection was over. The more mercenary minds were of the opinion that the whole service was planned for the direct purpose of extorting a few dimes from unwilling hands. Now the preacher can preach on foreign missions as often as his heart prompts him without a word about a collection. The message strikes home on many a flinty heart because nothing is said about money.

Any business system that will insure the success of a legitimate secular calling is the most valid reason for introducing it into God's business."

What the Laymen Can Do for Missions

D. Clay Lily, D. D., Southern Presbyterian Church, Richmond, Va.

"The time has come for a new order of princes and principalities. The prince will be the successful Christian business man of America. His principality will be a great district of the heathen world.

"It will have a million or more people in it, but they are untaught and needy, like a multitude of little children. He will be to them as a father. He will send his missionaries to them and teach them how to heal diseases, how to protect life and how to keep off the famine and the plague. He will found for them a system of education and lead them to the waters of intellectual life. He will teach them about God; about God, their Father, who loves them, and they shall find eternal life. He shall be the prince and the father of that country.

Imperial Opportunities are Open.

"Such imperial opportunities are open to the men of the church today. A man's life is his opportunity for service. The most important service to the kingdom of God is to extend it throughout the world. The largest potential factor in this work is the men of the church. They are as yet a largely undeveloped resource. To enlist them in the missionary enterprise is to make a success in the whole world and also to make men a success in the church.

"The men must acquaint themselves with missionary principles and missionary facts. No business can be run successfully by men who are ignorant of its vital facts. They must begin to plan on a large scale. They must study larger maps. World-wide evangelization is the only policy big enough for the church or Christ. The men of the church must finance the missionary enterprise. Those who are interested must give liberally, but more important, they must see that a proper balance is preserved between the gifts to the work at home and the work abroad.

Ninety-five Per Cent Spent at Home.

"So long as the church spends ninety-five per cent of our gifts on the work in America and only five per cent in the heathen world, work of missions cannot be successfully prosecuted.

"The men of the church must offer themselves in greater numbers as missionaries. If the heathen world is to be won for Christ it must be done by men.

"The greatest service, however, which the united laymen can render is the one of prayer. When the men of America begin to pray in the right way for the evangelization of the world they will arise in their might and send the gospel to every creature."

The Mathematics of the Program

By Secretary J. Campbell White.

"In addition to all the Christian work that needs to be done among ninety millions of people in this country, the churches of America have about six hundred millions of people dependent upon them in the non-Christian world," said Mr. White. "This is not a guess, but the result of careful investigation. How shall we discharge our share of religious responsibility for mankind? This is the question being asked this winter in seventy-five leading cities of the United States.

"During the past ten years our country has come into a new consciousness of world relationships and consequent world- responsibilities. What these responsibilities are depend largely upon our resources and our opportunities. From either of these viewpoints it is clear that this nation has the primary place among all the nations of the earth as an evangelizing and Christianizing force.

"Canada has set the inspiring example of a whole nation, defining and undertaking to discharge her missionary responsibility. After conventions had been held in all parts of the dominion to consider the matter, a national missionary congress was held in Toronto last spring, attended by over 4,000 men. They accepted 40,000,000 as their share of people to be reached in the non-Christian world—a number equal to over six times the population of Canada itself.

"Unprecedented and phenomenal advances are being made by churches in all parts of Canada, in the carrying out of this large policy of evangelization, which involves the quadrupling of their missionaries and missionary contributions.

America's Burden.

"Will America likewise undertake her full share of this world task? We also have more than six times as many people to evangelize in non-Christian lands as constitute our entire population at home.

"The two things needed are intelligence and business method. The city of Toronto has increased its missionary offerings from $170,000 to $365,000 within a little more than a year, by the laymen of all churches taking hold as advocates and organizers. The Southern Presbyterian Church has increased its missionary offerings in three years from $223,000 to $412,000 per year.

"To reach six hundred millions by the churches of North America would require a total of only 24,000 missionaries, which is one missionary for 25,000 persons. At the present moment we have 7,476 missionaries from the United States and Canada, of whom 2,270 are wives of missionaries. Twenty-four thousand missionaries from North America would be less than one out of 800 of our Protestant church members.

"The cost of supporting this force of workers would not average over $2,000 per missionary, or a total of $48,000,000 a year. It should be understood that this $2,000 covers not only the salary of the missionary but the support of an average of about eight to ten native workers, the complete equipment of the work abroad and the administration expense at home.

Less Than Car Fare.

"Forty-eight million dollars from twenty millions of church members would be less than a street car fare a week on the average, from each of them. The total is less than twenty per cent of the amount now spent annually for religious and benevolent work by the Protestant churches of the United States.

"If we need to spend $300,000,000 a year for religious purposes in the United States and Canada among a population of less than the one hundred millions, is it reasonable to suppose that we can conduct an adequate Christian propaganda among six hundred millions abroad on less than twelve millions a year? This is less than two million dollars a year to reach one hundred millions of people abroad, against three hundred millions of dollars on a constituency of this size, at home, or a proportion of 150 to 1.

"By the adoption of a business-like method of missionary finance in each congregation, and by the active coöperation of the laymen, it is an entirely practicable thing to lift the churches of this country to four times their present offerings toward world evangelization. It has already been done in so many hundreds of churches, that we speak with great confidence when we declare that the financial problem, in missions can be solved if the men of the church will put their intelligent and persistent efforts into the task.

"Men are beginning to do this in ever-increasing numbers. In one city recently eighty-two laymen spoke in eighty-two pulpits on the same Sunday presenting the methods and spirit of the laymen's movement. This is but characteristic of the way in which laymen can be led to take hold of the active work of missionary education, as advocates and organizers.

Adopting New Standards.

"Many men are adopting the new standards of stewardship, giving one-fourth, one-third, one-half, or three-fourths of all they earn to the extension of the kingdom of Christ in the world. These men are entering into a joy life beyond anything they had supposed possible in this world.

"That man's life is most worth living whose work is most worth while. If you will link your life to the ongoing purposes of Almighty God, you may become conscious of sharing with Him the joy and glory of helping to make the whole world over into a world-brotherhood worthy of being described as the kingdom of God.

"It is easier for an individual to do his part when his congregation is trying to do its full duty. It is easiest for a congregation to do its part when the churches of a whole city are moving together. It is easiest for any city to do its part when the cities of the whole nation are lining up for serious business.

"The seventy-five leading cities of America have adopted a worthy missionary policy and are planning to put into immediate operation in their churches. If this is done, it will shake the nation. If this nation moves it will move Christendom. And when Christendom moves it will shake the world."

Impressions of Prominent Chicago Layman

The Convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement has come and gone. What impression has it left upon the minds of those attending its sessions? The apathy of the men in our Chicago churches, to calls for service, has long been realized. In no department of church life and work has this been more true, than in that of Missionary endeavor.

Bearing this in mind, the first impression that I received from the convention, and it is one that yet abides, was its supreme confidence in its power and ability to reach men with the message. Promptly the first note of the first hymn was sounded full and true. This confidence was evident in every address. No voice of hesitation at any time was heard.

This policy was faithfully carried out until the last of the great organ in Orchestra Hall faded away as the delegates slowly passed the doors thoughtful and full of purpose.

The next impression to me was not only the eminently satisfying provisions of, but as well the demonstrated practicability of its program: "The Evangelization of the World in this Generation." Just here Mr. J. Campbell White's two addresses of Friday evening and Saturday afternoon were to me practical in demonstration and true in logic. Another impression received was the call for unity that was always heard. Every address not only called for, but demanded, that unity of purpose from Christian America that is observed on the missionary fields. The convention unmistakably put emphasis upon the fact that there is no room for divisive efforts in our common church life and service.

But deeper than all of its other commands was the one for spiritual development of the minds of men. Especially was this true in the great addresses of our missionaries. I believe the hearts of Chicago men have been touched as never before by these earnest devout men from the firing line. Then, to me the convention stood for supreme confidence in and the proven practicability of its plea: Demanded unity of purpose upon the part of all churches and the fuller spiritual development of all men.

I pray God to deepen these impressions made upon my heart and yours, and give to us the earnest desire for and purpose of adequately meeting our responsibility.

E. M. Bowman.

A Home Missionary's Estimate

By Secretary of American Missionary Society.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement, which culminated in a national missionary congress, in Chicago, May 3-6, interested directly in foreign missions 69,000 registered attendants. Seventy cities in central and cardinal parts of the United States were visited, rallied and aroused. Reports in daily papers, special literature on foreign missions widely distributed, churches awakened through news echoed to them by returning delegates, fanned into flame, smouldering zeal for the extension of Christ's kingdom. The addresses, arguments and appeals in every city were for nations and peoples beyond the seas. The principles of missions and reasons for their establishment are the same, in application, only, they differ. The reflexive influence upon home missions will be perceptible and stimulating. While needs of the "uttermost parts of the earth" were emphasized, a consciousness is stirring that the homeland must be Christianized for a highway to other lands.

Stewardship in administering one's own estate for services of his kingdom; fellowship with Christ in enlarging his reign among men, everywhere; the necessity and essentiality of spiritual and corporal unity of his church to exalt him to sovereignty over non-Christian countries so uniformly advocated in every meeting of the entire circuit, have prepared the soil for wider ideas and subsequent increase of gathering in our republic.

Pastors will note a responsive interest to their missionary plans and feel a new incentive to preach our Lord's commission with emphasis on "First at Jerusalem." Men of the church will ask for practical, up-to-date literature on the problems and needs of America. A general realization of the large part our country is asked to take in world-wide evangelism will logically and effectively assist all home missionary enterprises.

Profound gratitude is felt and devout thanksgiving is offered to God by home secretaries and Christian workers on every American field, for the new impulse given missions.

I. N. McCash.

A Pastor's Estimate

Cincinnati, Ohio.—While standing at the foot of the mountain we can see only its majestic cliffs. Only when we are some distance from it, can we grasp its magnitude and take in its range. This is true with the Laymen's Missionary Convention. We are too near it yet to determine its influence upon the church of Christ.

The influence of this convention upon the churches of Christ will be determined by two things, viz., the extent the church is brought under the influence of this convention, and the responsiveness of the churches to this influence. It is a striking characteristic of the church of Christ that they have always been ready to adjust themselves to the larger spirit of their environment. We feel sure they will in some definite measure respond to this great appeal and adjust themselves to the opportunity presented for larger and more efficient work.

It should mean to the Churches of Christ: (1) A new inspiration to unity and a unification of their divergent and discordant efforts. The spirit of unity was the most dominant and significant note of the convention. The sentiment of union so ably presented and so enthusiastically cheered by the three or four thousand men is the plea the Disciples have made for the past century. It would be a fatal mistake for the church not to catch the note of opportunity sounded in this trumpet call for unity and progressive work. In order to hasten the realization of

Mothers' Day was very generally observed by our churches.

E. A. Ewell, Durant, Okla., has resigned his pastorate and will enter the evangelistic field.

W. J. Wright has begun his work as supply pastor for the church at Enid, Okla., during the summer.

S. B. Culp, pastor of the church at Adrian, Mich., reports that the church is preparing to purchase new seat for its building.

The Northern Baptist Convention, Chicago, last week, attracted large audiences and was worthy of that great body of people.

The Disciples of Houston, Texas, gave to missions last year $786, but this year they have already come up to the $2,000 mark.

Albert Nichols is the pastor at Winfield, Kansas, where they have just completed a new church that will, when all space is in use, seat about one thousand people.

Mark S. Peckham, who is working under the direction of the A. C. M. S. at Sumter, S. C., reports frequent additions to the church by baptism and letter.

Edward A. Henry of the University of Chicago is announced to give a lecture on Palestine at the Memorial Church, Chicago, under the auspices of the men's league.

Evangelists J. B. Holmes and A. W. Shaffer have formed an evangelistic team and are ready to make dates for work, beginning after the convention season.

At Salem, Oregon, where Davis Errett is minister, the home missionary offering was $100. In the evening of the same day J. P. Bentley gave an address on China.

Since the first of January there have been sixteen additions to the Queen Anne Church, Seattle, Wash., where J. L. Greenwell is the minister.

Preachers are now being enlisted for their annual commencement addresses. These occasions furnish opportunity for delivering telling messages.

John H. Booth, pastor of the church at Centerville, Iowa, is a candidate for congress from the Eighth Iowa District, on the Democratic ticket.

James P. Lichtenberger, University of Pennsylvania, recently delivered an address on "The Test of a City's Greatness," before the city club of Philadelphia.

Finis Idleman, Central Church, Des Moines, attended the missionary congress in Chicago, and the following Sunday gave the evening service to a report of the great meetings here.

A brotherhood has been organized in the South Broadway Church, Denver. B. B. Tyler will not let any good thing escape his church when it has really proven its worth.

The state convention of Michigan, will be held in Owosso, May 23 to 26. Several important developments of the work there are lending interest to the convention, so that a large attendance is expected.

The auxiliaries of the Central and Woodward Ave. Churches, Detroit, Mich., recently met in joint session, with about sixty members present. This fine fellowship is a means of help to each body.

G. Lyle Smith writes that the record attendance of the Sunday school at El Reno, Okla., was made May 9, when there were 285 present. There were two large audiences present during the day, and three confessions.

Claire L. Waite, who has just closed his work at Milwaukee, Wis., is in a meeting at Rib Lake, Wis., where J. S. Stone is pastor. Mrs. Waite is assisting in the meeting as leader of song and soloist.

"Castles and Keeps of England" was the subject of a recent illustrated lecture given by Dr. Willett at the Memorial Church, Chicago. The proceeds of the evening were given to the baseball team of the church.

W. C. Cole has "made good" at Goldfield, Iowa, and will remain as pastor another year. Mr. and Mrs. Cole will attend the World's Sunday School Convention in Washington the latter part of this month.

J. M. Kersey, Omaha, First Church, was elected president of the Third District for the coming year, at the recent meeting in Fremont. E. A. Jordan, Omaha, is vice president.

Ben F. Hill and son are in a meeting at Shawnee, Okla., with good success. They will be in Lindsay, Okla., during June, and the following month will be spent in Elk City.

William Price moves forward successfully with the work at Howett St., Peoria, Ill. On a recent Sunday there were 188 in the Sunday-school, and two men made the confession Sunday evening.

H. H. Jenner, pastor of the Stuart Street Church, Springfield, Ill., has just closed a meeting with home forces in which there were forty-five additions. Since Mr. Jenner went to this work there have been fifty-five accessions to the church.

The new $40,000 church at Carthage, Mo., has just been opened for service. The church is one of the best in southwest Missouri and an honor to the local congregation. The fine new pipe organ which is to be installed will not arrive until about the first of June.

Claude J. Miller, pastor of the church at Jewell, Iowa, who is studying at Drake University, has been elected to the pastorate for another year and will continue his studies in Drake with the purpose of taking the B. D. degree a year later.

The missionary offering of the First Church, Joplin, Mo., taken May 1, was more than $600. F. F. Walters, the pastor, has built a new house in which he is now pleasantly located. All departments of the church are prospering.

An attempt is being made to raise the money to place a superintendent of missions in Omaha. The local churches are to raise $300, and the balance as it is reported will come from the Home Missionary Society.

M. H. Garrard, after only a few months, has closed his work with the church at Saginaw, Mich., and accepted a call to the church at Battle Creek. He will close his work in Saginaw and move to the new field the first of July.

J. C. Todd, who has recently visited Transylvania University, Kentucky, says that he was greatly pleased with the work that is being done by President Crossfield, and that he thinks much better things will soon appear in the development of that school.

Since the dedication of the new Centennial Church, Bloomington, Ill., the pastor has been holding open house each evening. The people are invited to inspect the new building, and at 7:45 a public service is held. The first week there were several baptisms.

Richard Martin, evangelist, just closed a meeting at Chariton, in Dade County, Mo., with over one hundred additions to the church. He is now in a meeting at Greenfield, Mo., where there have already been sixty-three accessions.

The report of a local paper says that the church at Anderson, Indiana, is doing some thorough work in looking up a minister to succeed T. W. Grafton. The report mentions the names of one western and two eastern men who are under consideration.

From our California contemporary, "The Pacific Christian," we have the word that James Egbert, formerly of Cortland, has accepted a call to College City, succeeding Charles A. Young, who closed a short but successful pastorate with that church the 23rd of April.

The Colorado Summer Assembly meets at Pine Cliffe, Colo., July 24 to August 4. The elevation here is 8,000 feet above sea level and an ideal place for a week or a month. The assembly committee consists of J. E. Pickett, A. E. Pierce, J. B. Haston, Leonard G. Thompson, and Mrs. G. W. Perrin.

H. J. Loken, who so recently succeeded I. N. McCash in the pastorate of the church at Berkeley, has been leading with a masterly hand. He recently undertook to raise enough to clear a $5,000 debt on a single Sunday. This was accomplished and at the same time enough more was given to make repairs on the church property.

J. Fred Jones assisted A. I. Zeller in ordaining one of the "loyal sons" of the church at Cuba, Ill., to the work of the Christian ministry. Charles H. Day, says Mr. Zeller, will make a fine preacher. He is now studying in Drake University, and acting as assistant pastor to Finis Idleman.

A. C. Smither has announced the following series of Sunday evening sermons in the First Church, Los Angeles: "Man in His Home," "Man in His Business," "Man in His Church," "Man in His Politics" and "The Ideal Man." These services are conducted under the auspices of the men's brotherhood.

Some of the preachers of Drake University have been holding a public debate on the authorship of Isaiah. Such a debate is doubtless of value to the participants but would hardly attract the crowds that came to hear our fathers discuss baptism and eternal punishment.

The Third District (Nebraska) Convention was held in Fremont, May 6-8. C. W. Fuller, Jr., of Ashland, is president of the convention. E. A. Jordan, of South Omaha, made an address on "The Demands of the Twentieth Century." Other addresses were by J. W. Hilton, Bethany, W. A. Baldwin, state secretary, Thomas H. Adams, Bethany.

A new church was dedicated at Mt. Sterling, Ill., May 1. C. A. Lockhart, dean of Bible College, Bethany, Mo., had charge of the services. The church gave during the day $1,600 to complete the payment of the $6,000 expended in the building. The church will seat about 500 people and is well adapted to Sunday-school work.

O. F. Jordan recently gave an illustrated lecture in the Y. M. C. A. of Evanston, Ill., on "The Evils of Child Labor." The slides illustrating the theme were furnished by the New York Committee. Mr. Jordan has given much time to the study of social conditions and the knowledge makes for effectiveness in his work in the pulpit and makes a demand for his work in many other directions.

The Seventh Church, Indianapolis, has just installed a Sunday-school and missionary library of 150 volumes. The pastor, Clay Trusty, says the church will pay all indebtedness in June and will at once begin to plan for a larger building. There are now 720 members of the church "that can be found." The Sunday attendance has increased 25 per cent in the last six months.

The churches of Tacoma, Wash., have presented Charles Reign Scoville with a gold medal, on one side of which are engraved the words, "Tacoma Yours for 3,000 in 1912," which means that these churches have asked Mr. Scoville to return for another meeting at that time and that they propose to see the pentecostal number brought into the church in that one campaign.

G. P. Taubman, for several years pastor of the Bible school of the Independence Boul. Church, Kansas City, Mo., has resigned to accept the pastorate of the Hyde Park Church of that city. Mr. Taubman succeeds Louis S. Cupp in the pastorate of the Hyde Park Church, and began his pastorate the first of May with a three weeks' meeting.

Under date of May 8, we have a telegram from Allen Wilson, evangelist, saying: "Just closed a great meeting at Atlanta, Ga. Here (Arkansas City) eight days; fifty-one added, forty-six today. The house would not hold one-half the people tonight. Popplewell is an untiring worker. He enjoys and deserves great popularity. L. B. Conrad singing."

Lawrence O. Newcomer, Mt. Vernon, Ohio, has been called to the pastorate of the church at Connersville, Ind., where he succeeds J. C. Burkhart, who goes to the church at Frankfort, Ind. Mr. Newcomer has been doing chautauqua work in addition to his pastoral cares, and has a fine reputation as a speaker.

W. M. White will leave Mexico, Mo., for the pastorate of the First Church, Cedar Radips, Ia., the second Sunday in June. The church at Cedar Rapids is greatly pleased over the prospects of a fine growth under his leadership. We have no doubt that their fondest hopes will be realized, for Mr. White has a fine record.

The Second Church, Indianapolis, Ind., has just laid the corner stone of its new building which will cost about $10,000. Those who had part in the service were: the pastor, H. L. Herrod, A. L. Orcutt, E. H. Clifford of the Fourth Church, E. E. Moorman of the Englewood Church, Charles Fillmore of the Hillsdale Church, and W. H. Dickerson of Kentucky.

The success of the Scoville meeting in Tacoma is given in the following telegram: "Closed Monday night; total additions, 703, including those going from other churches to the new south church. The new converts at the First Church alone pledged $1,570 for the current expenses of next year. Fifty-two added here (Spokane) today. Five churches and missions coöperating. Meetings held in Central Church. Brown, Allen, Downing, Lemon, Pastors."—Charles Reign Scoville.

CREAM BAKING POWDER

No Alum—No Phosphates

Be on your guard. Alum Powders may be known by their price—10 or 25c. a lb., or one cent an ounce.

We have been sorry during the past week at the announcement of the death of Mrs. T. E. Cramblett, wife of President Cramblett of Bethany College. The faculty of the college have passed sincere resolutions expressing their sorrow and appreciation of Mrs. Cramblett as counsellor and friend, and an inspiring member of the many organizations associated with college and church.

Six sermonettes are being given by George B. Evans, Chagrin Falls, Ohio, the titles of which are: "The Sin of Selfishness"; "A Little Wine for My Stomach's Sake"; "The Scarlet Woman, or the Social Evil"; "The Twentieth Century Judas, or The Grafter"; "Divorce, or The Modern Delilah of the Home"; "Is Man a Tadpole or an Archangel, or Evolution?"

A new thing in Sunday-school work comes from Boulder, Colo., where the men's class taught by the pastor, A. L. Ward, on a recent Sunday ran an auto excursion to the Sunday-school. On their banners were such phrases as: "Men for Men." "Going to Ward's Class," "Men's Bible Class." The autos went to all parts of the city to bring men to the class. The attendance of the school for the day was 539.

J. T. Webb was compelled, on account of ill health, to give up the work at Clovis, New Mexico. It seemed unfortunate that the church should have to change pastors just as it was preparing for the New Mexico and West Texas Convention, but the church fortunately secured J. N. Cloe as pastor and he is rapidly organizing things for the coming of the convention. The church will give lodging and breakfast free to all who will send in their names to the pastor.

Frank P. Smith, pastor of the West Park Church, Indianapolis, has resigned and will close his work with the present month. Mr. Smith went to Indianapolis five years ago from Hoopeston, Ill., and has been unusually successful in his work. The membership of the church has grown from thirty-five to 350 during his ministry, a fine building at the cost of $18,000 has been erected. The average attendance of the Sunday-school is 250. A young men's club of thirty-six members has been organized. Mr. Smith will locate with another church, the name of which is not yet announced.

T. N. Kincaid has resigned the work at Hot Springs, Arkansas, to which he has given so many years of faithful service, and L. V. Stiles is now in charge. The basement of the church is complete and the task now confronting Mr. Stiles is that of completing the upper part which will cost about $30,000. Mr. Stiles thinks it will be necessary to call for help from the Disciples of other places for help in this work. The importance of such a work in this mecca of health seekers has long been recognized.

We take the following note concerning the work at El Paso, Texas, from the Christian Messenger: "The work at the 'Pass City' is making some decided gains under the efficient leadership of Brother P. J. Rice. They have raised the debt of $3,500 and more recently they have decided not only to remain a living link to home missions, helping to support Brother J. A. Stout as evangelist in New Mexico-West Texas, but they have also decided to support their own missionary on the foreign field, through the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. There have been frequent additions to the church and the outlook is encouraging for the building up of a great work in El Paso."

The First Church, Boise, Idaho, is to build. They have put out a prospectus of the new building, which is estimated to cost $35,000. The following description shows how ample will be the preparation for work: The seating capacity of the main auditorium will be 420 on main floor and choir, with 175 in gallery. That of the Bible school department arranged for Bible school work: 65 in primary, 40 in kindergarten, 80 in the two large class rooms over, 35 in Bible class, about 140 in ten class rooms and 200 in rotunda, or a total of over 650 when all apartments are occupied. When both departments are combined there will be a total seating capacity within view of the speaker of about 1,200. Extreme dimensions of building, 70x116; auditorium, 51x51.

The Missouri State Convention will be held in Jefferson City, June 17-22. Unusual interest attaches to the convention this year because of the new building which has recently been completed by the Jefferson City congregation, and which will be the meeting place of the convention. This beautiful building is the realization of a long cherished hope on the part of the Disciples of the Capitol City and the state that there might be a church there commensurate with the strength of the Disciples in this great state. J. L. Thompson is the present pastor of the church, and is leading the church in careful preparation for the coming of the hosts in June. The church announces that entertainment will not be free, but that low rates may be secured of hotels and boarding houses in

L. O. Ferguson, Red Bluff, Cal., is the new minister of the church at Petaluma, Cal. He began work last Sunday.

The East Side Church, Toledo, Ohio, has called George A. Johnson as their minister, and he will take up the work at once.

R. C. Davis, Kansas City, Mo., is assisting W. E. Bobbitt in a meeting at Colusa, Calif. Mr. Davis is said to be a fine soloist.

Thompson A. Young, after three years of successful work at Newcastle, Ky., has resigned and accepted a call to the church at Homboldt, Tenn., where he is already at work.

E. N. Duty, for a few months pastor of the Second Church, Milwaukee, Wis., is now working vigorously with the church at Minerva, Ohio. Mr. Duty is greeted by audiences ranging above the 500 mark.

R. P. Shepherd, acting secretary of southern California, has accepted a place on the editorial staff of the Christian Evangelist. He is succeeded in the secretaryship by J. N. Smith.

The First Church, Lincoln, Neb., celebrated the first anniversary of the dedication of their new church May 6, when they burned the first thousand dollar bond issued by the church for the building.

Harry G. Waggoner, son of J. G. Waggoner, and pastor of the church at Hamilton, Ill., has accepted a call to the church at Memphis, Mo., and is already at work in his new field.

W. Y. Allen is doing a good work at Fort Scott, Kansas. In the two years of his ministry the church has been led to provide for a debt of $1,800, and 208 persons have been brought into the membership of the church.

D. R. Moss has closed his work with the Homestead Church, preaching his farewell sermon there the last Sunday in April. He has accepted a call to the church at Lockhaven, in the eastern part of the state.

D. H. Bradbury was presented with a purse by the Sunday-school of his church at Pompey, N. Y., at the close of his service there as pastor. Mr. Bradbury will continue his studies in Auburn Theological Seminary, and while doing so will preach at Thorpville.

E. L. Powell, Louisville, Ky., who preaches in one of the theaters one Sunday evening each month, held the last service of the kind for the present season the first Sunday in May. As usual the house was filled to hear this preacher of whom the men in Louisville never tire.

J. E. Bell closed his work with the First Church, Imperial, Cal., the fifteenth day of May, and became pastor of the Hollister Church. Mr. Bell has been with this church only seven months but has worked hard to build it up. Adverse conditions made him feel that it was not a field where he might hope to remain permanently.

The First Church, Philadelphia, has just installed L. E. Sellers as pastor with becoming dignity. The installation service was held May 2. Dr. J. P. Lichtenberger, Philadelphia, delivered the charge to the new minister, and Chaplain Wright of the U. S. Navy to the congregation. Other parts were taken by Messrs. Bond, Rutledge, Fennenger, and Caldwell.

The men's brotherhood of the First Church, Elkhart, Ind., has determined to use its influence for a clean city administration, regardless of political divisions. They have accordingly appointed a committee which will make a careful investigation of all candidates and report to the brotherhood their recommendations. These men are planning for a great meeting May 8, when Arthur Holmes of Philadelphia will be the speaker of the evening at a great banquet. S. G. Buckner is the successful pastor of this church.

Robert Graham Frank, for seven years pastor of the church at Liberty, Mo., was, without solicitation on his part, invited to become pastor of the church at Mexico, Mo. Mr. Frank gave the matter careful thought and then went before the official board of the church to ask whether they or any of them felt that a change in the relationship would be advisable. The unanimous expression of the board was that Mr. Frank should remain for years to come. Mr. Frank loves the church and is happy in the work, and with this expression from his members, had no trouble in deciding to remain, though he feels that Mexico offers one of the best prospects in the state. Such devotion to the church with which one works, and such loyalty on the part of the church to its pastor, speaks well for both parties, and is strong encouragement to young men of the right kind to prepare for the ministry.

The tenth anniversary of the pastorate of George Kemper, and the seventieth of the church, were celebrated the last week of April by the congregation at Midway, Ky. This church has had a long and interesting history beginning in 1835, with the coming of John Francisco and his wife to Midway. The first house was built in 1844. L. L. Pinkerton of Lexington preached the dedicatory sermon, and it is interesting to note the theme of his sermon: "The Name Christian: Why It Should Be Used in Preference to Any Other Name." Mr. Pinkerton was pastor of the church for about seventeen years, while teaching in a school which he had organized here. The list of the ministers of this church is as follows: Curtis J. Smith. L. L. Pinkerton, R. C. Ricketts, P. S. Fall, Harrison Turner, Carroll Kendrick, Enos Campbell, H. T. Anderson, James S. Fall, Thomas N. Arnold, J. H. Hammond, John S. Shouse, Mark Collis, J. J. Haley, W. A. Broadhurst, W. R. Lloyd, M. D. Club, W. M. White, and George Kemper, who has been with the church seventeen years.

John Ray Ewers, East End Church, Pittsburg, Pa., has made reservations for a trip abroad this summer. He will start about the first of August, and will see the Passion Play, visit Switzerland, Germany, France, England, and Scotland, returning home for vigorous work in the autumn.

The readers of the Christian Century will remember the recent announcement of the death of Dr. Loftus, Tibet, and the call of the Foreign Society for some one to succeed to his place. This call has found answer in the ordination to that work of Dr. Will Harding, by the Vine Street Church, Nashville, Tenn.

The British Sovereigns

Edward the Seventh

Chronology Of His Life.

1841, Nov. 9—Born at Buckingham Palace.
1860—Visit to the United States and Canada.
1863, March 10—Marriage to Princess Alexandra of Denmark at Windsor.
1864—Prince Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence, heir to the crown, born; he died Jan. 14, 1892.
1865, June 3—Prince George, Duke of York, subsequently Prince of Wales and now king, born.
1871—Dangerously ill with typhoid fever.
1872, Feb. 27—National thanksgiving for his recovery.
1875—Visit to India.
1896—Won the Derby with Persimmon.
1901, Jan. 22—Succeeded to the British throne.
1902, June 24—Operated upon for perityphlitis and thought to be dying; his coronation postponed.
1902, Aug. 9—Crowned King of England and Emperor of India.
1910, May 6—Died at Buckingham Palace.

In personal appearance King Edward was rather below the average stature but of strong and heavy build. His ruddy face betokened good health and good spirits up to a short time ago. He wore his gray beard trimmed to a sharp point. His thin circle of gray hair diminished until he was quite bald. Even in his latter days he continued to be one of the best dressed men in Europe and was regarded as a model for quiet refinement of dress and bearing. At the state functions in which he participated King Edward revived all the pomp and circumstance of medieval days. He drove to Westminster on the opening of parliament in one of the sumptuous royal coaches, attended by heralds, equerries and outriders and a vast retinue, forming a pageant of royal splendor. On these occasions the king wore the full robes of majesty. Tactfulness, which he possessed to a marked degree, was a conspicuous characteristic of the late king.

He was also interested in farming, the 600 cultivated acres of his estate at Sandringham being farmed on most scientific principles. As a sportsman the King was particularly prominent. He owned many fast thoroughbreds and his colors often won on the English turf.

Yachting was another sport of which Edward was extremely fond. He looked forward each year to the brilliant regatta at Cowes, where he first won the queen's cup in 1877 with his schooner Hildegarde. He always held an actively exercised membership in the Royal Yacht Club. In 1893 he raced the famous single-sticker, Britannia, and won many cups.

The King visited Canada and this country in 1860, spending one September day in Chicago in that year. After being received with a frenzy of patriotic enthusiasm by Canadians of all classes he visited such American cities as Detroit, St. Louis, Chicago, Washington and New York, travelling not as the Prince of Wales, heir to the British crown, but as Baron Renfrew, a British nobleman. More than $2,000,000 was spent in entertaining him by Americans.

George the Fifth

His Life At a Glance.

1865, June 3—Born at Marlborough House, London.
1877—Entered the navy.
1880—Promoted midshipman.
1884—Promoted lieutenant.
1889—Commander of torpedo boat.
1890—Commander of gunboat Thrush.
1892—Became in direct line of succession through death of his elder brother, the Duke of Clarence.
1892—Created Duke of York.
1893—Promoted captain in the navy.
1893, July 6—Married Princess Mary of Teck.
1894—Prince Edward Albert, present heir, born.
1901—Made a tour around the world of the British possessions.
1901—Created Prince of Wales.
1904—Toured India for five months.
1910—Succeeded to the throne of England.

It should not be forgotten, in considering the attributes of the new king, that he was not brought up as the heir to the crown. Chroniclers who were in a position to know state that he came to the honors and duties of heirship with no desire and with real regret. He was 27 years old before he became heir to the crown through the death of his elder brother, Prince Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence and Avondale. Prior to that time he had been at liberty, as a mere second son of the then Prince of Wales, the late king, to follow in large degree his own inclinations. Those inclinations were for a quiet life, with little of pomp and public appearance. He loved the sea, which he had actively followed since he was 12 years old, when he entered the navy. As the "sailor prince" he was popular with Englishmen.

Not only was George, when he became heir, forced to take up the public duties of the Duke of Clarence, but he was also obliged to marry his brother's fiancee. Princess Victoria Mary of Teck, or "Princess May," as she was popularly known, had been chosen as the future queen of England, and her marriage to the Duke of Clarence was to have occurred in 1892. After the duke's death Queen Victoria ordered George to marry the present queen now known as Queen Mary. In 1893 George did so, when the period of mourning for the Duke of Clarence was ended.

They have six children, five boys and one girl. The oldest boy is Prince Edward direct heir to the throne born in 1894. The new ruler has always been a great postage stamp collector and is not particularly fond of sports. Another hobby, shared with his wife, has been the preservation of every scrap of printed matter from newspapers or magazines bearing upon himself, his wife or his children. The result is a collection which some day will be of great value to the historian.

In 1908 George as the Prince of Wales visited Canada to attend the celebration at Quebec and on that occasion met Vice President Fairbanks. He has also visited India and South Africa.

Encouraging Reports from the Home Fields

Reports of churches to the American Christian Missionary Society in the first thirteen days of May show: Seventy-four increased their offerings over last year and ninety-eight not previously giving contributed. Let the good work go on. Every church ought to be patriotic and religious enough to give to Home Missions. Help plant American churches, for they help India, China, Africa and all foreign lands. Please report and remit promptly. Forward all remittances to the American Christian Missionary Society, Carew Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Information Wanted

One Simon Merza, claiming to represent the Church of Christ in Ur of the Chaldees, is soliciting money with which to rebuild a church edifice in the childhood home of Abraham, which, he says, was destroyed two years ago, when 25,000 Christians were put to death by the Mohammedans.

Leonard G. Thompson, corresponding secretary of the Colorado Christian Missionary Society, and I, had a protracted and unsatisfactory interview with this man today. His credentials, to us, are not satisfactory. He claims that the Disciples of Christ are giving him financial assistance. This is well if Simon Merza is all right.

If these lines should arrest the attention of a reader of The Christian Century who has assisted Simon Merza, please write a letter to me and tell me what you know about him and about his honesty, his truthfulness, his reliability. If he is what he claims to be let us help him. If there is such a religious community in Ur of the Chaldeas as he represents let us enter into practical fellowship with it. B. B. Tyler.

this vision we ought to bring the impact of the past hundred years of our successful history to bear upon the promulgation of those great fundamental things which make for unity. (2) It should mean a more definite and extended program in all of our missionary efforts. The fact is we have been missionary merely from a sense of duty. We have reached a point where we must be missionary out of a sense of love and the joy of a privilege if we wish to meet our obligation for the future. What me want is a healthy articulation of all our missionary interest—a coördination of enterprise that will engender the best and greatest enthusiasm for missionary work. These conventions have been a clearing house for missionary information. They have placed before the church an ideal and we may expect larger missionary gifts. (3) It ought to mean the masculination of the gospel we have to present to the world. This is a man's work. It is not mere sentiment, but plain, practical, heroic Christianity. Men have been religious out of sentiment; they have been appealed to through the sentimental. It is time to stop it. They must be appealed to to be religious as a business, a manly business, the king's business, in the service of the king. They must understand the most powerful gospel in the world is the concrete gospel. These things with a larger vision for the world's redemption will ultimately be the effect these conventions will have upon the Churches of Christ. J. J. Cole.

News from the Foreign Society

Last week the Foreign Society received $5,000 from Joe Coop of England on the Annuity Plan. This is a total of $16,690 he has given in this way. Mr. Coop has also given generously for many years in direct gifts.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first eleven days of May amounted to $12,584, an increase of $4,884 over the corresponding time last year. There was a gain of $2,180 from the churches as churches. The total gain of the year to May 11, amounted to $17,825.

Johannathon Souders of Nebraska, eighty-two years of age, has lived a conscientious Christian life for fifty-six years. He sends $500 for foreign missions on the Annuity Plan.

A. F. Hensey and wife sail for Bolenge, Africa, May 28.

The Vine Street Church, Nashville, Tenn., gave Dr. W. M. Hardy a farewell reception and many valuable presents for his work in Batang, border of Tibet. The church also at Euclid avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, remembered their living link missionary, A. F. Hensey, with some special gifts for his work at Bolenge, Africa, on the eve of his departure. The church at Norwood, Ohio, remembered Mrs. J. C. Ogden with a number of gifts which they sent out by Dr. W. M. Hardy.

It is believed that Stephen J. Corey, secretary of the Foreign Society, made one of the finest addresses delivered at the Missionary Congress at Chicago, May 3-6.

The orders for Children's Day supplies are the largest in the history of the work. There have been about three hundred more orders already received than for the corresponding time in former years. Secretary Stephen J. Corey hopes to see the Children's Day offering reach $100,000.

The church at North Yakima, Wash., enters the living link rank. Morton L. Rose is the minister.

The church at Anaconda, Mont., Milton H. H. Lee, pastor, gave $8.00 for foreign missions last year. They were apportioned $25 this year. They send an offering of $85. The pastor says: "I believe that within the next two years we will be a living link. We are working toward it."

Missouri Convention Notes

Remember the date, June 17-22. Remember the place, Jefferson City, Mo., which Brother J. L. Thompson, the good pastor, calls "Our Jerusalem."

Will not all the churches appoint their representatives? Let those coming from your church be your representatives. Your delegates, appointed as such. When they arrive at Jefferson City, if you have appointed them as your delegates they will be given a badge that marks them as such. This is an important matter and we hope that it will have immediate attention.

Another thing. See to it that the expenses of your delegates are paid. This is but fair. They represent you and while it would be a large matter for the representative to bear the expenses it is a small matter for the whole church.

Once more. Churches should see that their ministers go to the state convention. We have letters from several already who say that they regret very much that they cannot come to the convention, and in each instance the reason is a financial one. This ought not to be. Will not each church see that the minister is financially able to go and then demand his presence?

The railroad rates have at last been settled. They have agreed to sell round trip tickets to Jefferson City and return at one and one-third fare for the round trip. The rate, however, must be four cents per mile, two cents each way. Tickets on sale June 16-21, inclusive, with final return limit to reach original starting point prior to midnight of June 24, 1910.

Now then, "All things are ready," get you ready to come to the feast. Let us have the best, the biggest, the greatest convention in every way, ever held in Missouri.

T. A. ABBOTT.

Oklahoma Christian Ministerial Institute

The institute met with the church at Norman this year and while the attendance was somewhat disappointing to those who are interested in every other way the meeting was a gratifying success. There were but two of those on the program absent without excuse and two others who sent messages giving reason for their absence. All the papers read were of a very high order of excellence, and the discussions, while sometimes rather spirited, were always in the spirit of Christian forbearance. I should be glad to speak of the papers in detail but feel that I haven't space for that so will simply say that each one gave evidence of careful preparation and all were helpful and thought-provoking.

Of course, the crowning feature of the institute was the four lectures by Walter Scott Priest on preacher problems. Brother Priest brought us messages out of his own rich experience and every one felt that they were the words of a man of God. They were soul-feeding, faith-strengthening, zeal-intensifying messages calculated to give the preacher a higher realization of the high calling that is his, and all were greatly benefitted who were permitted to hear them. Institutes desiring help will make no mistake in securing Brother Priest for these lectures.

Officers elected for the ensuing year are: President, N. S. Johnson, McAlester; vice president, G. Lyle Smith, El Reno; secretary-treasurer, R. E. Rosenstein, Norman; executive committee, Virtes Williams, Stillwater; F. D. Macy, Bartlesville, and Clay T. Runyon, Kingfisher.

Next year the institute will meet at Kingfisher.

R. E. ROSENSTEIN,
Norman, Okla. Secretary.

Eureka College

After all it is the small victories that count the most. The Aid Society of the Christian Church of Eureka has made a pledge of $300 toward the endowment fund of Eureka College. This represents real sacrifice. It indicates the pathway to success in this work we are doing. Eureka and vicinity have contributed no less than $100,000 to the support of Eureka College since its founding. In the campaign now on to raise $125,000, this community will contribute at least one-fifth of the amount. The prospects are growing brighter for the success of the college work in Illinois constantly. The endowment of Eureka College is an aim that would be worthy of every aid society, brotherhood, or other Christian organization of the state. We would be more than pleased to hear from the friends of the school.

H. H. PETERS.

Vincennes and Vicinity

There is a sin that the writer is guilty of that that he feels he must make confession of to the editors of our newspapers. It is the sin of always wanting to get all the church news in the papers from all the country, and then never sending in any news from his own home community.

ANNOUNCEMENT TO SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS

There is both pleasure and regret in our announcement that our orders for Bethany Graded Lesson Supplies for the Spring Quarter have so far exceeded our calculations that we are unable at the present moment to send out even a sample leaflet or manual. We have been compelled to decline a considerable number of new orders the last few days on account of the fact that our stock has been consumed to the last leaflet. We have the promise of the printing house that our greatly enlarged order of supplies for the Summer Quarter will be delivered soon, in plenty of time for those who wish RETURNABLE SAMPLES, to examine them, and have their order filled before the new quarter opens, July 1.

It will be well for those schools which have decided to begin the Bethany Supplies with July 1 to send their order as early as possible.

We hope to begin filling orders for RETURNABLE SAMPLES by the time this advertisement is being read.

NOTE THE FOLLOWING OFFER: The Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons will send out Returnable Samples of the complete line of Supplies—Beginners', Primary and Junior—(excepting the large Beginners' pictures). Accompanying the samples a bill will be sent for $1.09, the regular price of the set. The recipient may do one of three things: (1) He may return the samples uninjured after examination. (2) He may remit $1.09 and keep the samples. Or (3) he may return the bill with his Sunday School's order for Supplies and the publishers will mark it "paid." In writing for samples please say "RETURNABLE."

"No, here is another that is almost right. You began well, and made just a trifling mistake. Let us correct that, and see how well it will come out."

It would be too much to say that the teacher showed John how to do the work. He was too weary and discouraged to understand very much of what she showed him. But one thing he understood—the teacher had confidence in his ability to succeed.

"She thinks I can do it, and I believe I can," was about the way he put the case. "The teacher is a brick! She has faith in me."

That the teacher was not discouraged about him rebuked his own discouragement concerning himself, and gave him power to succeed. He was not a brilliant scholar, but he was a faithful student—a worker who needed just the encouragement his teacher gave him, to add hopefulness and outlook to the work.

Years afterward, in a time of perplexity and doubt, the lesson came back to him. He improvements on the church building. When completed the house of worship will be almost perfect in all of its appointments for great work. We now have a very flourishing brotherhood that meets every last Friday evening in each month. Since the revival meeting closed we have had so many good things. To prevent the church from cooling off too rapidly from the revival fervor the writer made arrangements for some excellent things to follow the meeting. It is necessary not to cool off quickly. It prevents crackling, which always follows when a revival crowd is allowed to cool off too quickly. On the next Wednesday evening we had A. W. Conner give our people an address on "The Boy Problem." His address was a great vision to the people. On the following week we had an "Institute of Social Service." We had with us Harry G. Hill of Indianapolis, S. D. Dutcher of Terre Haute, and many other splendid men. One of these was that missionary cyclone, E. W. Allen of Kansas City, Mo. Brother Grant K. Lewis has also been with us. We shall long remember his visit. The Lord will certainly bless the great Home Missionary cause under his leadership. One of the sweetest features about our church work is the splendid prayer meetings that we are having.

Our Second Church in the city has also experienced a marvelous growth. In a meeting held by Bramel and Gould in February, 123 were added to the church. This congregation has called Brother J. I. O'Neal to its pastorate. The church at Decker had a meeting held by C. R. L. Vawter in March. It resulted in sixty-three additions to the church. Earlier in the year Brother Vawter held a meeting for the church at Bruceville, which resulted in twenty-five additions to the church there. Bramel and Gould held two other meetings in the county, both of which were very successful. One was at Monroe, and the other at Wheatland. In the first one there were twenty-one additions; in the latter twenty-eight. Early in the fall Brother Coombs held a fine meeting at Oaktown, where D. E. Hanna is the efficient minister. There never was a time when the preaching of the gospel brought a more generous response than it has this year.

But not only in our own county have splendid meetings been held, but all around us. My neighbor on the Illinois side, Brother H. C. Holmes, had a fine meeting in January. It was held by that prince of evangelists, Brother Allen Wilson. Then on the east, where Brother J. B. Cleaver is the Bishop, viz., at Washington, Brother Wilhite just closed a great meeting with 170 additions to the church. Brother Cleaver is doing a great work at Washington. In the short time that he has been there he has done a great work. Of his pulpit work it is said that, "He dresses up gray matter in the form of Easter lilies."

At the present time the writer is busily engaged in writing the history of the First Church in Vincennes. It is to be published in book form. On July first our pastorate of almost ten years will be brought to a close.

WILLIAM OESCHGER.

Hamilton College Notes

May 22 to 26 is the date of the coming commencement exercises. Forty-six seniors will receive diplomas, the largest class in the history of the college. On May 25 ad 26, are the alumnae reception and the banquet. Invitations to these have been sent to each of Hamilton's 693 graduates.

The Kentucky State Association for Physical Training held its recent annual convention at Hamilton College. Delegates were present from the State University, Georgetown College, the Louisville Y. M. C. A., Transylvania University and other leading institutions of the state.

During the last week in June, after the close of the college year, the biennial convention of the Chi Omega Fraternity will be held at Hamilton, under the auspices of the local chapter. Two hundred delegates are expected; among the schools to be represented are the University of Michigan, the University of Wisconsin, the University of Illinois, Tulane University at New Orleans, Northwestern University, Barnard College of Columbia University, New York City, Dickinson College, Colby College, and the Universities of Arkansas, Texas, Nebraska, Kansas, Mississippi, Florida, California, Tennessee.

The improving and refurnishing of the buildings begun last summer will continue during the present vacation period. One of the first will be the placing of handsomely carved portals in massive Ionic design at the entrance of the main buildings.

Honoring the Past

BY ROBERT E. SPEER.

IT IS no enmity to our past to believe that it did not exhaust God. I do not see any disloyalty to the past in believing that God means the future to be better than it. Unless the past has made ready for a better future, the past was a bad past. Only those things are good that make ready for better things to come after them, and those men are disloyal to the past, not who believe that it made preparation for greater things, but who believe that all the great things are in a golden age gone by. The worst disloyalty to the past is to mistake it for the future. Very great and glorious that past has been, but that past will have failed to teach its lesson to us, that past will have failed to fulfill its mission in the will of God, if it binds men forever in the chains of its institutional forms, if it has not made them ready for larger and completer things, and led them on to such a unity as Christ Himself, we must believe, longed for while He was here and waits for now where He is gone.

Promoting Christian Union

Three Practical Plans Proposed

On this page last week The Christian Century strongly urged the Disciples of Christ to take up other means of promoting Christian union in addition to the founding and upbuilding of local churches.

This paper believes it is oftimes an advantage to the Kingdom of God for the Disciples to refrain from organizing a church in a community already overchurched. But it does not believe the Disciples have no mission to such a community.

On the contrary, in such a community the plea for union is especially needed, and it is the business of the Disciples to carry it there. This may be done better by preaching, lecturing, institutes and other public statements than by adding to the already burdened and distraught community another congregation.

It is with peculiar satisfaction, therefore, that we publish this week the communication from the President of the American Christian Missionary Society. Mr. Ainslie has been traveling among the churches, speaking to them the message of Home missions and making observations.

He points out, as did The Christian Century, that there are grave reactionary tendencies among the Disciples at the present time. The temptation in the day of our institutional success to fall back into an easy and respectable sectarianism, taking our place alongside the other denominations as one of them, is not being wholly resisted.

It would be easier for the recipient of the honor with which his brethren have distinguished him to speak soft and flattering words to them, to join in the sectarian jingoism characteristic of much of our journalism and evangelism.

Instead of this, Mr. Ainslie frankly says that as he reads conditions, "the Disciples are drifting from those principles that gave them their existence."

In spite of those curious voices that have of late been declaring that the Disciples have some other distinctive business, more or less august, than that of promoting the union of Christians, he declares with a straightforwardness that cannot be misunderstood that the duty which "overshadows every other issue, whether we want it to do so or not, is the re-emphasis or re-statement of the Disciples' proposition for Christian union."

It is clear to this leader of the brotherhood that the mere organizing of more congregations and the greatening of our denomination does not in itself discharge our debt to Christendom.

It is conceivable that the number of Disciple congregations might be indefinitely multiplied in the land without advancing the cause of Christian unity in an appreciable degree. The fact that these congregations were organized upon the basis of primitive Christianity does not in itself help toward unity. For, after all, this so-called primitive Christianity is our conception of what primitive Christanity was. The other evangelical bodies are no less devoted to the ideal of primitive Christianity than are we. They only differ among themselves as to what constitutes primitive Christianity.

The task of the Disciples of Christ is not to establish their conception of the primitive church, but to create in the hearts of Christ's people a longing to be one. The basis of final unity will take care of itself if Christ's people are once made to desire unity and to practice as much unity as their present conscience will allow.

Therefore, the standard by which the Disciples' success is to be measured is not found within the movement, but outside the movement. The question to ask is not, How great have the Disciples become? but, How effective is their plea and example in developing a union conscience among Christian people?

It is doubtful if the Disciples of Christ manifest the spirit of Christian union in a higher degree than do other evangelical churches. Certainly we have not been leaders, but, not infrequently, lagging followers, in great modern movements which enlist the coöperation of all evangelical Christians. The tendency of the Disciples to be a clannish group is overcome only by much difficulty and grace.

But it is being overcome. And President Ainslie's suggestion for the Disciples to establish a literary propaganda to carry our plea for unity widespread among the Christian people for whom it is intended is a sign of the reversal of the reactionary tendencies and of the freer fraternizing of the Disciples with their brethren whose unity they seek.

As to the merits of the particular proposal made by Mr. Ainslie we do not need here to judge. But that a wider program of propagation should be undertaken in this opening year of our new century seems to The Christian Century an obvious and urgent duty.

In this connection comes a letter from an earnest layman in one of the great churches of the brotherhood. This letter contains a stirring suggestion for the promotion of Christian union. The writer says we need "a high-class, continuous and emphatic propaganda of Christian union." The time has come for us to "plead our plea," he says, "and the world is getting ready to listen to it if we will state it without dogmatism."

He goes on to outline a plan by which almost any local congregation can lift the plea for union up above the prejudice of any sectarian statement and commend it to all people of Christian disposition. The plan contemplates a series of three or five addresses each season on Christian union by orators of our own people and other Christian bodies—the strongest, broadest-visioned men that can be secured.

Happily we are in a time when such orators, deeply interested in this theme, can be found in almost any denomination. The plan contemplates an invitation to the ministers and members of all the churches, the enlistment of the newspapers in announcing the addresses and in discussing them, and the presentation of a high-grade musical program that would be an attraction in itself.

It is intended that the addresses be not given in the Disciples' meeting house, but in a public building, as an opera house, thus commanding civic attention as a church meeting could not do, and lifting the whole enterprise above the suspicion of sectarian aggrandizement.

The Disciples would, of course, meet all expenses. The admittance would be absolutely free and no collection taken.

This would take money. Men of the caliber and vision necessary to treat this great theme helpfully, could not be brought the necessary great distances without considerable outlay. But our churches are growing accustomed to great financial prodigality in revivalism.

And if the $500 or $1,000 (and often much more), spent annually by some congregations upon a revival meeting were used in procuring men like Robert E. Speer, Bishop Anderson, N. D. Hillis, George A. Gordon, Washington Gladden, Charles Hastings Dodd and C. F. Aked, (not to mention men of equal power in our own brotherhood) to open up to the whole community the subject of the unity of the Church of Christ more progress would result to the Kingdom of God than ten typical revival meetings in as many years would bring.

Such a plan as this in the greater and smaller cities of the land could be made immensely effective in stirring up the mind of the community to ask why, after all, there should continue to be the waste and friction and impotence of sectarian divisions.

Through such a spirit as would lie behind the literary propaganda proposed by President Ainslie, or the local annual lectureship proposed by our reader, or the general institute and deputation plan proposed by The Christian Century, the Disciples would be able to guarantee to Christendom the unsectarian character of their plea for union as the organization of a thousand new churches a year would not do.

Power Through a Noble Purpose

The desire for power is strong in the heart of every normal man. We wonder why the old political leaders fight so desperately to retain control of their parties and of the government. If we look within ourselves we shall cease to wonder. We do not like to be commanded where we have been accustomed to command. The theologian feels that religion itself is in danger when his system of doctrine is attacked. He is so much like the rest of us in his love of power that he unconsciously puts his system of thought in the place of God's will, and he regards men who reject his notions as rebels against the throne of heaven. Social and business tyrants are found in every community. The "ruling elder" and the bishop of Rome are kindred spirits.

There is in this universe a "power that makes for righteousness," and the best men permit this power to work through them. They have no ambition to rule over slaves. On the contrary, they burn with the desire to make slaves free men. The power they crave is the power to awaken in others the love of truth and goodness. If they seek office or wealth, it is for the purpose of rendering some sort of service to the world. The plain man whose simple goodness makes us ashamed of our meanness, is mightier than kings. Of all those who live for the good they can do, Jesus is the Master. In him God was manifest and goodness was perfected.

A purpose may be lacking nobility because it is fundamentally wrong, or because it is too narrow. The malicious man takes delight in the distress he causes another. His motive has nothing to commend it. The narrow minded man seeks a good but he tries to compel everybody else to put the emphasis where he puts it. If he is a temperance advocate, every evil under the sun has its origin in the saloon. He acquires a knowledge of the temperance issue that gives him power, but he becomes a nuisance because he ignores other interests that ought to command his respect. There is a mischievous narrowness displayed in attacks on things as they are. If the church neglects a part of its duty, we denounce it as an institution that has outlived its usefulness, forgetting all the good it has done, and is doing. For the sake of correcting some minor evil we vote out trusted servants of the church and of the state and put in their places men with no capacity for the larger matters of religion and government.

A noble purpose, then, must be comprehensive. Owing to our limited ability, everyone of us must have one thing to do and give our energies to the doing of that thing, but we cannot do it as it ought to be done unless we recognize its place in the general scheme of things. The teacher must give himself to teaching, but he must know that the instruction of the school does not constitute the whole of training. He becomes a pedant when he forgets that the school attitude is only one among many which should characterize the citizen. His success as a teacher depends upon his ability to make the school minister to the larger needs of humanity. The missionary secretary must be a specialist. He cannot get men and money for the preaching of the gospel in distant lands if he is ignorant of the needs of the non-Christian peoples and of the ability of the church to send the gospel to the last man on the earth. But let him not dare to intimate that the churches have not work of importance in their own towns and cities, that there is no work at home for the Christian physician, the Christian statesman, the Christian business man, and the Christian student of social questions. If he does this, he weakens his influence and does damage to the church.

There is a place in the comprehensive plan of the intelligent Christian for the contribution of the man of limited vision. The Christian gains power by using every force that counts for righteousness. He works by the side of all sorts and conditions of men. He lets the bad man help in a good cause if the bad man does not demand some sort of compromise as pay for his services. A good share of the world's work is being done by men of narrow outlook. It is the business of the church to find a place for such men. It needs them. They can add greatly to its power. They will create confusion if they are not wisely guided. The church needs in its leaders the wisdom of the politician and the purity of the saint that it may receive and direct aright the devotion of those who see only one aspect of the truth. The purpose of the church is big enough to attract all earnest workers. If one kind of service does not suit a man, call him to another.

Mid-week Service, June 1. Heb. 11:27, 10.

Their Younger Brother's Keepers

That college men have peculiar duties in the communities in which they reside is coming to be more and more recognized both by the communities and the college men themselves. There is a democracy in education today which contrasts with the aristocratic "uppishness" of the culture of earlier times. On the principle of noblesse oblige the college man is coming home from his training, bringing with him a desire to make a real contribution to the life of his community. The Young Men's Christian Association is making an appeal to this student conscience to persuade the thirty-five thousand college men who were in Bible classes the past year to make themselves their brothers' keepers, especially their younger brothers, during the four months of vacation. Mr. A. J. Elliott, western secretary of the student department of the Y. M. C. A., tells of the good work done by college men last summer, in the matter of kindling finer ideals of character in the lives of boys and young men with whom they come in contact. One student who was at the Geneva conference last year was ambitious to do something during the summer, but he had to work on the farm six miles from town. At first it seemed that there was nothing that he could do. He discovered, however, that there was no Sunday-school in the community. The use of a school house was secured, a Sunday-school was organized, and the college student was superintendent of the school and the teacher of the young men's class.

A second student who has been in a Bible class at college, went out on the plains for the summer, where his only associates were the cowboys. He was able to organize a Bible class of eleven of these rough and ready fellows who know no physical fear, but who are, nevertheless, susceptible to the higher claims of life. At the end of the summer the leader of this class was completely overwhelmed by the ovation that his class gave him.

A third student spent the summer with a surveying gang. It was a tough experience for him, but he had his nerve with him. Before two weeks had passed, the entire group had taken up together the study of the Book of John.

A fourth came home to his own town to spend the summer. He found that a group of boys in his own Sunday-school was without a teacher, and most of the once enthusiastic class were scattered and losing interest. He gathered the fellows together, organized a baseball team, arranged for the entire class to go on a camping outing together for four days, aroused their enthusiasm for studying the Word of God and, at the close of the summer, when he went back to college, left the most enthusiastic class in the entire school.

Here is a plain service which the college student may render and which, when the results of it are counted, will show no one to have been more greatly rewarded than the college man himself.

Laymen and Home Missions

The question has been raised again and again, Why does the Laymen's Missionary movement confine itself to Foreign missions? Why does it not include also Home Missions in its program? There is so much to be done in our own land before we are fairly entitled to be called a Christian nation! Here are our own native pagans, some thirty tribes and bands of whom have no Christian work of any kind among them. Here are the heathen from various parts of Asia and the unevangelized foreigners from other parts of the world. Here are the Spanish-Americans, our nearest foreign neighbors, and those who have recently come under our flag. Here are our own American pagans who threaten, especially in the great cities, the very life of Christian institutions. Here are the new communities, just opening up in the great west and northwest, which are destined to become radiating centers for either Christianity or irreligion. And here, ominous and dire, is the African population of America, many of whom are no farther removed from pagan ancestry than are some of our native Christians in foreign lands. Here at our very door is a big enough job to challenge the men of the churches to their most heroic and consecrated endeavor. Why should this network of evident duty be left out of the Laymen's program?

This question has been put to the executive committee of the Laymen's Movement. It was formulated in a fraternally conceived letter by a joint comm[illegible] of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ and the Home [illegible]s Council. The overture points out the needs of the Home land, a[illegible] recited above, and expresses the hope that the Laymen's polic[illegible]nted at Chicago may include not Foreign missions only, but a[illegible]anding features of missionary endeavor, and adds that the chief concern of Home mission leaders "in these days when all the currents of Christian thought and endeavor are flowing together, is that the Laymen's Movement shall not be, even in appearance, a force making for division."

To which a reply is made by the Laymen's Executive committee, signed by Mornay Williams, Vice-chairman, which seems at once convincing and pathetic. The committee shows that the Laymen's Movement goes as far in Home mission endeavor as it can. "Throughout the conventions thus far held, the Movement has laid special stress on the appointment of a missionary committee in the local church, which should see that all missionary interests, both home and foreign, are adequately provided for, and has also recommended that the weekly offering system be adopted for all missionary work. The Movement has sought and will continue to seek, in the future as in the past, to emphasize the claims and importance of the home work and urge that in each denomination and in each local church the whole missionary duty must be faced and adequate provision made for all the work that waits to be done both at home and abroad."

As the reason why the interdenominational movement cannot wisely change its basic principle of standing in an especial way for Foreign missions, the Committee frankly says that, "after conferring with various communions," it fear that "it is not possible at present to unite in coöperative Home mission work in the fields which you suggest all the Christian bodies which are now united in carrying forward the work abroad."

What more imperative putting of the duty of Christian unity could be asked for than is implied in this sad fact, so frankly expressed by these laymen? Their statement lays bare the seamy side of our Christianity—the seamless robe of Jesus now a patchwork of sects! God hasten the day when we can sit down together and plan to take America for Christ in the same unity of purpose as we are beginning to manifest in our campaign for taking China for Christ!

A well-known Disciple preacher remarked, after hearing Mr. Speer's address at the Laymen's Congress, "Union will be here before we are ourselves ready for it!" In this misgiving the Christian Century does not share. While there are some who call themselves Disciples, who are still sectarian and will never be ready for union until everybody "comes to us," we have faith that the great body of our people stand where they do because they are earnestly striving to practice Christian union. And as the movement toward the reunion of the divided church develops new problems, new aspects of our duty in the practice of union, we believe the Disciples will be ready to back their principles with unsectarian practice. The one supreme and undisputed command of Jesus is expressed, not in terms of authority, but of prayer. The Disciples have overheard the Master praying, and have gone forth from that sacred presence with his yearning, "that they all may be one," urging their souls with an inescapable imperative. They cannot be true to Him and continue the practice of those things that hinder his people from being one. Unless the voices of sectarian pride and dogmatism are more seductive than we imagine, there is no need to fear that when the various divisions of Christ's church come to the place where a united camp is to be pitched, the Disciples will not be found already there. This, in all humility, they have set their heart upon being: a living illustration of the united church of Christ. They do no claim that the united church will be just like the Disciples are now, for they are yet but students of the problem of unity. But they are the kind of students that strive to practice the truth they perceive. They expect new aspects of the problem to appear as the Church approaches its solution. New duties, therefore, will emerge. And the Disciples stand ready by the pledge of their fundamental principle to practice the new duties when they appear. After all our pleading for unity, anything less than the constant practice of it now would leave us in the great day of its consummation in a position of pitiable irony.

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ—how good that name sounds!—is not by any means a fiction, but an increasing reality. At a recent meeting of the executive committee held in New York, members were present from Chicago, Boston, Charlotte, N. C., Washington, and Philadelphia as well as from New York and vicinity. Among the important items of business transacted, hardly any was more significant than the appointment of two secretaries for two territorial districts—Eastern and Central. Rev. Hugh B. MacCauley, Presbyterian pastor of Trenton, N. J., was appointed secretary of the Eastern district, with headquarters at Washington, D. C. Rev. Charles E. Bacon, D. D., a Methodist pastor of Indianapolis, was appointed secretary of the Central district, with headquarters at Chicago. Rev. John T. Thomas, Jr., who was previously appointed secretary of the Western district, with headquarters at Denver, reported that the Federation idea was rooting itself in the cities of his territory in a most encouraging fashion. Various towns in Kansas and Nebraska, as well as Omaha, St. Joseph and Kansas City, have established local councils. In connection with the editorial note elsewhere regarding the difficulty of carrying on Home mission work on a united basis, the report of the committee on Home missions to the effect that a national policy of comity in Home mission fields was to be established "immediately" is most heartening.

We do not remember to have seen a more impressive program than that sent out announcing the "Fifth International Congress of Free Christianity and Religious Progress" to be held in Berlin, in August of this year. Great names from across the sea—Erdmann, Harnack, Troeltsch, Herrman, Eucken, Bousset, Montet (these are but a few of them)—are mingled with those of well-known thinkers from this side—Peabody, T. C. Hall, Hirsch, Slicer, Rauschenbusch (again only specimens)—in democratic simplicity. The great questions of Theology, History, Criticism, Progress, Unity, Sociology, Ethics and so forth, will be studied in great papers. No assent to any formal dogma or adhesion to any particular church, says the preface, is required for membership in the Congress. The object of the council is stated to be to open communication with those in all lands who are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty, and to increase fellowship and coöperation between them. Here is yet another great attraction for travelers this summer. What with the Edinburgh Conference on Missions, the Exposition in Brussels, the Passion Play at Oberammergau and the Disciples' Anglo-American Conference on Christian Union in London, there will hardly be anybody left in the land of the free this season !

The Ohio convention of Disciples is to be held in the Central Church, Toledo, May 31 to June 3. A program of especial interest is offered. I. J. Cahill, president of the convention, formerly pastor at Dayton, and now about to assume the office of state secretary, will deliver the presidential address on the evening of June 1. The various national missionary and benevolent organizations will be represented in addresses by A. L. Orcutt, I. N. McCash, L. G. Batman, S. J. Corey, and President M. L. Bates. President Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, will speak on "The Disciples' Unfinished Task." P. H. Welshimer, of Canton, will conduct a Sunday-school session to be addressed by R. A. Doan, of Nelsonville, and Clarence L. DePew, of Jacksonville, Ill. P. C. Macfarlane will preside at a Brotherhood banquet Friday evening, with a fine list of toasts at his call, leading up to a climax of two addresses by F. W. Burnham, of Springfield, Ill., and Arthur Holmes of the University of Pennsylvania. The opening sessions of the convention are devoted to the C. W. B. M., whose program is especially inviting. What will prove a feature of especial interest and helpfulness is the early morning Bible Study series, to be conducted by Professor E. I. Bosworth, of Oberlin College. Ohio Disciples have every reason for great expectations for their 1910 convention.

Not the least among the difficulties in the way of reform is difference of judgment among the reformers. If everybody who wanted a good thing done could agree with everybody else on the best method of getting it done, many of our battles would be already half-fought. The prohibition cause is an instance. Occasionally there is a truce between the third party Prohibitionists and the Anti-Saloon League, but most of the time these two movements, both working toward the same end, are working at cross purposes. The Prohibitionists had a state convention in Decatur, Ill., this month. And now a great convention of the Anti-Saloon League forces is called for Springfield, June 7. The Decatur convention inaugurated a movement for securing state-wide prohibition. The Anti-Saloon League looks with disfavor upon this attempt at this time and quotes President Dickey of Albion College, who advised the Michigan prohibitionists to proceed along the line of county option and thus work up to a place where state-wide prohibition could reasonably be expected to win. The Springfield convention of Anti-Saloon leaguers will inaugurate a campaign for securing from the legislature a county option law. The churches of Illinois are asked to send at least one delegate apiece.

Social Survey

By Alva W. Taylor

Sociological Function of the Church

Jesus came to establish the Kingdom of God. That Kingdom is a relationship of human beings wherein men are subject to the law of God's love and are brothers to one another, each considering the things of the other as his own. By his deeds and words Jesus set forth that Kingdom. He went about doing good, he exalted the lowly, he asked just judgment, fixed the Golden Rule as a key to social conduct, put the law in the heart instead of on statute books or in ceremonials, made it more blessed to give than to receive, reduced human rights to the level of universal democracy, with no class privileges, sought to make all nations one in a fraternal concord, abolished revenge in favor of "resist not evil," repealed the old religious law of divorce, and thus emancipated woman, made children the models for righteousness, and thus redeemed childhood to supreme worth, put all men on an equality, and thus released the slave from bondage, associated with the sinful and denounced the self-righteous, and thus made evangelism imperative, announced the law of compensation for earth's inequalities—in the Beatitudes—and thus gave hope to the poor and unfortunate, and placed on his disciples the mission of fulfilling his mission by doing to all men what he had done, filling up in their own bodies what lacked of his sufferings, that his vicarious love and service might be communicated to those whom we serve in his name.

The church was founded to carry on his work. It becomes the organized method of making disciples of him and bringing the Kingdom he established to fulfillment. So long as it remained his church, the gates of hell would not be able to prevail against it, for righteousness is at the divine heart of things, and with the eternal spirit cannot be overthrown. When it fails to do his work, it becomes like the contemporaneous religious leaders of his day—a savor of death.

The church has never altogether failed to perform her function. But she has never altogether performed it. In her darkest days she held the kernel of saving truth in the teachings regarding charity and the ministrations of humble believers and of the monks and nuns who never all or altogether forsook the service of the needy. As in all organizations men have ever put the means for the end and the organization, its laws, preferments, creeds, casuistries and rewards have supplanted the end for which it was created, i. e., bringing in the Kingdom of righteousness.

It is necessary, in order that the church shall fulfill her function as a socializing force, that she cling to the great fundamentals of Fatherhood and Brotherhood. To preach Christ is ever the golden way of accomplishing this, "teaching them to observe all things, whatsoever I have commanded you." With the fundamentals of personal righteousness as an unchanging foundation, the church is able to apply her gospel to changing conditions and the new problems that arise.

The question then arises—should the church go farther than the enunciation of these fundamentals? Dare she do more than create a good conscience toward all that is right? It is impossible for her to create a good conscience except as she create a good practice in regard to questions of right. It is of the very nature of our beings that we learn the dotrines by doing the will. Yet it cannot be denied that the practice of any organization is limited by the bounds of possible coördination between its varying factors, and that ideals always outrun the possibilities of practice in an assemblage. Thus the church cannot in an organized way rise too far above the level of its times. It must be a leaven, but it must be kept in the measure of meal. It can plead for justice, but it must be practical justice for which it unitedly acts, while its prophets go ahead crying for ideal justice. It cannot be doctrinaire and sail the clouds, even though there must ever be those leaders who hitch their wagons to the stars, and the people will perish if there be no vision. Jesus could not become an abolitionist, but Christianity could be so ordered that it abolished slavery. Neither can the church become socialist, though Christianity may some day bring something like socialism's dream of fraternity. But the church can plead the foremost of all established causes of justice and social righteousness, and its adherents can be ever establishing in the consciousness of the times, new causes of justice and right. The church cannot advocate the platform of any one party where problems are involved upon which good consciences may differ, but it can advocate non-partizan platforms upon which all consciences that are good may be brought to agree. It cannot fulfill its social function and listen to the plea of any class, whether it be, e. g., employer or employee, but it is bound to listen to the plea for justice whether uttered by either as the weaker party, and it must not allow the cry of the worker to go unanswered when he asks help to defeat a stronger hand in its selfish desire to rob him of the product of his toil, to secure legislation that will keep the children out of the mines and factories, to protect the dependents from the evils of intemperance, to guarantee by law that the houses of the poor shall be fit to live in, and, even more, it must advocate the just division of the product of toil even though it be unable to present a plan that will so divide it.

It is true that Christianity's first work is with the individual. But it is just as true that not all its work is with the individual. Some of it must be for him as a social being, dependent on the custom, law, and industrial processes of his time. The welfare of the individual is so interwoven with the social fabric that he cannot be extricated and treated for his ills without treating the conditions under which he lives. His soul's goods are so enmeshed in his worldly affairs that they cannot be rescued without saving his worldly environments. The process of making him a saint is so dependent upon making him a worthy citizen that his political and industrial citizenship and franchise must be vouchsafed to him or he cannot ordinarily become a saint. His salvation is so largely dependent upon his own efforts that if he be not so freed of bonds that he can work it out, he will never be able to claim it. To save men the church must save the world in which men are damned, and that means saving the conditions under which they live and the environments in which they are nourished, and furthermore, to save them it must make saviors of them. The church must be rooted in the great essentials of its creed, but its fruits must not be many creeds, but a saved society. The nourishing elements of its eternal truths must be transformed into the fruitage of lives of righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit.

A Telephone Message

By Marie J. Bois.

A man sat in a telephone booth. Weary, discouraged, and sore at heart, he rang for the familiar number of his home, and soon, over the wire, he recognized a well-known voice, that of his wife. Having failed in his business, he had left her a few months before to take a position as bookkeeper in a hotel. While he was there his little daughter fell sick with scarlet fever. Worrying over her, he was not able to concentrate his mind on his work, with the result that he lost his position. This was his telephone message to his wife. Her answer was: "Don't come home, look for something else."

What follows is so sad that I hardly know how to tell it. Goaded into despair, not knowing where to turn, he obeyed the mandate. He did not go home; he shot himself.

Having known the man personally, the sad story haunts my thoughts, teaching me to pray for those who are in danger of despair, and also for those who thus have gone, not knowing what they did, for I remember the dark hours when, helpless and hopeless, suicide seemed to my mind, weakened by suffering, the only way of escape.

Ah! believe me, neither at him nor at her would I cast a stone. Every time I pass before the house they used to live in, and that is every day, I think of them and pray for them; for him especially, for an intense pity fills my heart at the thought of the despair which must have filled that man's heart when his last hope had gone. May God in His infinite love have mercy upon his soul, and may those whom He has called together in holy wedlock ever remain in perfect love and peace together and live according to His laws, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Is not this still the prayer of our blessed Lord? Should it not be our cry for the poor souls in danger? Oh! Christians, are we praying for those who need our prayers? Or do we only think of ourselves and perhaps of our friends, when we lift up our hearts to Him in adoration?

"Do not seek to shatter the mirror which reflects your soul's lack of beauty; rather welcome the truth, and believe that, next to the knowledge of God, nothing is so precious as the knowledge of self. Without it you can scarce hope to reach to His knowledge." These are the "deeps which call one to another"; God's power and man's weakness. Let us cry out with St. Augustine: "Lord, teach me to know Thee, and to know myself"!—Living Church.

Among England's Great Preachers

BY ALBERT J. SAUNDERS

The famous Times newspaper of London has always maintained the policy of strong informing letters from its specially chosen correspondents from all the centers of world interest and activity. Many people who do not agree with the politics of the great paper still buy and read it regularly for its invaluable and first-hand information about the world's thought and movement. Some such ambition for international, social and religious information I presume is entertained by the editors of The Christian Century. Already important departments have been begun in, The Trend of Events, The Chicago page, English News; and on my leaving America for Australia one of the editors extracted a promise that I might supply some Australian news. I shall be very happy to do this, for the commonwealth of Australia, though one of the smallest and the last country to enter the sisterhood of nations, has something to contribute to the social, political and religious progress of our common humanity.

Before reaching Australia, however, I had three delightful weeks in old England and Scotland. One of my chief interests was a study of England's greatest preachers. And so while really trespassing in the field of our London correspondent—Leslie W. Morgan—yet, indeed at his suggestion, I will tell you some of my experiences and impressions among the great preachers of England, whose work and word are counting for much in the old world.

Alexander Whyte.

My first Sunday was spent in the delightful city of Edinburgh. That same day Robert E. Speer began a series of lectures on missions in connection with the Duff Missionary Lectureship. It will be recalled also that Edinburgh is the rallying place of the great world missionary convention next summer. My chief interest in Edinburgh on that Sunday was St. George's Church, the scene of the remarkable ministry of Dr. Alexander Whyte, and his colleague, Dr. John Kelman—the successor to Prof. Hugh Black of New York. Everybody seems to go to church in Scotland. The kirk is a mighty factor for righteousness in the national life, and the preacher who is really a leader counts for far more in Britain than in America.

It was a cold, wintry day, as was indeed each of the three Sundays. Yet the congregations everywhere were large, and we poor visitors were often fearful that we might not get in. The British have a splendid custom of handling crowds waiting for admission to any public place. As the people come they are marshalled as soldiers, four abreast in a long line, and when the doors are opened each one passes in quickly and orderly. Some system like this might well be initiated in American national conventions.

Dr. Alexander Whyte is a typical Scotch minister and scholar. He is, I believe, over seventy years of age, yet actively engaged as senior minister of a large city church, principal of New College, and always publishing books and articles and sermons. All the sermons I heard were read. Dr. Whyte has a delightful English style, rich and varied in historical and literary illustration. His Bible characters, Bunyan, Harvard and other worthies, and his expositions are known throughout the world for their deep insight into human nature and spiritual experience. His characteristic studies are along experimental and autobiographical lines. The morning I heard him he was beginning a series of such studies in the Roman letter, seeking to fathom the great soul of Paul from his letter to the Romans. I tell you British audiences expect, and they get, solid preaching of master thinkers. His sermon, while expository was nevertheless eminently practical, and the application to modern life and conditions was strong and impressive.

It was my great privilege to see and hear these leaders in what may be called their specialties. Each man has one original and distinct service to which he gives himself with special emphasis. It is his hobby. And in nearly every case the man regards that service as his best and most profitable contribution to the community. With R. J. Campbell it is his Thursday noon service; C. Silvester Horne has a popular Saturday night concert; G. Campbell Morgan delights in his great Friday night Bible class, while Alexander Whyte gives of his best to his unique Sunday evening men's class. Dr. Whyte's class meets in the main auditorium of the church immediately after the night service. Men, mostly young men, from all over Edinburgh attend these studies. A different study is taken every year. This winter the subject is, "Some Modern Puritans." One may judge of the importance of these lectures from the themes discussed, as, "Mr. Gladstone as a Christian Man, as a Christian Statesman, as an Original Author, as a Scholar and Critic, and as an Editor and Ambassador"; "John Keble, the Sweet Singer of our Israel and a True Saint, if this Generation has Seen One"; "The Wilberforce Family, Coleridge, Spurgeon, Chalmers, The Brothers Haldane," and others. The subject on the night of my attendance was, "The Brothers Mozley." The Doctor has a few scattered notes which he follows or disregards at will. He simply talks of men and books and movements of thought in a most interesting and informing way. He is so widely read and so full of his subject that his most commonplace talk is a rich intellectual feast. How privileged are the young men who can regularly wait upon such a scholar! These evening classes must have a great informing and uplifting influence upon the young manhood of the city.

J. H. Jowett.

The second Sunday found me in the great and important Midland center—Birmingham. Birmingham is not only a mighty commercial city, but it has also in its Hall of Fame such giants of influence as, Joseph Chamberlain, the great Dr. R. W. Dale, Sir Oliver Lodge, and, as many regard him, the greatest living English preacher—J. H. Jowett. Carr's Lane Congregational Church is a great generating house of social and spiritual forces. Mr. Jowett in his preaching fuses into a strong combination the two elements of deep spirituality and great intellectuality, both presented simply and yet delightfully original. As a social worker Mr. Jowett with Carr's Lane is one of the great forces of the city, so much so that on the occasion of the recent New York invitation to the Fifth Avenue Church the magistrates of Birmingham did a thing never before known, for they themselves begged Mr. Jowett to remain. In his own church there was a remarkable scene when he announced that he had declined the invitation to New York. The statement was received with loud applause, and many members of the church arose and started to sing the Doxology, which the organist tried in vain to lead. Mr. Jowett quietly but firmly checked the demonstration.

Mr. Jowett does not command the great hearing of C. H. Spurgeon. His ministry and message are very different. The Birmingham pastor is not strictly speaking a popular preacher. He is pre-eminently a teacher or prophet and inspirer. His language and style are beautiful—the result of long and hard effort. Nothing but the very best will satisfy this preacher. His morning text was: "He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet shall receive a prophet's reward." (Matt 10:41.) His thesis was: There are prophets, divinely inspired men. God speaks to and through these men. All are not prophets, but our work is to receive the prophet of God and his message. The preacher discussed, of course, how God speaks to his prophets, and how we are to distinguish between the varying voices. The great text is the moral one. Life, more abundant and perfect life, must be the ideal of progress. It was a noble and eloquent message, so needed everywhere today. The evening sermon was equally strong and eloquent from Luke 11:34. J. H. Jowett is a happy combination of eloquence, learning, simplicity, originality, deep spirituality and modesty. His fourteen years in Birmingham are really preparatory to a national, and one might almost say, a world ministry. He is a man with a vision, a prophet, and may God richly bless him that he may continue to minister to others.

London! How can one adequately write of a Sunday in London? While in London I had the privilege of hearing Dr. John Clifford, F. B. Meyer, C. Silvester Horne, Canon Scott Holland; but my chief interest centered around two men—G. Campbell Morgan of Westminister Chapel, and R. J. Campbell of the City Temple.

G. Campbell Morgan.

Dr. Morgan is the recognized champion of orthodox Christianity in London, if not in England. He is very popular, and preaches and lectures somewhere aside from his Westminster work almost every week. Five years ago Westminster Chapel was practically dead, but with the settlement of Campbell Morgan great progress was made, and now his chapel is one of the busiest and most successful religious centers in all England. He has a captivating personality, ready and pleasing address, and a great capacity for work. He is inclined to be domineering and dogmatic, and refuses fellowship to those who disagree with him theologically. Nevertheless Dr. Morgan is a great force for righteousness. His distinctive ministry is Bible teaching and interpretation. He himself is an indefatigable Bible student, and his ministry is almost wholly scripture exposition. Campbell Morgan's ambition in going to Westminster was to establish a great Bible study center, and he has done it. There assembles in the large and beautiful church every Friday night a large class of fifteen hundred people from all parts of London. It is an unique service, deeply spiritual, very practical, and on such occasions Dr. Morgan is seen and heard at his best. His expositions are simple and popular. He accepts some and strongly rejects others of the higher critical conclusions. His one unfailing panacea for all the indifference to religious things is Bible knowledge. It was my privilege to attend a conference of Bible teachers convened by Dr. Morgan to affect some permanent organization and to publish a magazine for Bible teachers. It was a delightful conference, very spiritual and helpful. Everything went well until the discussion of a basis of fellowship was introduced, then there was confusion. In that little conference there was liberal and conservative. The conservative tried to limit and bind the spirit of free men, but there were those who objected, and preferred freedom and tolerance to uniformity. It was an interesting yet pathetic session. How utterly futile to expect union in this twentieth century on opinions and interpretations and dogmas!

Campbell Morgan is greatly beloved by his people. His rejection of the recent New York call gave general satisfaction. He is ambitious for a national Bible study campaign with Westminster Chapel as its center. His chief literary interest is The Analyzed Bible, which will comprise forty volumes. To these manifold labors Mr. Morgan is giving himself with abandon.

R. J. Campbell.

The City Temple is the center of another equally unique propaganda. Its minister, R. J. Campbell, is the recognized apostle of higher criticism in England. Mr. Campbell is an able, eloquent and popular preacher. He has not the grace and style of Jowett, nor the fire of Morgan; but there is a call to manhood and service, a deep spirituality, a satisfying reasonableness, and a distinct modern note in Mr. Campbell's preaching, which are having a peculiar influence upon London Christianity. It was my great pleasure to attend two services in the City Temple. The Thursday noon meeting is the continuation of Dr. Parker's original idea. In it R. J. Campbell devotes himself to the preaching of Christianity from the modern point of vieww. It is an inspiring sight to see those earnest business men being won back to a vital Christian life by this new prophet of religion. Mr. Campbell sees in this new interpretation the only hope of the church in these modern days. And so he and his colleagues are giving themselves to an organized propaganda. A society called the Progressive League has been initiated. The Christian Commonwealth is their official organ. There is a call for preachers and social workers. And altogether the new movement is showing much life and is having some success. Mr. Campbell's subject was The Eternal Man. "Ye are from beneath, I am from above: Ye are from this world, I am not of this world." (John 8:23.) One has time only for a few brief extracts from this remarkable sermon. "This book belonged to a school which made free use of the narrative method to convey spiritual truth. What is here put into the mouth of Jesus is what the writer believed about Jesus. . . . The passage as it stands represents what the primitive Christian church had come to feel in reference to the person of their Lord, not what he himself declared. . . . As I have more than once affirmed, all that Christian faith has ever asserted concerning the divine dignity of Jesus is true, it must be true, or else the universe is not a moral order. . . . I wish one could get people to see this. . . . You have not explained Jesus when you have stripped him of superhuman attributes and made him a man among men, and I for one have never taught any such thing. Throne him as high as ever you can, and you will not exaggerate as to what he was and is. All that Catholic or Protestant devotion has ever felt concerning our Lord and Master may be less than the truth, it cannot be more." There is a difference between Jesus and his disciples, but it is not in nature, it is in degree of moral and religious perfection. "What men love and reverence in Jesus is just that which they feel to be akin to themselves, the beauty of nature and deed which, however ideal, however exalted, has not thereby ceased to be human. . . . The Jesus who speaks here in my text is the Christ who speaks in every soul, and in every soul this same declaration is continually being made. . . . The inner man, the deeper man, the universal man, the spiritual man, can never be satisfied to be what pertains only to the flesh and the world of sense; he knows these for what they are and himself for what he is; they are from beneath and he from above. . . . This earth man is not the real man, this selfish, unlovely you is not the real you. The real you is eternal, the express image of the Father, integral to the divine being, and one day to be crowned with the glory which it possessed in him before the world was. What men saw in Jesus during his brief earthly life is what you came from and to which you shall return in fellowship with him. You do not know it; you cannot realize it; but so it is. You are here an exile from home, a pilgrim and a stranger in a foreign land. You are here to prove your soul, to bring out the truth you are; and it is to this end that you have been imprisoned in the flesh and are having to take your part in the age-long campaign of humanity against the things which are not itself. The real you is not the sinning, suffering, earth-bound man, but the man who cries out against the degrading bondage and claims his birthright in the life eternal." And thus this sermon and modern message goes on. It is not by his learning, nor eloquence, nor personality, nor spirituality, though these are certainly contributing elements, that Mr. Campbell draws and holds and influences the vast congregations at the City Temple. It is his message. He is meeting a conscious need. He strives to present a reasonable Christianity. It is life and character not doctrine that counts. And men are flocking to him.

One is greatly impressed by the spirit of reverence which pervades a British church service. The anxious attention, the use of Bibles and the silent prayer after the benediction are evidences of genuine worship. Then it is hopeful to see the real place that the church and church leaders hold in the life of the community, city and nation. The foremost preachers are national figures, and their word and influence are determinative to great numbers of people. British preaching for the most part is expository. Bible incidents and precepts are interpreted to meet modern conditions. The call to social service is being answered in the great institutional churches. And so the divine work of reformation by preacher and people, church and institution goes on.

Through the Eyes of a Missionary

What the Laymen's Uprising Looks Like to One from the Firing Line

BY ARTHUR PAUL WAKEFIELD, M. D.
Missionary to China.

I have been asked to give my impressions of the work being accomplished by the Laymen's Movement. A brave dreamer is needed, but I shall strive to be conservative.

But how can one be conservative? 4000 men from every state in the union, paying $5.00 for admission to hear mission addresses for four days!

Could you have looked into those faces you would have seen a glow divine—a purpose that set jaws firm—a love and devotion that know no fear and fear no sacrifice. And I am asked to tell you what these men will do!

One thing they will do—they will love each other as never before. As I looked out into those faces I gained an inspiration that will never leave me. I do not know what denominations they belonged to, and thank God, I did not care. I saw them longing for the same things I longed for, singing and praying with terrible earnestness to the God I love. Why should I care how they were called?

I vowed then that I would not crawl down into a well of denominational pride, and, looking into the sky, cry out that all light is mine. I shall go to the mountain top, where I can see the heights whereon others stand. Their heroes shall be my heroes. Those that have inspired them shall inspire me. Their vision shall be mine—their God my God. They shall be my brothers; we shall be one people.

Oh, the feeling of strength and ability to do things we gained at that Congress! Men who were there and felt the power of that great meeting will go out with a great hunger that will never be satisfied till we are one people. Men in that hunger will work and pray as never before for unity, knowing that "Christ-like Christians cannot stay apart."

You may say this is mere enthusiasm—an effervescence—and ask my reasons for my belief. Very well—the day for hard and fast theological seminaries for turning out iron-clad sectarian preachers has gone. All theological schools of any note really belong to all peoples. We are going to the fountains together. Sectarian schools and teachers have lost their power. Business men, with no care for denominational glory, have grown interested in the practical work of the church and are giving themselves to the service of the church as never before. With them mere opinion has no power. They will not stand for foolish pride—waste of energy in jealous competition. The weeds and dust of bigotry and arrogance are thrown aside, and the leader can only lead who has breadth of vision and sees the world as God himself sees it—a thing for conquest. To our Christian business man "all waste is disloyalty to the church—all friction is disloyalty to Christ."

But you suggest I am putting a great deal of faith in the business man! Indeed I am. I have faith in him. If the pews could vote on the question today we would have but one Protestant Church in the United States tomorrow!

The narrow religious press, the frozen-faced preacher and teacher have held back about as long as they can. The broad-minded men of the church will not be nagged much longer. For the sake of sweet peace they have waited only to be sneered at and insulted. Patience will die one day, and the deluge will come. And the next day they will wonder why it was they waited so long!

I have met many pastors in the past year, faced many congregations. I know the pulse of pastor and people. I tell you it is getting feverish and impatient.

In passing it is well to note that this is not solely a foreign mission movement. Every man in that Congress believed in Home Missions. The Home boards can have the support of their people as never before if they will do a practical Christian work. However, Home Missions will go to its death if Home Missions means denominational competition on the home field! Foreign boards parcel out their fields and work in unity. So working they will evangelize the world. They have come to love each other and respect each other's work. Furthermore they have gained the respect and support of the business men of the church because they have mixed brains with charity in their work. The Home forces will be compelled to do the same.

When Bishop Anderson will stand before 4,000 representative men and declare we are wasting more money through over-lapping, through dove-tailing, through rivalries than would evangelize a whole race in a single generation," declaring this to be "neither wise, statesmanlike, nor Christian," when Bishop Anderson will make such a flat statement, and have 4,000 men cheer and thunder in applause, it is well we should listen, and heed. Union in home work is demanded. Men will never support home work until such criticism is done away with and impossible. Then I believe we will without trouble conquer America for Christ! We cannot till then.

I may seem to be putting a great deal of responsibility upon the layman! But this is the Layman's Movement! And I have found successful pastors hard to separate from their laymen. The day of long-faced, long-coated "orthodoxy" in the pulpit is gone. It is the day of the layman and the tide is just beginning to come in. The church is making an appeal that attracts men, an appeal to the manhood and courage of men. A programme is before the people that is worthy the brain and brawn of men. The old evangelism where the men were almost dragged from their seats, where the invitation was given by the hour and telegrams announced "so many hundreds converted in so many days" have happily about come to a close. Such is not becoming in the service of the King!

But nowadays men are challenged to a life of service and sacrifice that is more attractive than all hysterical pleading. A manly appeal, a new evangelism, a new Christian ideal is here! And after all, is that not the greatest hope of our day? New ideals do not come by chance. They are of divine origin. So, men today want pastors who will make the church a great, living, moving thing, doing something worthy of the King. Great wealthy business men have come to see the joy that comes with Christian service. They are giving and glorying that they may give. They are boldly declaring that the church knows no Christian men other than those who are giving utterly their lives and means to the services of the church.

There is no compromise, no credit system, no serving two masters in their view of the Church of God! Fearlessly they lay down the law, "You can give without loving, but you cannot love without giving." They call men to prove their Christian balance sheet by God's law of where your treasure is there is your heart. There is no escaping our business men! "Ten per cent under law becomes no less under love."

But you say this is such a low plane! Not at all. A man who has once tasted the joy of service and sacrifice knows that never before did he know what Christianity was. Never before had he had fellowship with Christ! He joys in his ability to serve, prays he may give more, for with service comes love. The service of the King awakens love divine, joy immeasurable, through fellowship with Christ.

And this "Spirit" is the spirit that glows in the very heart of the Laymen's Movement. It is the vital thing. It is the life of this great movement. It is drawing men and leading them as a gleam. The light that glowed in the hearts of Peter and Paul, and Christ, is born anew. A great joy is thrilling men's hearts and is giving a vision that will conquer the world!

Something More

Second Communication to the Brotherhood

BY PETER AINSLIE

President American Missionary Society.

Some months ago, in an article under the caption "Some Things To Be Done," I took the liberty of calling attention to the following seven points: (1) A definite step towards giving wider publicity to the Disciples' proposition for union; (2) the advisability of a delegated convention; (3) more business and fewer addresses at the convention; (4) changing of the time of the annual convention from October to the spring or summer; (5) more cordial co-operation with all believers; (6) the necessity of the Disciples being a more devotional people, especially in the choice of their literature and public worship; (7) a conference at Topeka during the convention of 50 or 60 of our brethren regarding these subjects.

Without saying more than simply naming these points, I am led to emphasize numbers 1 and 2 and at the outset I beg to say that number 2 is not more important than number 1, although to many it has appeared so.

If I have read conditions correctly, and I believe that I have, the Disciples are drifting from those principles that gave them their existence and this is not infrequent in the history of movements. One hundred years make great changes. All Protestant denominations drifted from their original principles in those periods of their various histories. Likewise, those movements in the Roman Catholic Church, such as the Franciscan and Dominican, although started in the holy motives of unworldliness and zeal, repeated that same history, so that the Franciscans became lazy mendicants and the Dominicans became rabid inquisitors. Shall the rightfully broad and brotherly plea of the Disciples crystallize into sectarianism as other similar movements have done? is the most vital question today among us.

In the opening of our second century, that which overshadows every other issue whether we want it to do so or not, is a re-emphasis or re-statement of the Disciples' proposition for Christian union, not once, or occasionally, but continually. If there was an occasion for the origin of such a movement 100 years ago, when few believed in its principles, what ought the Disciples not do now, when millions in various religious bodies are seeing the necessity for union?

More important than the endowment of a college, more important than any single institution of any kind among us and equally important with our Foreign Missionary work and our Home Missionary work, is the establishing of a Board or Society, whose sole business shall be to disseminate information to all bodies of believers, for the union of Christendom; send out books, tracts and periodicals; issue a monthly magazine, not simply setting forth our position, but allowing persons of other religious bodies who do not see all things as we do, but who see the necessity for union, to speak their convictions, making the magazine a clearing house of thought on Christian union and holding at the same time kindly but firmly and brotherly to those great principles of brotherhood that are so clear on the pages of Scripture.

It has been said that this will cost something. Of course it will, and if it did not it would not only be unworthy of us, but it would have no place in Christianity. Our numerical growth in the last century and our present wealth have given us a position for service, while a kindly feeling towards Christian union among all believers has given us an opportunity for that service, which if not used, and used in proportion to our numbers and wealth, will make our failure more despised than that of other movements which have been started for the common good.

Our own literature is largely for our own people and it has little circulation beyond our borders; likewise our evangelists and ministers are dealing largely with our own people and persons luke-warm in their denominational faith and others unidentified with any religious body. I say that this is largely—not entirely the case—and I do not mention this to underestimate the importance of this work, but I do mention this to say that we have a message distinctively for the believers in all religious bodies and we have no definite program for making it known to them. Has not the time come when there should be established such a program and on such a large scale as shall be worthy of not only the toils of the last 100 years, but of the Christ, whose we are and whom we serve? Will the Topeka Convention do anything towards the consummation of this present duty?

Regarding number 2, which refers to a delegated convention, it is known that the Constitution of the American Christian Missionary Society provides for such a convention as follows: "Its membership shall consist of members of the Church of Christ as follows: (a) Life directors qualified by the payment of $500 each in not more than five annual installments. (b) Life members, by the payment of $100, each in not more than five annual installments. (c) Annual members by the payment of $10 each. (d) Delegates from churches. Each Church of Christ is entitled to one delegate and one additional delegate for each 100 members beyond the first 100 and up to 500. No church is entitled to more than five delegates. (e) Presidents and corresponding secretaries of all state and provincial missionary societies. (f) Missionary societies, churches, Sunday-schools and other organizations may bestow directorships and memberships on the above conditions. (g) Those persons who have become life members or life directors of this Society by the payment of other sums than those mentioned in this Constitution are to enjoy and exercise all the rights conferred upon them under the former Constitution of this Society."

This being that part of the Constitution of the American Christian Missionary Society which has to do with covention membership, it is eminently proper that our Topeka Convention should be organized on this basis. Then it can be discussed and there decided on the floor of the convention and under the Constitution whether the membership in the future shall be as the present Constitution prescribes, or whether the Constitution shall be revised on some other basis of membership, or whether there shall be any membership at all. It is difficult to see how the Topeka Convention could be organized on any other basis than that which conforms fully to the present Constitution.

The life directors, life members, annual members and presidents and corresponding secretaries and all state and provincial missionary societies are already qualified for membership and, if it is not improper to suggest, it would be well for the churches now to begin selecting their delegates, which should be men if possible, bearing such credentials as those in charge of the department shall deem necessary. Whether church delegations shall remain as permanent or auxiliary societies of the American Christian Missionary Society in the various churches, something after the order of the C. W. B. M. be substituted and which has many features of excellence, is a matter for our brethren to decide. There is one advantage in such a plan of organization and that is, these auxiliaries in the various churches would be powerful in disseminating missionary intelligence, as the auxiliaries of the C. W. B. M. have done among the women. Whatever we do, let us not forget that the most important issue before us is the making known of the New Testament plea of union to the whole Christian world.

It is hoped that our papers will give the freest discussion to these topics from all sides before the convention convenes, rather than after it has adjourned, so that a definite sentiment may have been created before the convention meets.

The Regeneration of King Kelly

BY HOWARD R. VAN AUKEN

Author of Captain Pat Kelly's Religion.

The wind shrieked; the breakers crashed, and the tempest howled its fury, while the smugglers in the old deserted church, refugees from the hurricane, talked vile language, uttered huge oaths and drank large potations of fiery aquadiente.

"Shiver me," said Captain Pembroke Behtel, "but it's a 'igh old time the winds a 'avin houtside this day, and hit's mighty glad Hi am we're 'ere. No revenoo cutters haround that reef for a few days, and we kin git out o' 'ere easy and run across and land off Punta Rassa. Wha's at?"

The noise and glare of a rocket were faintly borne to their keen senses.

"Say," said Sam Pilot, "that's a boat hout on the reef. Hi reckon we could put out the yawl an' git 'em, but that'll mean witnesses, court house, jail an' a chain gang. Not for mine! I don't want no killin' on my 'ands, but Hi don't want no chain gang business neither. Third offense fer me. I just move we don't know nothin' about 'em."

A grunt of general approval followed. Several more rockets were fired. This appeal from the wrecking boat was so eloquent to them—for these citizens of the sea understood better than you or I could just what it meant—that uneasiness began to be vividly written on several faces despite Sam Pilot's speech. They were criminals but they were hardy sailors, and the instinct of risking life to help another seaman fighting against odds, was strong within them.

Captain Pembroke buttoned his oil skins closely about him. "Hi guess Hi'll go hout and see wha's up. Hi'll come back again pretty soon. I don't guess them fellers kin git off hunless us 'elp 'em, and that won't be very 'ard in the lee of the reef." He passed on out.

"As I was a-sayin'," said big Jim Sanders, taking a swallow of aquadiente, "when Cap'n Bubber Smart was one of us, 'e was a dandy 'e was. Once when we 'ah a cargo on and the revenoos got after us, we slipped around Dore Key and sunk our boat and swum ashore. Hit was funny to watch 'em when they got around. There wan't no boat hin sight and there wan't no way for hit to git hout o' sight. They just palavered and talked and we watched 'em from the shore. I don't guess them revenoos got over wonderin' yit. But he got ketched once and they soaked him pretty 'ard. It sot him to meditatin', an' 'e comes to me after 'is sentence and says, "Jim, I'm quittin'; Josh Curry has gi'n me his ship an' Hi'm in fer honest work." 'E wuz a corkin' sailor, but don't 'e make 'is crew step lively tho'! 'e can break the Ten Commandments hevery time 'e speaks to one of 'em. 'E, its the brown jug considerable, but not one drop does 'e give 'is crew. An' if any one of im bats a heye at 'im! Say, but 'e kin lick hanything except the devil—and perhaps King Kelly."

"Yes," drawled another, "an' King Kelly shipped with 'im last voyage. Said 'e done hit to git away from the booze. Got second mates berth. Say, Hi'd like to see them two about the third day hout!"

"Boys! Boys! Boys! quick! Into yer skins! Hit's Cap'n Bubber Smart's ship! 'e was one of us once! Come on!"

There was no hesitancy now.

Every one sprang to his feet. Here was an old friend in peril. Every man would have gone into the jaws of death to attempt to save his life. Out from the shaking building, out into the howling storm, out under the bending trees, and soon the stout yawl boat out on the storm lashed sea, oared by six stalwart, expert seamen, was driving her nose steadily toward the reef where the wreck was piled high and men were clinging to her decks.

It was an easy task for these experts, this task of rescue. The reef and the boat broke the force of the sea. Two trips were made. No words were uttered until all hands were housed together. Then Captain Pembroke spoke:

"Where's Cap'n Bubber?"

King Kelly, the last man from the ship answered, "Gone 'ome."

"Gone 'ome!"

"Yes, to 'eaven. 'e died a Christian."

"Died a Christian! Say, King, let me feel o' yer 'ead. Didn't ye get a wallop on hit? Yer brain wobbles sure. Died a Christian!"

"No, I ain't got 'urt an' my brain don't wobble. 'e died a Christian an' died tryin' to save the cook's flunkey."

"Say, it'd take a Christian to die fer a cook's flunkey," muttered Sam Pilot.

"The cook's flunkey was hout on deck and a leanin' over the rail careless like an' falls overboard. He couldn't swim none an' Cap'n Bubber went overboard after him. I'll tell you the rest after supper. We are all hungry an' hits a long story. But first an' foremost you cart that demijohn of aquadiente houtside. This was once the Lord's house. Nobody holds church here no more but once it was dedicated to God."

As they gathered together to eat, Cap'n Pembroke timidly said, "King, I guess you'd better bless the food." And the head of every smuggler bowed in respect as King Kelly, who had formerly been associated in their minds as one of their own kind, only worse, asked in friendly terms the blessing of One whom they sometimes feared, sometimes derided, always shunned and never understood.

The storm roared on, and the little old church on Key Largo harbored these men as they ate. No such sight was ever seen there before. The cook had brought his dishes, food and charcoal stove from his galley. A few years before and the pine apple fields stretched out, dotted here and there by the orange, banana, alligator, pear and sapadillo trees. While to add beauty to the scene an occasional group of palms lifted their lordly heads above all others, and when the wind blew waved their twenty foot leaves until their fronds resembled the moving tentacles of a giant octopus. But a few years before came the great hurricane, strewing the shores with wreckage and leaving an occasional body to whiten in the sand. The same storm worked its havoc among the homes of the farmers, leaving intact only the little church protected by a grove of palmettos. The soil too was wearing out and new land cost nothing, so the farmers went elsewhere. The harbor here made by a long sand-bar gave refuge to the boat and the church, protection to these smugglers and those whom they had rescued from the sea.

The meal was eaten in an unusual silence. These smugglers would have welcomed the companionship of King Kelley a year ago as a boon to their company. He was a capital story-teller and would have told them how he fought with naked knives against three Mexicans, or how he had "cleaned the whole house at a Cuban dance in Gujanabacoa, or how he had taken two "bad niggers" and handed them over to the police. But here was a new King Kelley, one they did not understand. What had wrought the change? He had said that their old companion, as bad a reprobate as any of them, had died a Christian. Maybe King too "had the marks on him." He had a certain dignity now which changed his whole bearing. What did he mean by ordering the aquadiente out and talking about this being the Lord's house? Yes, King must have turned Christian. Well, his story would come soon and that might explain it.

These men knew something about religion too. In their native town of Key West they frequently went to church. They knew nothing of creeds or church polity; but when there came a minister who told them simply, plainly and forcefully, about a God who loved them no matter how much they sinned, about a Man who died to teach them that God was love and also taught them that the highest, noblest thing was to help one another, they went often to hear him. There was the little old man with the fiery temper who had declaimed that those people who did not accept the vicarious atonement, would be lost in hell forever. They did not know what vicarious atonement meant. To them it seemed unfair. They never went back again. There was the crippled evangelist, a meandering theological quack with religiosity sticking out of every expression of his face, who was

Our Readers' Opinions

Beginning of Baptism

Is it true that, in the Christian Church, "baptism was the taking over of the most significant rite of the Jewish ritual"? This is affirmed in the Biblical Problems column of the Century and denied here, on the ground that "the facts are fatal to this view," as they are stated in the holy scriptures. In the Levitical ritual we find the washing with water of the whole person in the consecration of priests and in the purification of unclean persons in their separation from their filthiness. The mode of washing is not prescribed but may be by immersion in water or otherwise. It must be a complete ablution. These washings were typical of the full cleansing of the soul from sin by Jesus Christ.

This is "the doctrine of baptisms" alluded to in Hebrews 6:2, and called "divers washings" in Hebrews 9:10, in both of which passages, there is the word baptismos, as also in Mark 7:8,—a form of the word different from that used for the Christian ordinance, viz., baptisma. They are not interchanged either in form or use. The washings of the Jewish ritual were self-washings, and in later usage, self-immersions in water, "for the putting away of the filth of the flesh" as Peter expressed it; the baptism of the new institution is the seeking of a good conscience toward God "through the sanctification of the spirit unto obedience and the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ," as also Peter phrases it. These typical illustrations doubtless, disposed the Jewish mind to more readily accept the ministry of the fore-messenger of Christ.

"The law and the prophets were until John," and Olshausen is correct, beyond the possibility of fair contradiction, in saying "a lustration performed on the proselyte by another did not take place before the baptism of John."

Smith's Bible dictionary says: "There is no direct evidence of such practice in use previous to the destruction of Jerusalem." "The negative argument drawn from the silence of the Old Testament, of the Apocrypha, of Philo and of Josephus, is almost decisive against the belief that there was as much importance attached to it as we find in the Talmudists."

The authorities cited by Professor Willett do not reach the point in issue and so fail to justify his repeated assertion. The open-mindedness so much emphasized in modern thought, is not exhibited in a premised opinion that "it is no part of a spiritual religion to coin new forms of ritual." This is sheer assumption without warrant and a presumption of spiritual insight superior to that afforded by scriptural statements. It makes a preconceived notion of a spiritual religion a test of Christ's teaching, either by example or precept, and rejects what does not accord with such preconception. This is not a fair attitude in which to come to any subject.

It is the vicious method of Prof. H. C. Garvin in his book, entitled What the Bible Teaches, in which he rejects baptism and the Lord's Supper and everything else that does not suit his notion of what the Bible should teach.

Some two years ago, a Chicago professor and pastor of one of our churches, said: "It is growing clearer, with a fuller knowledge of the New Testament and of the mind of Christ that his religion is inner and spiritual. There is increasing doubt whether he ever commanded baptism or intended it as an indispensable ordinance any more than he did feet-washing."

This statement neither indicates clear thinking, spiritual discernment nor a reverent attitude toward the teachings of the Great Teacher. It boldly assumes "a fuller knowledge of the New Testament" than has been revealed by the Holy Spirit through the apostles.

This is the precise ground on which George Fox and his Quaker friends reject all outward forms in religion. But in fact, the most spiritual religion conceivable is that which expresses itself in the complete submergence of the human will into the will of God in the obedience of faith to all forms given by him in whom we believe and in consistently following him by loving service in all the requirements of the kingdom of Christ. A want of spiritual insight is evinced in despising or belittling divine appointments which leads to rejection of the Christ and the crowning in the heart of any whim that one may conceive and exalt in his own fancy.

What, then, are the facts clearly stated in the gospels concerning the beginning of baptism?

In the first chapter of John's gospel we find that "there was a man sent from God whose name was John." This man was "sent to baptize in water," that the One "preferred before him should be made manifest to Israel." He was also instructed as to his identification.

With this call, commission and instruction John became "a voice" in the wilderness that startled the slumbering faith of Israel into activity and highest expectancy. So "there went out to him Jerusalem and all Judea and all the region round about Jordan, confessing their sins." In Mark's gospel this is called "the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God."

Beyond a doubt, it was the beginning of baptism administered by a God-sent man to a penitent believer, and that only is Christian baptism. The fact that Christ himself came to such a man to be baptized of him, that no part of righteousness might be left unfulfilled by him, lifts it above the mere ritual and makes it a part of spiritual religion that awakens a consciousness of loyalty to God in the soul that brings peace and joy. In it Jesus was recognized as the well beloved Son of God and this fact should command the respect of all friends of Christ as manifesting a spiritual side in the obedience of faith. Jesus did not commend the putting of new wine into old bottles nor did he hesitate to "coin a ritual" suited to the spirit of the new religion which he gave the world and that "functions serviceably" to the needs of mankind everywhere and for all time.

W. L. HAYDEN.

[It would seem, at first glance, that the religion of Israel should have "coined its own" forms of service independently of the earlier faiths, and that Christianity should have avoided the use of forms which were already familiar in Judaism. Yet neither of these claims, so desirable from the standpoint of apologetics is warranted by the facts. The religious teachers of Israel took the forms that were on hand, as inheritances or as the practice of other peoples and informed them with a new meaning and value. Jesus and the apostles did precisely the same thing with the few forms they used. To deny this and assert the originality of Christianity in the matter of ritual was once thought to be necessary, as the works cited by Mr. Hayden show, and as he appears to think. The views of the recent authorities, who are interested only in the facts and not in any theory as to what the facts ought to have been, have been given already.—EDITORS.]

"An Incorrect Classification"

Editors the Christian Century: You ask me to state "what possible connection the doctrine of immersion can have with the principle . . . of spirituality in religion." I would say that that cannection is affirmed more confidently by the Christian consciousness than any other fact about immersion. On my shelves are two little books by Baptist ministers in London: Mr. Alfred Phillips, in his "What Baptists Stand For," devotes his third chapter to an elucidation of Romans 6:1-4. He leaves his readers in no doubt that there is a very real connection, and that that connection has strongly influenced Baptists in their adherence to the practice of immersion. Mr. F. A. Jones, in his "The Gospel in Baptism," shows that the New Testament doctrine of faith and repentance are embodied in the ordinance as practised by the Baptists, whereas affusion and other substitutes for immersion are devoid of that spritual significance and hence valueless. Doubtless the early Baptists practiced immersion because it seemed to them to be the scriptural mode, but that fact alone does not account for their unflinching adherence to the practice through centuries of misrepresentation and persecution. The truth they were ready to lay down their lives for, and did lay down their lives for, was the truth that Christ's kingdom on earth is a spiritual kingdom, and they remained loyal to the New Testament baptism because it seemed to them to harmonize with that conception of the kingdom, and was a vehicle of spiritual truth as other forms of the ordinance were not. Much more might be said, but this is sufficient.

The one thing, however, which I have sought to emphasize in my previous letter, and do not wish us to lose sight of now, is that it is not in accord with fact to say of the Baptists today that they are a portion of the Church of Christ organized around the dogma that "Christ commanded and the apostles practiced immersion for baptism." That never has been true of the Baptists; they themselves indignantly repudiate it, and we, who have suffered so much from the kind offices of our friends in seeking to define our position for us, cannot be guilty of the same folly.

Your last sentence is somewhat irrelevant: I am not seeking to tie the Disciples up to the immersion dogma or any other dogma. If I know it, I am not on the road to yesterday. Faithfully yours, Delighted!

Mr. C. C. Morrison, Editor: I wish to say that the children are simply delighted with the Bethany Graded Lessons. The pictures that came with my quarterly I passepartout and these we have hanging in our class corner. The stories are most beautifully told, and teach the purest lessons of any children's series I have ever seen. They aim to teach the child to know our God as one of love who protects and rewards those who obey. The children can tell the story of every picture for the quarter and recite the memory verses for them.

In a word I recommend them to any school that wishes the best lessons published.

A SERIAL STORY

Donald Graeme

CHAPTER THREE.

Dawning Hope.

She heard the old grandfather clock in the lobby strike twelve, one, two, and yet sleep came not with her cool fingers to touch her aching brow or close her burning eyes. Sleep comes easily enough to most girls of nineteen, no matter how cruelly sorrow may have touched their hearts. But Jeanie Graeme was no ordinary girl, and the sorrow that had fallen upon her was no ordinary sorrow. Had death come to her only brother, and she had seen him laid in the shelter of the grave, she would have mourned deeply but serenely, with the strength of hope in her heart and its holy light on her young face. But Donald, steeped in crime and in danger of public disgrace was a grief of a different kind. Of all trouble, that which must be borne in the loneliness of one's own soul, without the aid of tender, human sympathy of even our nearest and dearest, is the hardest to bear. And Jeanie felt the crushing weight of such a sorrow, when she bade good-night to Archie Monteith on that evening of such varied revelations, and slipped away to her own room with a sad face and a breaking heart. She was glad that the gloaming hid her wan looks from the mother's fond eyes, as she stole into her room to say good-night on her way to her own room. She was sorely tempted to fling herself on her knees beside her mother's bed, and tell her all. But she knew this would mean no rest for her mother as well as for herself, so she restrained herself, and also comforted herself with the thought that perhaps in some way which she could not yet see, she would be guided through this terrible trial.

But the hours passed swiftly through the brief summer night. The tired brain kept throbbing, throbbing without coherent thought, or worse still, with one thought repeating itself over and over again, with maddening monotony: "Donald a gambler, Donald a gambler." Thus the weary hours dragged on and still she could see no way of escape either for herself or Donald, but the one offered her by her cousin Archie.

And the more she thought of his offer, the less she liked it. Where had he gained his knowledge of Donald's affairs? How much had he heard through the open window? Why had he not at once made them aware of his presence, as an honest man should? As for accepting his offer of marriage, she knew now, when away from the hypnotic influence of his presence, that it was out of the question. He could never be more to her than he always had been.

The early morning sunshine was flooding her room with hazy shafts of light, when she at last dropped off into a sound and refreshing sleep. She did not wake up till long past her usual time of rising. Her mother peeped into her room more than once, but finding Jeanie still asleep, she quietly slipped away without awaking her. It was almost eleven o'clock when she entered the breakfast-room and found only her mother there.

"Why Jeanie, what a long ride you and Archie must have taken yesterday. I thought you were never going to wake up."

"No, mother; we only went the length of the Auld Brig o' Bothwell, but we wandered about awhile and talked of the men of the Covenant and—" she paused, would she tell her mother all? Something held her back. The good angel perhaps, who looks after the weary lamb. "And somehow I felt very tired last night, and headachy too. So I did not sleep till dawn o' day. And I think I have made up in the morning what I lost at night."

"Well, here's a note from Mr. Sinclair for you, read it while I get you a cup of fresh tea, bairn."

Jeanie nervously tore open the envelope. As she glanced over the letter, a soft smile stole over her face.

"Well, what is it?" inquired Mrs. Graeme, as she poured out the tea.

"Mr. Sinclair wants me to take the organ for tomorrow. Miss Greg has been suddenly called away to see her mother, who is ill, it appears. He says there will be a practice this evening at three o'clock. He is sorry he cannot be there, as he has a funeral at the far end of the parish."

"It is a pity he cannot be there himself."

"It would have been much easier for me, mother. I know so few of the choir members now. I'll likely feel nervous at first."

"Havers, lassie," said her mother, who sometimes dropped into "the guid auld Scottish tongue," though as a general rule, like many lowland folks, she used simple English. Jeanie laughed and answered:

"All the same, mother, I'll be glad to feel my fingers touch the organ keys again. If you were dying it would comfort you to hear the music that one seems to become a part of, and forget everything else."

"My word, Jeanie, what does a bit girlie like you know about forgetting?" She blushed uncomfortably, and changed the subject.

"Where's cousin Archie, mother?"

"Off to Glasgow by the eleven train. He says he's coming back in the evening. Are you encouraging him to come, Jeanie?" she inquired wistfully.

"I do not think so, mother. I believe I have always treated him as a cousin, no more, yet last night he asked me to be his wife."

"I just thought so, dear; his mother has been hinting at this for ever so long. Bestowing no end of praise on Archie, too."

"Most mothers like to praise their boys," said Jeanie, trying to smile into her mother's anxious face.

"Archie will be well off, Jeanie, but that is not everything. What answer did you give him?"

"I told him that I did not wish to leave you and father, and that he must not think of me, except as his cousin."

"Poor Archie. Did he seem much put out over your refusal?"

"He would not accept my answer then, mother. He said I must take time to think over it."

"Very wise of Archie. You are too young to know your own mind yet, dear."

"Would you like to see me married to him, mother?"

"I would like to see you choose what would be for your future happiness, my child."

"Is not that sometimes very difficult to find out?"

"If your own heart does not tell you, Jeanie, do not decide. You are both young, let him wait, if he loves you, he will not object to that."

"But do you think I should get engaged to him. mother?"

"If you do not care for him, my love, certainly not. Let him spin again, if it please him, a year hence." Jeanie rose gently from the table and placing her arms round her mother's neck, she kissed her tenderly.

"Mother, dear, I'm so glad you won't be disappointed. And father will think just as you do." The mother's face shone with a glad light, as she warmly returned Jeanie's caress.

"And now, child, worry no more about it. You look pale as a ghost. Run away out into the garden for an hour before dinner. You must brighten up for the choir practice, you know."

"Yes, mother, but first I will run to the shop and show father Mr. Sinclair's letter. He will be so pleased."

"Weel, Jeanie, what kind o' an oncany was on fit wi' you and Archie last nicht, when the morn finds you sleepin' like an owl instead o' bein' up wi' the lark?"

"I'll be a lark for you tomorrow, father; read this."

"I'm real glad yer able to take the 'case o' pipes' for Miss Greg, puir body. She's naething but skin and bane. It's a lang haliday she'll soon be haein', if she does'na change for the better before lang."

"Oh, father, may I tell Mr. Sinclair that I will take the organ for her for a month or two. It would be only a joy to me, you know."

"Yer kind heart is a joy tae me, lassie. Sae tell Mr. Sinclair—Gin yer mither lets ye." With a glad light in her eyes she was turning away, when a young man entered the shop, who smilingly came forward, hat in hand, and camera strapped on his broad shoulders.

"Wish me joy, Miss Graeme. I'm off for my holidays."

"With all my heart, Mr. Gordon. And where are you bound?"

"Oh, just wherever fancy leads me. My heart may be in the Highlands one day, and in Rothsay the next, and so on, for the next fortnight. I had hoped your brother here," he said, nodding towards the office, where Donald's head and shoulders could be seen bending over a ledger, "could have come with me, but it seems he can't get away now."

"I am very sorry," she said. "It would have been so nice for Donald."

"And for me," he laughed. "But it can't be helped. I have a good friend here at my back that sticks to me like a brick. I expect to take some good snapshots while I'm away, Miss Graeme. May I come in and show them to you when I come back?"

"I will be delighted," she said. "I just love to look at snapshots, especially of people."

"I got a capital one this morning. I just ran in to the bank to say ta ta to the other poor chaps at work. There was a swell traveler at the counter getting a big order cashed. He was so engrossed over his 'half notes and half gold,' that he didn't notice me, and I had him in a twinkling. That's number one—You'll see with the others."

"You young fellows wha carry yer fads on yer shoothers are a parfect nuisance in these days. Honest fowks canna dae their beeziness wi'out bein' stuck on post-cards an' sic trash."

"It is only highly distinguished looking people we want, Mr. Graeme; so it's a compliment to be selected by the artist. Bye bye." And he was off.

The practice was over. Yet the young girl lingered, her soul in her face as she played piece after piece. The swelling chords of a prayer by one of the old masters seemed to wrap her soul and body in its intense wailing, pleading strains. All unknown to her, unheeded rather, two bright tears hung on her pale cheeks when she was recalled to herself by a slight movement near her. She looked up to see Mr. Sinclair standing by her side, a look in his eyes which brought the warm color in a rush to her sweet face.

"Jeanie," he said.

"I thought you were not at home yet, Mr. Sinclair, and—it is so good to be with the organ again, I could not leave it."

"But you are sad, Jeanie. The organ has not been the cause. Tell me what it is, child."

"I cannot, Mr. Sinclair." And other tears followed the first. She did not try to stop them.

"Have you ceased to regard me as a true friend, Jeanie?"

"No, no, if I could tell anyone in the whole world, I would tell you."

"Then you will let me help you." A sudden light of hope flashed into her face as she replied in a low, earnest voice.

"You can help me, but you would have to trust me—without asking for an explanation of what may seem strange to you, in my request."

"Make your request, Jeanie," he said kindly.

"I scarcely know how to tell you. But, oh, I cannot help it. And I know I can trust you."

"Yes, you can trust me, child—and better still, I can trust you."

"You may not, when you know all."

"I thought you were not going to tell me all."

"I mean all that I can tell," she said timidly.

"I am waiting, Jeanie," he said. "I had rather know your wishes at once." She looked up into his face and saw that he was touched by her trouble more than he cared to show. With a mighty effort at self-control she said hurriedly:

"Would you please lend me one hundred pounds?" His look of utter astonishment smote her to the heart.

Indeed, indeed, I have done no wrong, Mr. Sinclair," she wailed, as she clasped her hands in pitiful distress.

"Be calm, my little girl," he whispered tenderly. "I would as soon accuse an angel from heaven of wrong-doing. I would not suspect you, Jeanie, no, not even of falsehood in your thoughts. But some one else may be guilty of wrong-doing, and your action may lead to the downfall of one you love."

"I need this money, Mr. Sinclair. I cannot do without it."

"Would your father and mother wish me to give it you, Jeanie?"

"They would give it themselves—if I could tell them. But it is something I do not wish them to know. It would break their hearts," she said naively, thinking all the time she was screening Donald. As if he did not know the miserable truth, the instant she spoke of money.

"But why not tell me everything, Jeanie, everything? The burden divided would be easier for you to bear."

"I would be glad, very glad, to tell you, if I could. But I am under a promise—you know I could not break faith."

"Certainly you could not; but could you not give me an idea of how this sum of money is going to be spent?"

"It is spent already—it must be paid before Monday night, or—oh, I don't know what will happen."

"Is it a just debt, child?"

"It must be paid, it must, there is no help for it. I will pay it back to you, Mr. Sinclair. I will save from my pocket money, and from dress. It may be a long while before I save all, but I will, some day." She looked so frail and childlike, in her pleading, that he longed to take her in his arms and comfort her as a father might his child. But he had just discovered an empty place in his heart which warned him that he had no fatherly affection to offer her. So he smiled gravely into her upturned face, as he inquired:

"When do you say you want this money, Jeanie?"

"On Monday."

"On Monday you shall have it. Meet me as if by accident at the Cross Roads at two o'clock."

"And you will never mention anything about this to father or mother, or indeed to anyone?"

"Never, unless I have your permission."

"How can I ever thank you enough," she said, extending both hands to him.

"It is I who do not know how to thank you," said he, for honoring me with your confidence." He held her hands a few moments, firmly clasped in his. Then he bent his head slightly and raising one of her hands to his lips he kissed it.

"God bless you, dear child, and keep you from all evil," he whispered and turned away. She watched him till he passed out into the the August sunshine. Falling then upon her knees she prayed: "God bless this dear friend now and forevermore, and make his life as happy as it is true and good."

As she passed through the shop on her return home, she found Donald alone there. All the rest had gone to tea.

"Donald," she said joyfully, "I have found the wherewithal to save you from public disgrace this time. Do you promise me that you will never err in the same way again?"

"I have seen myself since last night, Jeanie, as I never saw myself before—a poor, weak fool." He lifted his hand solemnly. I swear that I will never bet or gamble again so long as I shall live, so help me God."

"Thank God, Donald."

"Will you tell me where you are getting the money, Jeanie?"

"No, Donald—you have your secret. This is mine."

"Tell me only this, then—does mother know?"

"I have not told her. I am not sure, though, but it would have been the best way."

"She'd have told father at once; no, no, Jeanie, nothing could have been worse."

"If you are determined to break with the past, Donald, nothing could have been better." The entrance of James Douglas hindered further conversation between the brother and sister.

"Gang ben to your tea, Donald," said James in his usual quiet tone of voice.

"Are not you coming too, Jeanie?" inquired Donald.

"Can I have a word wi' ye, Miss Jeanie, just for a meenit?" James said in rather hesitating fashion. It was the first time he had prefixed her name with "Miss," and she blushed prettily as she leaned on the counter and replied:

"Certainly James. What is it?"

"It's aboot Donald. There's something wrang, I'm fearin'. Twa or three nichts lately, I hae seen him comin' oot o' John M. Ketridge's. It's no a safe place for ony young man. But I dinna like tae speak tae him aboot it, nor yet tae yer farther. I ken weel that M. Ketridge has a lang standin' grudge against him."

"I am glad you did not speak to father about it, James. But it was good of you to tell me. I'll speak to Donald and reason with him." She bent towards James Douglas as she spoke and lifted grateful eyes to his.

"I hae nae words tae tell ye how sorry I am for the pain I hae gi'en ye."

"The wounds of a true friend, James, are sure to heal quickly," she replied sadly. James flushed up crimson, and suddenly raised himself from his leaning position on the other side of the counter. Jeanie knew instinctively that some one had entered the shop. She turned round and encountered the smiling face of her cousin, Archie Monteith.

"Have I returned too soon, Jeanie?" he said with a forced laugh.

Friendship and Silence

By Dr. G. Campbell Morgan.

There is a test of friendship which is a more severe test than the ability to talk and be listened to, than speaking the innermost thought that the friend may repeat it better, than the merging of lives. The supreme test is the ability to say nothing, and be content when nothing is said. Silence is the final proof of friendship, and contentment in silence. When I want a holiday and a true rest I want a true friend, and the true friend is the one I can sit with in the railway train and say nothing. When I am introduced by courtesy, and acquaintanceship results, and I must always be saying something to my host; that is not friendship. Very valuable for a little while; but in the home of my friend I sit down, and stare at him, and say nothing. He looks right back at me, and says nothing.

My true friend meets me some morning, and there is not the old smile, there is not the cheery word. Now if there be true friendship, I am not disturbed by these things. I am quite sure that this attitude is on the surface, and there is a reason for it. I prove my friendship by respecting his silence, and not seeking for explanation. I think that is the final proof of friendship. The moment you ask your friend to declare his friendship, you reveal your doubt of his friendship. Well, I am afraid we shall have to look to heaven for this friendship, but we have it in God if we will.

Is there an hour when you can no longer pray? Then do not pray; and know this—God knows. Of course, if the reason of your inability to pray is that you have violated the laws of friendship, that you have sinned against it, then speak with repentance and with tears, until you be restored to joy and salvation. But if there be no conscious reason in your own life, "Who is among you?"—let me quote from the ancient prophecy—"Who is among you that feareth the Lord, that obeyeth the voice of his servant? He that walketh in darkness, and hath no light."

Well, now what are we to do, prophet, because we are often there? Let him compel himself to sing? Nothing of the kind. What then? Let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay upon the Lord without speaking. God is equal in his love to the strain of silence that is born of honesty.

And, my brethren, God's truest friends are those to whom God is most often silent. Would to God I could comfort some heart with that. The light has gone out, and you are obeying him, walking in darkness. Do not imagine that is because he cannot trust you; it is a supreme proof of his trust; silence is the last test. Our fellowship is with the Father, so that if we are driven to silence we need not be afraid; so that if he is silent we ought not to be afraid.

It was a great hymn to which Bliss was writing the music when he was suddenly taken from life in a railway accident. They found in his writing-case the music, half-written, to that hymn:

I know not what awaits me;
God kindly veils mine eyes,
I'd rather walk in the dark with God,
Than go alone in the light;
I'd rather walk by faith with him,
Than go alone by sight.

We often sing it. May God make it true to us. That is the final proof of friendship.

The Boy Who Forgets

I love him, the boy who forgets!
  Does it seem such a queer thing to say?
Can't help it; he's one of my pets;
  Delightful at work or at play.
I'd trust him with all that I own,
  And know neither worries nor frets;
But the secret of this lies alone
  In the things that the laddie forgets.

He always forgets to pay back
  The boy who has done him an ill;
Forgets that a grudge he owes Jack,
  And smiles at him pleasantly still.
He always forgets 'tis his turn
  To choose what the others shall play;
Forgets about others to learn
  The gossipy things that "they say."

He forgets to look sulky and cross
  When things are not going his way;
Forgets some one's gain is his loss;
  Forgets, in his worktime, his play.
So this is why I take his part;
  Why I say he is one of my pets;
I repeat it with all of my heart:
  I love him for what he forgets!

How Grandpa Got His Clothes

How delighted he had been with that first pair of pantaloons! And mamma had been so particular, when she made them, to put in a tiny hip pocket, "just like papa's!" But now, sad to relate, a very little hole was trying to make itself seen in the knee.

"Next time I have a suit, I'm going to have store clothes!" exclaimed Willie, radiantly. "Papa says I may, and that I can go with him down to Banner Clothing Store to pick them out."

"Store clothes!" laughed grandpa slyly. "Why, I thought no clothes in the world could ever come up to the suit you're wearing, and mamma made those; no store clothes about them!"

"But—but—grandpa," replied Willie, hesitatingly, "I'm older now, and it's time I had pantaloons bought like papa's. See, I'm 'most as tall as he is now!"

"When I was a boy," continued grandpa, "they didn't have such things as store clothes."

"Didn't!" exclaimed Willie, with wide-open eyes. "Why where did they get them?"

"Right at home," replied grandpa, amused at the expression on Willie's face. "They were all home-made!"

"When they got big, real big, like brother Ned and papa and you, they didn't have to have their mothers make their clothes, did they?"

"No, not always their mothers," replied grandpa, smiling. "When I was a boy there used to be tailors and tailoresses whose business it was to go about the country, from place to place, to cut and make enough clothes to last the men-folks a year."

"They always carried with them their own needles, shears, and tailors' goose, which was larger than an ordinary flat-iron. This was used for pressing the large seams, and was called a tailors' goose because of its goose-like form. Sometimes a tailor remained at one house three or four weeks before he got his work done."

"Did they board themselves?" asked Willie, curiously.

"No; they boarded in the family, and often took meat, beans, and vegetables in payment for their work; for in those days money was scarce in farmers' families."

"But where did they get their cloth, grandpa?"

"The cloth, too, was raised on the farm. That is, we raised the flax and kept sheep. After the flax got ripe, it was pulled and spread on the grass, where it was kept for some time, till it decayed or 'rotted' enough for the vegetable fibers to be separated. Then it was gathered up and kept till cold weather, when it was made ready for use.

"The rough and fine tow were always separated. The rough was usually woven into coarse towels, while the finer sort was spun. and woven into very good cloth, some of which was made into men's shirts.

"After the sheep were sheared the wool was washed and made ready to be manufactured into the cloth for our garments.

"The cloth was also colored at home. That for every-day use was usually blue and white, or else a reddish brown. That for our Sabbath suits was for the most part gray. So you see our clothes were home-made, through and through."

"But you had store shoes—didn't you, grandpa?"

"No more than were our clothes. Many families prepared their own leather, and cobblers, just like the tailors, went about from house to house every fall and fitted each member of the family to shoes. We didn't have as many pairs as you do. We had but one pair a year, and these we had to make last."

"But didn't you ever get tired of having everything home-made?" asked Willie, curiously.

"No, indeed!" laughed grandpa, gaily; "for when I was a boy we didn't know anything different."—United Presbyterian.

What Grandma Threw

There was a game of ball in progress in the back yard. Grandma, busy with her basket of darning, smiled as she watched the three town boys from the window. She was not the only one who watched them, however. Out in the road were three or four poorly-dressed boys who, attracted by the shouting and laughing in the yard usually so quiet, were looking through the fence. "Town kids," muttered one to another, beginning to dislike the ball-players at once, though they could not have told why, except that the newcomers were better dressed, and seemed to be having a good time in which those outside the fence were not sharing. Presently one of them called his comment aloud: "Dudes!"

"Ragbag!" promptly responded Guy.

"Such playing!" sneered the boys outside.

"If you don't like it, you needn't watch it. Clear out!" shouted the boys inside.

Back and forth over the fence the sharp words flew, and of course it was only a few minutes before an occasional stick or stone was flying also. Then, by an unlucky toss, the ball went over, and that ended the game, for the boys refused to give it up.

"Oh, no, we won't throw it back, sonny! You don't know how to play with it anyhow, so 'tain't no use to you," they answered mockingly, to all the demands for its return. "You didn't have to throw it over, and we don't have to throw it back."

Angry, and fearful of losing their ball altogether, the young visitors hurried into the house with the story of their wrongs. "They're spoiling all our fun, and we can't drive them away; and now they've got the ball."

"And you can't make them go away and let you alone?" asked grandma.

"No'm. We talked to 'em, and threw things at 'em, and everything."

"Well! well! Maybe you didn't throw anything that hit them in the right place," said grandma severely. "I won't have them tormenting you in such way. I'll throw something that will send them off in a hurry."

She marched into the pantry, and the boys looked at one another with surprise mingling with satisfaction. They wanted the intruders driven off, but the idea of sweet-faced grandma throwing stones! Or had she gone for bricks, or hot water? She hurried out of the door, and they followed her, but they could not distinctly see what missle she sent over the fence. "Don't say anything to them. Wait and see what they'll do," she said to the wondering boys on the step.

But after a few moments of silence they could not resist the temptation to tiptoe over the grass, and peep into the road. There sat the enemy around a torn paper sack, eating some of grandma's delicious doughnuts!

"Humph!" said Charlie.

"Here's your ball," said a rather subdued voice outside, and the treasure dropped at Charlie's feet. "We didn't mean to keep it anyway. We was only foolin'. We're goin' fishin'."

"They've gone, haven't they?" inquired grandma as the boys came back to the house. "You can nearly always make people peaceable by throwing at them, if only you throw the right things."

The boys laughed, though they looked a little ashamed; for often afterward, when there was danger of getting into a quarrel, one of the others would say warningly: "Better throw a doughnut."—Pittsburg Christian Advocate.

Bright Sayings

Mamma: "How many sisters did your new playmate tell you he had?"

Willis: "He's got one. He tried to catch me by saying he had two half-sisters, but he'll find out I've studied fractions."—Harper's Young People.

Little Carrie was somewhat surprised, upon looking into the hen's nest, to find a porcelain egg in it. The next morning the hen left her nest cackling loudly over a new achievement. Carrie secured the egg, brought it to her mother, and said' "That old hen's a silly thing. Just listen to her cackling all over the yard! Why, yesterday she laid a door-knob, and didn't make half so much fuss about it."—Christian Register.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, MAY 29.

Theme for the Day.—The First Day.

Scripture.—And there was evening, and there was morning, the first day.—Gen. 1:5.

This is the day which Jehovah hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it.—Psa. 118:24.

Today on weary nations
The heavenly manna falls;
To holy convocations
The silver trumpet calls,
Where the gospel light is glowing,
With pure and radiant beams
And living water flowing
With soul-refreshing streams.
—C. Wordsworth ("The Sabbath.")

Prayer.—Divine Father, Thou hast brought us Thy children, to this good day once more. Its quiet and rest are Thy gift. Its ministries of worship are for the strengthening of faith and the enrichment of life. We praise Thee for this, and for all the means of grace and the hope of glory. Grant us the spirit of true worship in Thy sanctuary. May the gospel be proclaimed in all its beauty and its power. And may its message find a place in the hearts of those who hear. We ask for Jesus sake. Amen.

MONDAY, MAY 30. (Memorial Day.)

Theme for the Day.—Loving Remembrance of the Heroic Dead.

Scripture.—To bring to remembrance.—Psa. 38:1.

My soul hath them still in remembrance.—Lam. 3:20.

Remember the days of old, consider the years of many generations; ask thy father and he will show thee; thine elders, and they will tell thee.—Deut. 32:7.

By the flow of the inland river,
Whence the fleets of iron have fled,
Where the blades of the grave-grass quiver,
Asleep are the ranks of the dead;
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Under the one, the Blue,
Under the other, the Gray.

Prayer.—Gracious Father, Thou hast given us this land of our love and pride. Through many dangers hast Thou brought us, and many graves have claimed their own in the saving of Thy gifts of freedom and good will. We honor today those who gave their lives for the country. May we never forget the price they paid that we might enjoy the blessings of liberty and peace. And may we today consecrate ourselves afresh to the service of the land they loved and died to save.. Amen.

TUESDAY, MAY 31.

Theme for the Day.—The Cry of the Children.

Scripture.—For death is come up into our windows, to cut off the children from without.—Jer. 9:21.

The young children ask bread and no man breaketh it unto them.—Lam. 4:4.

He will judge the poor of the people, He will save the children of the needy, and will break in pieces the oppressor.—Psa. 72:4.

Still, all day, the iron wheels go onward,
Grinding life down from its mark;
And the children's souls which God is calling sunward,
Spin on blindly in the dark.
—Elizabeth B. Browning ("The Cry of the Children.")

Prayer.—O God, our hearts are moved to pity and indignation when we see the suffering that still remains in our world after all the centuries since Jesus took the children in his arms. The cry of the children comes into our ears, and we cannot longer refuse to give it heed. Help us, we pray Thee, to know more of the needs and sufferings of our fellow creatures and to seek earnestly the good of those who are the children of poverty and oppression, and may we find in this good work the approval of our Master, in whose name we ever pray. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1.

Theme for the Day—A Summer Day.

Scripture.—Thou visitest the earth and waterest it, thou greatly enrichest it, . . . Thou waterest its furrows abundantly; thou settlest the ridges thereof; thou makest it soft with showers; thou blessest the springing thereof.—Psa 65:9, 10.

And what is so rare as a day in June?
Then, if ever, come perfect days;
Then heaven tries earth if it be in tune,
And over it softly her warm ear lays;
Whether we look, or whether we listen,
We hear life murmur, or see it glisten.
—James R. Lowell ("The Vision of Sir Launfal.")

Prayer.—O Lord, we thank Thee for the coming of this gracious season of warmth and fertility. Thou enrichest us with the blessings of nature and all the earth seems full of Thy praise. We would not miss our part in the anthem of creation. Give to us the sense of joy in the works of Thy hands, and may we see in all nature the proof of the power and love of our Father. Save us from unthankfulness and failure to fulfil our high service as Thy children. Restrain all evil tendencies within us, and make us victors over the world, the flesh and the evil one, for Thy name's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY, JUNE 2.

Theme for the Day.—Contentment.

Scripture.—I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therein to be content.—Phil. 4:11.

But godliness with contentment is great gain.—I. Tim. 6:6.

I am content with what I have,
Little be it or much;
And, Lord, contentment still I crave,
Because thou savest such.
—John Bunyan ("Song.")

Prayer.—Our kind Father, we would escape the evil that is in the world, and we know that through the power of Thy Holy Spirit, and by the virtue of a contented mind we can live each day in the atmosphere of thankfulness and happiness. Save us from discontent, from vain ambitions, from longings after things that are not best. May Thy gifts of love and good will so enrich us that we shall be satisfied with that good companionship of the pure and holy to which Thou dost bring us, and may we attain at last to eternal life. For Christ's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY, JUNE 3.

Theme for the day.—The Downfall of the Assyrian.

Scripture.—And the angel of Jehovah went forth, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred and four score and five thousand; and when men arose early in the morning, behold, these were all dead bodies.—Isa. 37:36.

Like the leaves of the forest when summer is green,
That host with their banners at sunset were seen;
Like the leaves of the forest when autumn hath blown,
That host on the morrow lay withered and strown.
—Byron ("The Destruction of Sennacherib.")

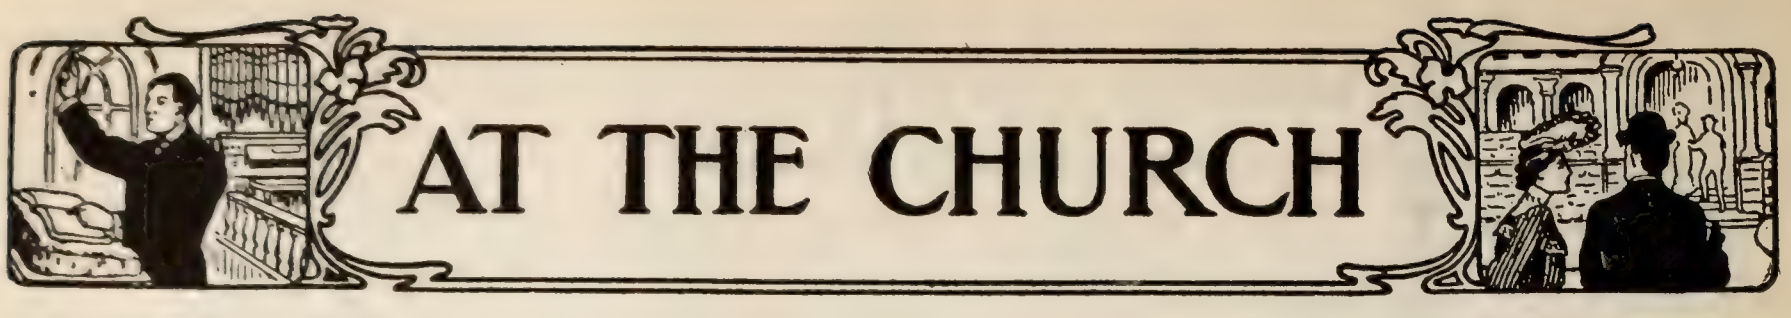
Prayer.—Thou hast shown us marvelous things, our Father, in the providences of history. Thou hast taught us that those who are for us are mightier than those that are against us. We arm ourselves in the confidence of the children of God against all foes that assail us. We can do all things in Christ who strengthens us. Give us the victory, we pray Thee, through him, and may we learn by daily struggle and daily conquest the power that is ours to overcome the world. Amen.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4.

Theme for the Day.—Today.

Scripture.—The thing of a day in its day.—Lev. 23:37.

Ye stand this day all of you before Jehovah your God.— Deut. 29:10.



Out of eternity this new day is born;
Into eternity at night will return.
—Thomas Carlyle ("Today.")

Prayer.—Our God and Father, teach us the sufficiency of one day at a time. We love to look further ahead, and see the distant scene. But we come through the discipline of years, and by the grace of communion with Thee, to know that one step at a time is enough. May that step be always in the right direction, so that in our progress toward eternity we may have no steps to retrace. We thank Thee for the week we are completing. Take its record, and bless its good work, helping us to do better for the next. And to Thy name shall be the praise, evermore. Amen.

The Oath to Which King George Objects

King George made something of a sensation when he notified his ministers that he must decline to take the oath of office as now worded, because he regards it as offensive to his Catholic subjects. The oath as now worded, with reference to Catholic beliefs, follows:

"I do solemnly and sincerely, in the presence of God, profess, testify and declare that I do believe that in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper there is not any transsubstantiation of the elements of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, at or after consecration thereof, by any person; and that the invocation or adoration of the Virgin Mary or any other saint, and the sacrifice of the mass as now used in the Church of Rome, are superstitious and idolatrous; and I do solemnly, in the presence of God, profess testify and declare that I do make this declaration, and every part thereof, in the plain, ordinary sense of the words as commonly understood by English Protestants, without any evasion, equivocation or mental reservation whatever, and without any dispensation already granted me for this purpose by the pope or any other authority or person whatsoever."

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

On the Waters*

In the matter of the miraculous work of Jesus the present lesson, like that of last week, presents serious difficulties. It is hard to assign as significant a meaning to these two events, the multiplication of the bread and the walking of Jesus on the water, as to most of his acts of power. More than this, the difficulty of giving any satisfactory explanation of the events themselves increases the problem. The moral need of either action seems hard to discover, and to this must be added the problems raised by the nature of the events themselves as compared with the regular activities of life in accordance with God's laws, and the great majority of Jesus' acts of healing and helpfulness. This is not to deny the reality of these events. It is only to recognize what must be perceived by every candid student, that such events in the life of Jesus are far more difficult to adjust, not only to the order of nature, but to his customary ways of acting, than those miracles which have occupied most of our attention.

Value of These Narratives.

Yet, these two narratives of the feeding of the five thousand and the walking on the water are so full of religious instruction that they have always been favorites with the church, and have entered very deeply into the literature and ritual of Christianity. If Jesus' kindness in providing in some manner for hungry people on the shores of the Sea of Galilee taught the impressive lesson of his good will and efficient helpfulness to men, not less did the story of his solicitude for the storm-tossed disciples prove of inestimable value in its power to assure his followers to the end of time that he is evermore at hand in every emergency to save and to comfort. If one were to take inventory of the hymns in which one or the other of these incidents finds reference, the list would be very long. And there is no surer proof than this of the service which a biblical record can render.

Prayer as Jesus' Means of Rest.

After the busy day spent with the people who had followed him into his retirement, Jesus would naturally desire to seek the rest of which the events of the day had deprived him. It is astonishing, therefore, to learn that instead of rest he only wished the privilege of prayer. Having first sent the disciples back across the sea, and later dismissed the people, he retired into the mountains back from the shore, where he might be alone with himself and God. The significance of Jesus' need of prayer is very great. It was his way of renewing his exhausted powers. The more urgent and everwhelming his task, the greater was his need of prayer. It was this wonderful quality in his life which not only explains much of its power, but serves as the compelling model for Christian imitation.

Perhaps the distance that lies between the life of Christ and our own may be accounted for in some manner by the difference between his use of prayer and ours. To him it was the essence of privilege and necessity; to us too frequently it is a task, or at best, the result of practice and some sense of duty. To bring our ideal of prayer closer to his own is the supreme necessity of the Christian life.

The Storm on the Sea.

Meantime the disciples were making their way across the sea. The night had come on, and they were in the midst of those dangers which too frequently made the passage of the little Galilean lake a matter of peril. We must not forget that the disciples were no inexperienced seamen. Their trade had accustomed them to all the exigencies of the sailor's art. In this instance, and in that in which Jesus stilled the tempest, emphasis is laid up their terror. Does it mean that the storms on these occasions were fiercer than at other times; or that the disciples had less than their customary skill and courage; or is the picture heightened to make emphatic the comfort of Jesus' presence when he made himself known to them?

The Coming of Jesus.

Then comes the strange account of Jesus walking on the water. No attempt at an explanation of this incident has ever proved satisfactory. Keim thought that it was a mistake of the disciples. He believed that Jesus was actually waiting for them on the shore, but that they though him to be walking on the water. But this explanation is far from plausible. What the true explanation is must be left for future and fuller knowledge of the laws of nature to disclose. All that can be said is that while so many of the marvelous acts of Jesus lie within reach of some beginnings of explanation, in accordance with our knowledge of natural law, and new facts from the world of science are pouring in upon us with marvelous rapidity and convincing force, it is neither necessary nor logical to assert, as the men of science were once accustomed to do, that such an event in the life of Christ, however difficult to understand, may not be credible.

The Meaning of the Record.

Our best use of such material does not lie in the realm of controversial insistence upon the fact. Equally impossible is the dogmatic denial of what we may not yet understand. The real value of such an episode lies in the discovery of its teaching power as it has impressed the church through the ages. And this incident has always stood to the church as the illustration of the approach of Christ to the soul at the moment of its greatest need, and of that fact there is no denial. A great truth may be illustrated in many ways, and it is possible that some of the illustrations may lack convincing power. But the truth still remains greater than all the means which are used to enforce it. Not otherwise is it with this fact of the presence of Christ with the believer in the emergencies of life. And sometimes the very events that seem most difficult to understand and most forbidding in their form, prove to be the disclosure of the Lord himself in his power to save and to comfort.

Peter's Attempt.

There is a certain humorous pathos in the attempt of Peter to emulate Jesus by walking upon the waves. He was always the foremost of the disciples in every enterprise of speech or action. Naturally bold and unreckoning in his disposition, it seemed quite natural to him that he should follow Jesus in every adventure. The failure of the disciple gave Jesus an admirable opportunity of enforcing his great lesson of faith. The man of confidence is the only one who succeeds. A merely rash assurance might lead to disaster, but hesitant timidity can lead to nothing but failure. If there is one thing for which the teachings and character of Jesus pre-eminently stand it is the principle of fearless aggressiveness. In a hundred ways he enforced this lesson. The reason for many a failure might be discovered in Jesus' words of rebuke, "Wherefore didst thou doubt?"

The Bread of Life.

The coming of Jesus into the boat was the signal for the banishment of fear and the renewal of comfort in his presence. The storm subsided and before long they were at the place of landing. The two synoptic gospels, Matthew and Mark, state that this was Gennesaret on the western shore southwest of Capernaum; but the fourth gospel says that the destination was Capernaum itself. Here they were at once surrounded by the afflicted people of the district, who had perhaps heard of the events of the previous day. Many of them Jesus healed of their infirmities, but most important of all, as John's gospel gives us information, Jesus proclaimed to the people that day the great truth regarding himself as the bread of life, a fact of which his wonderful deeds of the day before had proved so significant an illustration. No wonder that the disciples who beheld these events in our Lord's ministry were convinced beyond question that he was the Son of God, the divine messenger of the Father to the world.

The Grand Canon

Symphony of silence, depth, height sublime
Miracle of Nature, since ancient time
In Ages infinite planets began!
Moving to mortals more than work of man!
Architecture awful, almighty, grand,
In yawning gulfs far-reaching, great unspanned,
Sculptured rocks all-glorious, clouds, color, light
"God's Masterpiece," disintegration's might!

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic June 5. Christ Our Judge. Matt. 25: 31-46. (Consecration Meeting).

The important thing in this lesson is not that Christ is our judge, but that we should know the standards by which we are to be judged. We are in great danger of speculating about the former and neglecting the latter. Yet we will all agree that if we were to be brought before a judge in our courts we would be much more concerned about the requirements of the court than about the name and identity of the judge.

As Christians we will not be judged by the fact of church membership. We may be church members and be wholly lacking in the things which Jesus prizes most highly. Remember that it is "not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of Heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven." What then is his will which we must do? While in this space we cannot give a complete answer to the question let us take Christ's answer in our lesson. It is, to render service and help to the needy and unfortunate. Not only has Jesus told us to do that, but he has set the example. Recall his deeds of mercy and kindness. He made the lame man to leap, he opened the eyes of the blind man, he cured the woman who suffered from an issue of blood, he made whole the man whose hand was withered, and he fed the multitude which had followed him for days and was famishing for food. This was his conception of meeting and discharging the duties of life in the midst of suffering and want.

He has likewise laid the same duty upon us. Is there need for it? Is there still suffering? Do we have, the naked, the hungry, the outsat, the sick, the orphan, and the criminal in his lonely cell? Do those human beings possess feelings of sympathy and love, if only it were manifested to them by those of us who are more fortunate? Our minds go at once to the tenements, the sweatshops, the cotton and textile mills, the mines and the factories where children are found by the thousands with no room nor opportunities for play, where their lives are spent in toil from early morn unitl late at night, where light and air, food and clothing, moral and intellectual opportunity are wanting. Then there are the sick poor, and these in prison. Both need an opportunity; the one, an environment conducive to his health, the other, to regain his moral balance. Yes the world is full of suffering, misfortune and sorrow, it is all about us, and if we are to be true disciples, disciples who will hear his approval, we must add our might to make somebody's burden lighter, somebody's life happier and brighter.

In deed we must insist that others assume a similar obligation as they pass by. Christian discipleship has two phases. It insists upon certain things which the individual must do with his own life, among them this principle for service, and also must he seek to win others to this same model life which he has accepted. Do you do these things? Do you seek to induce your neighbor? This is the standard by which we will all be judged in the final day?

peddling his patent nostrums of salvation to an undignified crowd down at the water's edge. They had listened one night but he did not move their hearts.

"When I was saved—ah. I didn't know what to do—ah, for the spirit of the Lord was upon me—ah, so I just jumped up—ah, and hollered—ah, whee-e-e!"

These men fled. Religion was to them too mysterious, exalted and dignified for such expositions. Then there was the mighty man six feet two inches tall with his big feet, big heart, big laugh and big hand. They loved him and sometimes shook hands with him. Once he ate supper with them and told them stories of his life on a farm in the North. He has almost broken through their reserve, but he had gone away too soon. They had not forgotten his parting words to them as they came to say farewell. "Goodbye, boys. God bless you all! You're the stuff He makes His heroes of."

The wind outside now shrieked and howled and now died down to a minor cadence as though mourning for the wrecks it had strewn along the shore. Two ship lanterns gave a shadowy light to the church and the group of sailors gathered there. The cook was gathering up the empty dishes and King Kelly cleared his throat and began.

"Well, boys, Hi promised to tell you the story of Cap'n Bubber's startin' fer the Lord an' Hi'll begin at the beginnin'. Long 'bout seven months ago I was workin' at paintin' the light'ouse at Sand Key. The gang that was there was about as tough a bunch of hoboes as Hi hever got hamongst. Well, one day when a clippin' wind was a-blowin', 'long comes a pretty little racin' yacht a bobbin' over the waves as hever you see; says Hi, that feller kin sail. Hin 'e comes a lickin up to the dock. Thinks Hi, 'e can't either sail, 'es goin' to smash into the dock. When 'e up and makes as perty a luff as hever you see, drops sail and sided up just hard enough to break an empty egg shell. Says Hi to a 'obo, 'e kin bunk with me." At noon we found hout who 'e was. 'e was a preacher an' come stay a week with the lighthouse folks. That very hafternoon 'e climbed up the skantlin' an' stops by me. "Your name's Kelly, ain't it?"

"Yes," say Hi, "don't you like it?"

"Sure," says 'e, "Hi always did like a Hirishman."

Then 'e feels of my harm and says, "Say, Hi wish Hi 'ad a harm like that."

"You'd smash your pulpit," says Hi, if ye got to bangin'.

'No,' says 'e, 'I don't never bang. Somehow Hi can't do that. Hi don't believe Jesus did that and the Bible says, "Come let us reason together," an' that's the way I want to preach.

"What would you do," says Hi, "if you had a harm an' fist like mine?"

"Well, gents, quick as a flash 'e says, 'Smash the devil so 'ard between the heyes that 'e'd 'ave a sick 'eadacke hall the rest of 'is natural life.' 'An,' continues 'e, 'Kelly, that's what you ought to be doin' now, an' you kin give him the first crack by roundin' the boys up fer religious services day after tomorrow.

The first thing Hi knew 'e 'ad me a promsin' to 'elp. Well, we hall gathered into the inin'-room of the light-house Sunday morn-n.' 'e read us hout o' the Bible a story about a feller what asked 'is dad for 'is share before 'e died. The old man was kind o' dead easy. 'e whacked up an' the boy hoisted sail and made fer mid-ocean. 'e kept runnin' before the wind and the wind kept blowin' 'im father away from 'ome. The money 'is father give 'im 'e kept spending free right an left until one day 'e ran 'igh and dry on a reef an' found 'imself without a crew, cook or grub an' dead broke. So 'e rustled a job feeding swine, couldn't even work 'is passage, let alone decent food. So one day 'e says, 'Hi'm goin' 'ome an' hask fer a job o' some kind. It will be a lot better than this.' So 'e ups an' starts. Well, before 'e got 'ome the old father came running' hout to meet 'im an' gave 'im the glad 'and, took 'im 'ome an' made 'im one of the family again. Then that preacher tells us that's the way with God. He gives us a clean chance to start with but we sometimes go a long way off spending the virtues right and left and gittin' the sins in return. Maybe we get brought up standin' sometimes an' go back. An' if we do, no matter how bad we bin or how far we gone. God'll take us in again an' make us part o' 'is family. He loves us all the time an' the farther hoff we get, the more 'e'll want us to come back.

We boys got mighty huneasy. One of the fellers 'ad a mother 'way off in Lonnon an' 'e knew she was prayin' fer 'er wanderin' boy. Another used to be a 'alf grown preacher but the booze got 'im an' Hi kin remember 'ow my own mother over in the Bahamas used to tuck me in bed when I was a kid an' say, "God bless my Johnnie (they didn't call me King then), and keep 'im always good."

Then 'e ended with a prayer. Hit wasn't long, but hit got me. I kin remember takin' a long breath an' feelin' somethin' in my throat. Went somethin' like this:

"O God, remember these boys! They've wandered a long way off an' have been spendin' their lives best talents fer the things that turn to bitterness. But they haven't had the chance some have had. Show 'em the way back 'an they'll come. Amen."

'e didn't say much more except to tell us that if 'e could 'elp us any 'e'd be glad to We all went out an' not one cuss word did Hi 'ear all day.

Somehow those words, "Show 'em the way back, an' they'll come," kept runin through my 'ead. So 'bout midnight I went to 'is room. 'e was readin' something.

I says: 'I want to know the way if I can find it.'

"Yes," says 'e, "I've been waitin' fer you. I knew you'd come."

"So 'e told me 'bout the Man who never did anything wrong, an' when 'e was in trouble asked God to 'elp 'im out. An' beside that 'e always tried to 'elp other people an' make life pleasant an' clean for 'em. Some fellows who wanted the crowd to follow their ways, which were dishonest, finally got 'im and nailed 'im to the cross, an' hung 'im up to die an' when 'e was dyin' 'e said 'Father, forgive them.' Then he said Hi should try to be like this man an' hask God to 'elp me. An' Hi promised. Hi ain't got time to tell it all, but 'e 'elped God to show six of us the way back home."

"Hi went up to Key West and went to Preacher Scott, because my aunt was a member of 'is church, and says, 'Hi want to join the church."

He says, 'What do you know about the doctrines?'"

'Nothin', says Hi, 'Hi ain't never been sick. If Hi am Hi'll get a doctor who knows 'em.

'Do you believe in the perseverance of the saints?' asks 'e.

'Yes,' says I, 'Saints ought to persevere.'

'Do you believe in election,' is 'is next one.

'Yes,' says Hi, 'Hi always vote the Democrat ticket.'

'You won't do,' says 'e, 'you got a lot to learn.'

'Sure, I got a lot to learn,' says Hi, 'but you aren't goin' to keep me hout of the church on that account?'

'Well,' says 'e, 'I guess I 'ave to till you learn a lot.'

'Why,' says Hi, 'Don't the Bible call the Lord the Good Shepherd?'

'Yes,' says 'e.

"'Well, says Hi, 'Hit seems to me if some little lamb got lost and was a blattin' around fer its maw an' couldn't find 'er, don't you suppose the Lord would take it in? I'm that lamb, says Hi, 'an H'm 'ungry for the bread o' life."

'Say,' says 'e, 'you're right. I've been thinkin' so all the time, but it was the rules o' the church. The rules o' the church can go it. I'm goin' to take you in if I lose my job. Any man that's tryin' to get to God is right close an' belongs to God's family. You come Sunday."

"I come Sunday an' joined. But Hi 'ad a big thirst on. I wanted to go down to Alvarez' saloon an' take a drink, an' if Hi 'adn't remembered about soakin' the devil between the heyes, maybe Hi would 'ave. Then Hi thinks it would be better to get where booze couldn't be 'ad. I thought of Cap'n Bubber Smart wantin' a mate, so I went down and signed articles for a six month's trip.

"Next day when we was eatin' the cook's flunkey who was waitin' on us, fell down with our duff and spilled it over the floor. Cap'n orders me to give 'im a cussin'. Excuse me,' says Hi, 'but Hi don't cuss no more."

"Don't cuss' 'e yells. "Hi'll teach you to disobey orders." An' with that 'e ups an' bats me on the side o' the 'ead. Hi started up to fight and then Hi remembered 'im forgivin' 'is henemies. Then Hi got another idea. I turned the other side of my face to 'im an' says, 'Cap'n, slap that, too."

"Scripture injunction' says 'e," and gives me a stinger.

"Now the Lord be praised," says Hi.

"Why?" says 'e.

"Because it don't say not to fight when both sides has been slapped an' I'm goin' to give you the only lickin' you 'ave 'ad since your mother did 'er duty."

"We set to an' I got the best of that argument. Finally 'e says, 'Nuff. I won't order you to cuss again."

"No," says Hi, "an' I'm goin' to ask God to show you the way home like he done to me."

"A couple o' days after 'e comes to me an' says, 'Kelley, what did you mean 'bout God showin' me the way 'ome?'

"I told 'im about the Prodigal Son. Next day 'e comes again an' says, 'Kelly, that son's me. I've been readin' 'bout 'im an' I asked God to show me, too. We'll 'ave Sunday services from now on. Come an' 'elp me throw a little booze overboard an' then have the bo'sun call all hands off while I tell 'em."

"From that day on there was a change in conditions. The last day o' 'is life we was talkin' about things an' 'e says, 'Kelly, the best thing in the Book is what I call the Old Love Story. Gor God so loved the world,' etc.

"An' just then the cook's flunkey goes overboard and Cap'n Bubber after 'im. That's why I said 'e'd gone 'ome."

The men sat in silence. It was an old story to the rescued, a new one to the rescuers but one they could appreciate. The wind moaned through the palmettos; the waves broke heavily on the beach; one of the lanterns flickered out. And in the ghostly light of the old church Captain Pembroke rose and said, "Boys, I reckon we'd better get on that course and mark out our way 'ome by the same chart. I'd like to quit this business an' steer by 'im."

And the old deserted church never looked upon a finer sight than when these men, forgetful of the hurricane, bowed with King Kelly as he pleaded with God to show these men the way back home.

Woman's Part in Civic Uplift

BY REV. A. W. FORTUNE

From May 11 to 8 there was held in Cincinnati, Ohio, a wonderful series of meetings. It was the tenth biennial convention of the General Federation of Women's Clubs. This convention was attended by about 2,500 delegates, and these delegates represented about 800,000 women in all parts of the country. As one observed the workings of this convention at close range, he must have been impressed with the seriousness of these women, and of the possibilities which these clubs afford for civic and social uplift.

Some have imagined that these clubs are nothing more than organizations for literary and social culture. Others have regarded them as organizations whose supreme mission is to promote woman's suffrage. But anyone who has studied the program of the Cincinnati convention, must be convinced that either of these conceptions does the women's clubs an injustice. In this convention some of the leading experts of the United States discussed the most vital of the social and civic problems of today. Among the subjects discussed were the following: Progress in Civic Betterment; Education for Girls; Foods and Their Adulteration; Civil Service Reform; Industry and Child Labor; The Theater and the People; Social Hygiene and the White Slave Traffic. These and other similar topics were discussed by some of the best qualified men and women on the continent, and the impetus which these women received from these discussions will be felt in the remotest parts of the country.

One great need in this country today is a campaign of education along civic and social lines. It may be that the women's clubs will be the means of inaugurating such a campaign. If people were not in ignorance, many of the civic and social evils would not be tolerated; but men are so absorbed in commercialism and in politics, that they do not know about these things, and what is even more discouraging, they do not seem to be anxious to know about them. But the women are declaring that the searchlight must be turned on, and that if these evils continue, it must be under their protest.

It is true that it is man's mission to study these civic and social problems and consecrate his powers to their solution; but he has apparently shown himself to be unable to cope with them, and the women must come to his assistance. When so many members of the council of a great city, like Pittsburg, will confess to graft, that there are not enough honest men left to transact business, and the legislature of a great state, like Illinois, will put up the office of United States senator and sell it to the highest bidder, it is time the women had something to say. When the police force of a great city, like New York, will collect $2,000,000 tribute annually from the saloons and dives, thus guaranteeing them freedom from arrest, as Mayor Gaynor recently charged against them, it is time the women utter their protest. When iniquity and vice are protected within a certain section of a great city, like Cincinnati, and the churches and the Salvation Army are denied the use of the streets in that section, as they have been by a recent order of the Chief of police, it is time the women were becoming aroused. When men and women pay heavy taxes, for city improvements, and a few men get immensely wealthy from the taxes, which they pay, it is time that an educational crusade is started which will make these monstrous leeches seek their hiding places.

Woman should be interested in these civic and social questions because many of them concern her most vitally. It is undoubtedly the mission of woman to look after that part of the world which is bounded by her own doors, but her duty does not stop with that. The woman that neglects her own home for any other purpose, be it philanthropy, missions, or civic and social agitation, is paying too dear a price; but for her children's sake, woman needs to know more than simply how to cook and wash dishes and sweep and dust. The women of the non-Christian world do not have lofty thoughts. They are shut up within the walls of their own homes, and their minds are occupied with dress and gossip. But the women of the Christian world are interested in the affairs of the nation. Woman to be at her best needs sometimes to get her mind off the routine and grind of life. She needs to think about art, literature, civic and social righteousness, and these various things which are for the uplift of humanity.

We are in the beginning of a great awakening, and in this great awakening woman is to play a prominent part. That is as it should be, for when man fails, she must come to his assistance; when man is discouraged, she must encourage him, and go with him to the conflict.

Cincinnati, Ohio.

News from the Foreign Society

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first nineteen days of May amounted to $18,025, a gain of $5,474. The receipts from the churches as churches are $11,043, a gain of $3,030. The total receipts for the missionary year to May 19 amounted to $149,-859.27, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $18,421.76.

The Bolto, Meyer Mfg. Company of Chicago, has just presented Dr. W. E. Macklin of Mankin, China, with a $600 gasoline lighting plant for his hospital. These people have become deeply interested in the medical and charity work that Doctor Macklin is ably carrying on in China.

W. H. Hanna reports seven baptisms at Vigan, Philippine Islands, during the month of March. He has not entirely recovered from a late illness.

Dr. C. L. Pickett is doing a marvelous work at Laoag, Philippine Islands. During March he treated 1,327 patients, made fifty-six professional visits in the homes of the sick, visited seven points outside of Laoag and baptized seventeen. During January and February there were twenty-two additions that have not been reported. His total report is thirty-eight conversions.

Last week a friend in Illinois sent $200 on the Annuity Plan. This is to go toward the hospital at Chu Choo, China.

Dr. W. M. Hardy, who expected to sail May 24 from San Francisco, was compelled to defer his sailing to May 31.

The orders for Children's Day supplies are pouring in. The prospects were never so bright for a great Children's Day offering. It seems that without question more schools will observe the day than ever before, and it seems also that the standard of liberality will be higher. The Sunday-school superintendents and other workers are throwing themselves into this campaign with an admirable abandon.

G. B. Baird, writing from Lu Choo Fu, China, says: "We have just closed a ten days' evangelistic meeting in which ninety men and forty women confessed their faith in Christ and his teaching." This mission is in great need of more buildings. A church building has been promised but the money could not be sent on..

Church Life

—Children's Day, First Sunday in June.

—The Ohio State Convention meets next week.

—The orders are coming in for the Bethany Graded Lessons for the summer quarter.

—The Nebraska State Convention, at Beatrice, June 7-9.

—Hospital day was observed in nearly all the Chicago churches last Sunday.

—The men have had their day for foreign missions, now give the children their chance.

—Commencements and convention addresses —yes, the Christian Century will publish the reports if they constitute real news.

—Many of our leading preachers and educators sail for Europe next week, and will attend the missionary Conference at Edinburgh.

—The next month represents the last long mile of the work of the year. It is a time for the redoubling of effort to bring all things up in good order—the finances, the church membership, the missionary contributions. The pastor who has succeeded in this month will enjoy his vacation.

B. F. Cato, pastor at Beaumont, Tex., delivered the commencement sermon at Center recently.

A. E. Dubber, Greeley, Colo., will have some time this summer, which he can devote to holding meetings.

W. E. Bobbitt of Woodland, Calif., being in a meeting at Colusa, his pulpit was supplied May 8 by J. K. Ballou of Colusa.

J. E. Lynn is delivering a series of sermons on the Lord's Prayer at the Central Church, Pueblo. He is securing a good hearing.

The Sunday school at Wellsville, Ohio, has just organized a cradle roll department with twenty-one members, and a home department of eight members. C. L. Morrison is pastor.

Allen Wilson and L. B. Conrad are still in their meeting at Arkansas City, Ark., where W. H. Popplewell is the pastor. There have been sixty-five additions to date.

A young men's Bible study club is a feature of the work at the Third Church, Richmond, Va. The club meets during the week.

T. S. Tinsley has resigned as pastor of the Third Church, Louisville, Ky., and becomes county evangelist for the Sunday schools of Jefferson County.

The dedication of the First Church, Roanake, Va., was held the third Sunday in May. This is said to be the most beautiful building owned by the Disciples of Virginia.

"Character and Service" and "The Light of the World" were the subjects of the sermons by Dr. Herbert L. Willett at the Memorial Church, Chicago, last Sunday.

L. L. Faris, after two years of service as Sunday school evangelist for Ohio, has resigned. During his work the Sunday schools of the state have made marked improvement.

Malcolm L. Norment, one of the bright young men of the Third Church, Richmond, Va., will enter college next fall to prepare himself for the work of the Christian ministry.

J. M. VanHorn, who recently closed his work with the church in Toronto, Canada, will supply the pulpit of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, until a permanent pastor is called.

The century men's club of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, has raised $300 for the support of Ho Chunfi Gwan as a student in Hiram College. He is a graduate of the Union College, Nankin.

The church at North Yakima, under the leadership of Morton L. Rose, is making remarkable progress in all lines. Their missionary offering for the year will reach a total of $1,100.

Walter Mansell is in demand for commencement addresses this year. He has performed such service at Fountain City, and is booked for Washington, and at Crawfordsville, Ind., where he is pastor.

The First Church, Springfield, Ill., is now at the task of raising money for their new building in earnest. The present estimate is that the building will cost one hundred thousand dollars.

Crayton S. Brooks of the Park Christian Church, New Castle, Pa., was the principal speaker at the laying of the corner stone of the new church at Butler, Pa. This edifice will cost about $15,000.

"The Quest for Authority in Religion" was the subject of a paper read before the Northern California Ministerial Meeting by Frank E. Boren, the pastor of the church at Vacaville.

Over twenty boys of the Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, N. Y., have enlisted with the annual camping party that will spend two weeks this summer somewhere on the shores of Lake Erie.

James Egbert, who was called by the church at College City, Calif., to succeed Charles A. Young, has declined the call, and it is said that the church will not now extend another call before fall.

At the annual commencement of Union Theological Seminary of New York City, held Tuesday evening, May 17, the degree of Bachelor of Divinity was conferred on Walter S. Rounds, minister of the Third Church of Christ, Brooklyn, N. Y.

W. F. Rothenberger of the Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, Ohio, gave an excellent address on "Personal Work" before the Hiram College Ministerial Association on the evening of May 12. The association has a membership of forty-three.

Our native church at Caridad, Manila, Philippine Islands, has a prayer meeting at four o'clock in the morning. This meeting has been sustained without a break for two years. After the prayer meeting the Christians eat their breakfast and go to church.

The church at Oakland, Calif., where T. A. Boyer ministers, has laid the corner stone of a new building. A portion of the building will be ready for occupancy in about three months. This part alone will cost about $25,000 and will seat 600 persons.

The Christian Ministerial Association of Northern California, in their recent meeting at Berkeley, unanimously adopted a resolution protesting against the Jeffries-Johnson fight which is announced for one of the cities of that state on the fourth of July.

The Virginia Christian College commencement will be held May 27-31. The features of the program are: an oratorical contest, baccalaureate sermon by H. P. Atkins, Richmond, Va., and commencement address by Peter Ainslie.

C. M. Williams, president of the Liberty Ladies' College, occupied the pulpit of the First Church, Sunday evening, May 15, Pastor R. G. Frank being at Plattsburg for an address before the graduating class of the high school.

Charles E. Varney sends the following telegram regarding the meeting at Dowagiac, Mich.: "Great meeting here with the help of the indefatigable minister, S. C. Brock. The Varneys have excellent support. Total of sixty confessions to date. Continue for one week. The Varneys have a full chautauqua schedule for the summer."

Dr. M. E. Poland, Nantungchow, China, writes as follows: "About two months ago I saved the life of the daughter-in-law of a wealthy man in Nantungchow, the superintendent of one of our large schools. Today he sent me a gift of $100 to be applied toward our hospital building with the assurance of his best wishes for our success."

David H. Shields received the confession of three young men and three young women, Sunday morning, May 15. In the evening this church and the Presbyterian church of the city held a union meeting in which reports of the Chicago Missionary Congress were made by the five men who had attended the great meeting.

Milton B. Madden, living link missionary of the North Tonawanda (N. Y.) Church, will soon visit the church which sustains him, and will start there a Sandai exhibit, which will be added to from time to time and will serve as a constant suggestion of the world-wide work the church has undertaken.

Worthy of imitation as bringing the church into closer relations with social effort about it, is the example of the First Church, Lexington, Ky., in devoting an evening to the work of the juvenile court, with an address by C. C. Menzler, probation officer of that court.

The following telegram from Berkeley, Va, has been received: "Just beginning a union meeting in South Norfolk. Tent seating twelve hundred is crowded at every service. Four days of invitation with thirty-six confessions. Fifteen hundred present last night. W. B. Hendershot, our evangelist, doing great preaching." C. B. Richards, pastor.

The new church at Carthage, Mo., was dedicated May 8, by H. O. Breeden, and immediately the church began a meeting under the leadership of Mr. Breeden. On the first Sunday of the meeting there were more than four hundred in the Sunday school, and a most encouraging start was made for a great meeting.

A. E. Dubber, Greeley, Colo., calls our attention to an error in last week's paper, where we are made to say that J. E. Lynn becomes pastor of the Greeley church. Mr. Lynn, as most of our readers know from previous announcement, goes to Pueblo, not Greeley. Meanwhile, Mr. Dubber's work grows more and more fruitful in Greeley.

The following men, Disciples, will receive the degree of Bachelor of Divinity from the Yale Divinity School at summer convocation: George S. McClary, Clarence M. Snail and H. M. Hall. The Christian Century rejoices to see an increasing number of our men take the amount of post graduate work represented by the bachelor's degree from one of the great universities or seminaries.

A telegram received from Bruce Brown under date of May 15 tells of the meeting at Spokane, Wash.: "Seventy today, 236 in nine days' invitation. This big city profoundly moved. Audience of men packed auditorium theater today. All churches cooperating. Scoville mighty preacher and tireless worker. He has company of six trained specialists. Great victory in sight."

R. E. McKnight is the new pastor of the church at Oxnard, Calif. He is pleased with the prospects for the growth of the church.

Dean H. H. Guy has been making a tour of the churches of southern California in the interest of Berkeley Bible Seminary.

George L. Thorpe, who has been serving the church at Wheatland, Calif., for the past year, has accepted a call to Geyserville, and is at work.

George B. VanArsdall, pastor of the Central Church, Denver, preached a sermon in observance of "Mothers' Day" which was generously reported by the daily press of the city. The patriotic organizations of the city were present at the service by special arrangement, and the preacher dealt with the call for a patriotism today that could forget the difference between the wearers of the blue and the wearers of the gray.

Dr. and Mrs. C. L. Pickett and their children are enroute from the Philippine Islands to the United States. They have been working as medical missionaries in these newly acquired possessions of the United States for six years. They will spend a year visiting in Nebraska, Minnesota, California and Colorado, and then report to the American Christion Missionary Society for further duty.

The San Joaquin Valley, Calif., has now been thoroughly organized as a missionary district. Ray O. Miller, Fresno, is the president and A. E. Mackay secretary. It has been decided to raise a special fund of $300 to assist in establishing the work at Lindsay. In this district there are seventeen churches, of which sixteen have settled pastors.

F. G. Baird, Lu Cheo Fu, China, says that the hospital at that point is full and overflowing and even the gate house is being used as a ward. From one or two hundred patients come to the clinic every day for treatment. One Chinese helper spends the entire morning with the patients preaching the gospel and talking of their soul salvation.

The Christian Endeavor Society of the Vine St. Church, Nashville, Tenn., will furnish a room or ward in the new hospital that is to be rebuilt at Betang, on the border of Tibet. It is from this church that Dr. Loftis went out to Tibet, and from this church Dr. Hardy will go to take his place. A church's power to give is in proportion to their use of the power they have.

A. C. Smither, Los Angeles, recently assisted the church at Whittier, Calif., in a meeting. "The object of the meeting was not so much to gather in numbers as to give inspiration and impetus to the church." The pastor, W. H. Martin, says that the meeting more than met their expectations. There were eight confessions, though the field had been thoroughly gleaned in a meeting held but a few weeks previously.

Frank E. Boren, Vacaville, Calif., is preaching a series of sermons on the following topics: "The Emmanuel Movement," "The Influence of Mind Over the Body," "The Subconscious Mind and the Law of Suggestion," "Christian Science," "Mental Healing in Daily Life." The people of our churches need the facts of mental phenomena as they are being discovered placed before them, and the pastor who does this thoroughly is performing a good service.

During the month of May, P. J. Rice, pastor at El Paso, Texas, will preach a series of Sunday evening sermons on Jesus' answers to life's most serious questions. The topics will be as follows: "How to Be happy"; "How to Be Useful"; "How to Be Good"; "How to Be Social"; "How to Be Successful." The music will be spirited, the preaching pointed and practical and the fellowship fraternal.

Charles E. Varney, evangelist, was recently confronted with a situation which demanded cool headedness. He was in a meeting at Dowagiac, Mich., when a slight blaze was discovered on the roof of the church. Mr. Varney continued his preaching while a stream of water was turned upon the blaze, extinguishing it, without even an interruption of the service. At the close of the service the announcement of the fire was made.

E. N. Duty, pastor of the church at Minerva, Ohio, is preaching a series of evangelistic sermons, leading up to a decision day service which will be held in the Sunday school, June 5. During the past two weeks there have been thirteen additions to this church. The Sunday school has outgrown the capacity of the house, and a committee is at work upon plans for additional class rooms, to be erected at the cost of from $1600 to $1800.

B. S. Ferrall of the Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, N. Y., recently conducted a study in the life of John Mark, at a Wednesday evening meeting of the Payne Ave. Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., where V. W. Blair is pastor. This church held a union meeting with the Baptist Church, when a report of the Laymen's Missionary Congress in Chicago was made by the pastor of the Christian church. Mr. Blair was also one of those to make a report of the meeting at the Y. M. C. A. meeting the following Sunday.

The enlarged and new West Side church, Springfield, Ill., was dedicated May 15. Oliver W. Stewart was master of the ceremonies, preaching morning and evening. In the afternoon there was a fellowship meeting in which many of the neighboring churches were represented. The enlarged auditorium is seated with oak pews, there is a basement, and ladies' parlors, cloak rooms, toilets, pastor's study, and many class rooms. The cost of these improvements was about $11,000. This congregation was organized but eight years ago under the leadership of J. E. Lynn, who was its first pastor. There are now 728 members. F. M. Rogers and J. R. Golden have been the pastors since Mr. Lynn.

The Colorado Summer Assembly will be held at Pinecliffe, Colo., July 24-August 4, inclusive. Pinecliffe is thirty-seven miles, less than two hours, out of Denver, at an elevation of 8,000 feet and in the midst of the most beautiful scenery of the Rocky Mountains. This will be the sixth session of the Assembly at Pinecliffe. Beginning very modestly it has grown to be an institution of influence and power for our cause in the West. Brethren thinking to spend their vacation in the mountains are requested to inquire of this gathering and plan to attend. Information will be furnished by J. E. Pickett. president of the Assembly, 3441 Alcott street, Denver, or Arthur E. Pierce, Pinecliffe, Colo.

The following report tells of good work: The annual meeting of Christian Church at Pasadena, Cal., was held May 4. All reports were most encouraging. There were sixty-five additions during the year. Total money raised for all purposes, $15,200, including $5,600 general expenses, $3,450 on building fund, $4,460 for new pipe organ, and $1,700 for missions, including $700 raised by the C. W. B. M. The Ladies' Aid Society raised $1,200 during the year, and paid $1,000 of this amount on the debt. The four Christian Endeavor societies all gave excellent reports. Plans are completed for a meeting in November with H. O. Breeden as evangelist. William C. Hull is the minister.

The church at Blandinsville, Ill., will make a permanent improvement by way of a new building this year. The church decided to not let the contract till pledges to the building fund had reached ten thousand dollars ($10,000). This condition is now met and the architect is now at work on the plans. The building when complete will cost between fifteen and twenty thousand dollars. It will be Gothic in style, constructed of pressed brick. The main room will seat 500 people, and the Sunday-school room will seat 300 people. So 800 people can be seated in view of the pulpit. Several individual class rooms will be built. The basement will be fitted up with a fine banquet room with closets and kitchen. The contract for the building will likely be let by the last of June. The men's class now enrolls about 150 men, eighty-five of whom were present last Sunday. C. R. Wolford is the worthy minister at Blandinsville.

Oliver W. Stewart so well known the country over for his championship of the cause of temperance and prohibition, was early in the present year chosen field secretary of the American Temperance Board with headquarters at Franklin, Ind. Mr. Stewart is one of the most useful men among the Disciples, and is deservedly popular. He is still a young man and may hope for many years of service yet in his espoused cause. Mr. Stewart was born in Mercer County, Ill., in 1867. In his boyhood he worked on a farm in Iowa, and attended school at same time. He began his career as a teacher in Henry and Knox counties, Ill. During this year he was elected organizer of the District Lodge of Knight Templars, and thus began his work for temperance. In 1890 Mr. Stewart grad uated from Eureka College. Then he began as pastor at Mackinaw, at same time serving as secretary of the Christian Endeavor Union of the state; afterward he became its president. In 1896 Mr. Stewart was chosen chairman of the prohibition state committee, and in 1900 of the national committee.

An announcement of general interest and of great moment to the churches of the Disciples everywhere is the decision of the trustees of the Texas Christian University to remove the institution to Fort Worth. "The inducements offered by Fort Worth are most liberal. The university is to receive a grant of fifty acres of land for a campus, situated in a district that meets every requirement of health and beauty. The property will be provided with all modern conveniences, artesian water, sewerage, electric lights, electric cars, and natural gas will be available. In addition Fort Worth gives a cash bonus of $200,000 toward the erection of the buildings. This is an exceedingly generous offer and the university will greatly profit by it." It is understood that there will be a call upon the friends of the college for $100,000 to be raised within a few months, in addition to the magnificent sum of $200,000 given by the citizens of Fort Worth. The removal of the institution will be so arranged that not a single day of work in the college will be lost. Great credit is due the citizens of Fort Worth, the trustees of the university and the friends everywhere for the faithful and statesmanlike work which has made possible this victory out of the loss of the fire.

The church at Plymouth, Pa., celebrated the fifty-eighth anniversary of its organization the second Sunday in April, making a special offering on that date of $1,400.

Charles A. Finch, Topeka, Kansas, is to deliver the baccalaureate sermon before the graduating class of the high school of that city.

I. J. Cahill presented the work of Home Missions before the church at Fairbury, Ill., April 27. Guy L. Zerby is pastor of this church.

Richard Bagby, pastor of the Dunmore Church, Scranton, Pa., has resigned to accept a call to the church at Clifton Forge, Va.

F. W. Emerson of Redlands, succeeds R. P. Shepherd as state secretary of California. H. C. Holmes goes from Laurenceville, Ill., to take Mr. Emerson's work at Redlands.

W. F. Rothenburger, pastor of the Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, Ohio, gave an address on "Personal Work" before the ministerial association of Hiram College, which is highly commended.

P. C. Macfarlane of the Brotherhood was called suddenly to California two weeks ago to attend the funeral of his aged mother. Mrs. Macfarlane's membership with the Disciples dates back many years.

The church at Lathrop, Mo., where Baxter Waters is pastor, has built a new parsonage at a cost of $2,000. Nevertheless, the church has not allowed missionary offerings to fall off, but has even increased them.

James R. McIntyre, pastor at Santa Monica, Cal., is very hopeful over the prospects for great development in the church there. Things were never better with the church than now.

O. L. Smith gives the Memorial Day address at Emporia, Kansas. Mr. Smith has been in Emporia but a short time, and this invitation coming to him from the G. A. R. is testimony to the worth of his work.

DeLoss Smith, who is studying music in the East, is frequently pressed into service by the churches of New York for help in their programs, and to give special musical concerts. He never fails to attract the people, and to please them.

The Fulton Ave. Mission, Baltimore, is without a pastor. This mission receives a contribution of $900 from the A. C. M. S., and this, of course, is increased by the offerings on the field. Those interested in the work should address Otto Hueg, 1520 Ruskin avenue.

"The Dance of Salome" was the subject of the address by Dr. W. Bayard Craig at the morning at the Lenox Avenue Christian Church, 74 West 126th street, recently. In the evening of the same date Mr. P. C. Macfarlane, general secretary of the Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ, spoke on the topic, "A Man's Work in a Man's Way."

An Institute of Social Service has recently been held in the First Church, Vincennes, Indiana, of which William Oeschger is the pastor, just closing a ten years' service. Those who spoke during the institute were: Harry G. Hill, Third Church, Indianapolis; S. D. Dutcher, Terre Haute, Ind., and T. J Clarke, of Albion, Iowa. A. W. Conner recently delivered a lecture on "The Boy Problem" in this church.

J. E. Lynn has begun work with the church in Pueblo, Colo., and expresses himself as pleased with climate and people. We are sure that this marks the beginning of another successful work, which Mr. Lynn will add to that accomplished at Springfield, Ill., and Warren, Ohio. The church will observe as "Home Coming" day, May 20, when an effort will be made to secure the attendance of all Disciples living within reach of the church.

A beautiful brick building, erected at the cost of $20,000.00, was dedicated by the church at Arlington, Ind., the first of May. F. M. Rains was in charge of the services. This church has a foundation of St. Paul limestone, with upper part of shale brick. The auditorium is covered with a cork carpet, and seated with oak pews. There is a gallery which will accommodate 170 persons. The basement is thoroughly finished and used as a kitchen and dining rooms and for Sunday-school purposes. E. S. Conner, of Irvington, Ind., is the pastor of the church.

The "Front Rank" Certificate

On the first Lord's Day in June it will be possible for a Bible-school to have satisfied every requirement of the 1910 "Front Rank" standard. Hence beginning on this date, the certificates will be issued. Since the Pittsburg Convention, this campaign has been on and it has helped the Bible-schools everywhere in all departments. Of course the schools that were already nearest to this standard have had the least work to do to get it, and for them the race has been a short one. Some schools have been working hard to reach it for six or seven months and it simply goes to show that it is no easy thing to become a "Front Rank" school.

No school can excuse itself from this campaign because of size. The average school among us is one with an attendance of seventy-five in a school room, for the average school the standard was framed.

The goal has been 1,000 "Front Rank" schools before the Topeka Convention. In various states more than 100 schools have stated that they have practically reached the standard. Until the Foreign Missionary offering is made, however, no school has been entitled to receive the certificate, hence the first certificate has yet to be issued.

The application blanks are in the hands of the State Bible-school secretaries and may be had free upon writing either to your State Bible-school secretary, or to the National Bible-school secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society. Order one sent to you even though you are short in some respects now, for it will help you to shape your work to know just what questions are asked of you. If you are having trouble, make your wants and difficulties known. Let us make this "Front Rank" standard count for much from now until the Topeka convention.

ROBERT M. HOPKINS,
Bible-school Secretary,

Texas Christian Missionary Convention

Everyone said that it was the greatest state convention Texas ever held. It was well attended, the large auditorium of the Central Christian Church being overflowed at nearly every session, and at the closing meeting, the Prohibition Rally, the largest church-building in the city, seating three-thousand, was well filled.

The key-note of the address of the president of the convention, Dr. G. A. Faris, which was urgent of faith and courage to "go up and possess the land" seemed to be accepted as the standard for the proceedings of the whole convention.

The masculine element was especially prominent. Fully six-hundred men were in continual attendance at the sessions and J. K. Shellenberger, National Brotherhood fild-secretary, and J. O. Shelburne, president Texas Brotherhood, spoke to 1,000 men in the great Men's Meeting on Tuesday evening. The Men's Banquet was a popular feature of the convention.

Parallel with the men's sessions and on Monday evening, the ladies of the C. W. B. M. held their meetings. Mrs. M. E. Harlan, National corresponding secretary, was the chief speaker in most of these meetings and was enthusiastically received.

Mr. M. B. Madden, a Missionary of the Foreign Society now on furlough, gave a bright and instructive address, on the C. W. B. M. proess.

Miss Virginia Hearne, the Texas corresponding secretary, resigned and will be succeeded October 1 by Miss Lulu Reed of Beaumont.

The absence of P. C. McFarlane on account of the death of his mother was greatly regretted, and sympathy was expressed and prayer offffered for him by the Texas convention.

The presence and addresses of our national mission secretaries, Grant K. Lewis, of the Home Board, and E. W. Allen, of the For-Board were inspiring and greatly helpful.

Intense interest was shown in the Bible-school session as might have been expected with Marion Stephenson on the program. The entire program was practical and instructive. It was announced at this session that the State Board had employed Edward Owers of Graham as State Bible-school Evangelist.

The Christian Endeavor hour was presided over by Mr. Carl Beeman, president of the Texas Christian Endeavor Union. Here Mr. Stephenson proved that he could also deliver a Christian Endeavor address.

Reports of the Orphans' Home, were most encouraging. There are about eighty children

FOR THE SUMMER QUARTER

Now is the time to send your order for the Bethany Graded Sunday School Lessons for the Summer Quarter, beginning July 1.

Many schools will install the Graded Lessons in the Summer so as to "get used" to them by the opening of the new season in October.

In October there will be four new courses added to the three that have been running the past year.

Next year will be a rich year for the Graded Schools. Get ready for it by introducing the Bethany Lessons July 1.

in the Home, all of whom were brought in to the convention on Tuesday afternoon and rendered a creditable program, and a brighter, happier-faced set of well-dressed and intelligent looking children we have not seen.

The Old Peoples' Home at the edge of Munger Place, Dallas, is nearing completion, and is a beautiful and appropriate structure for the use which it is to serve. Both of these homes are of the National Benevolent Association and were made possibly by the gifts of Sister Fowler, of Dallas, now deceased. The convention made an offering of $3,000 for Texas benevolence for the coming year.

Wednesday was Texas Mission Day. Short addresses were made by Judge Anson Rainey, chairman of the State Mission Board, and by the different state missionaries. J. C. Mason, corresponding secretary, gave his tabulated report of the mission work for the eleven months since the last convention as follows: Number persons employed during year, 45; number days, 5,217; number sermons, 3,854; baptisms, 988; by statement and letter, 949; otherwise, 209; net gain, 1,164; total, 2,156; cash raised by missionaries in field, $20,557.90; cash raised by missionaries for church lots, houses, and ministers at mission points, $19,005.35; cash for all purposes, $39,563.25; pledges taken, $34,489.00; mission visits, 601; churches organized, 26; churches dedicated, 9; houses built, 12.

The corresponding secretary and the future work committee recommended that "from this convention we enter most heartily into a spring and summer campaign of New Testament evangelism" that, it is hoped, will effect the conquest and occupation of some of the many rich fields holding out to us the challenge of "opportunity." For this purpose $2,500 was given by the convention and other funds will be added later.

Location of Texas Christian University

The trustees of Texas Christian University reached a decision respecting the location during the Texas State Convention, and their action was heartily endorsed, first by the men in their Brotherhood meeting, and then by the Convention itself. The University is to be located at Fort Worth. While the brethren in the other cities bidding for it, Dallas, Waco and Gainesville, are disappointed, there is not one dissenting voice to the final decision. Everybody recognizes that the Trustees were very careful in their investigations to the minutest detail, that perfect fairness and courtesy were shown to all, and that a very wise choice has been made. It speaks much for the great brotherhood in Texas that it can act in so important a matter with splendid unanimity. Even brethren in the competing cities are pledging themselves to give liberal aid to the school at Fort Worth.

The city and churches of Fort Worth will give to the University choice of two excellent sites, either of which is estimated to be worth $50,000, besides a donation of $200,000 in cash, or options on real estate the values of which are yet to be investigated. The Brotherhood and the convention passed a resolution urging a strenuous effort to raise at once a quarter of a million dollars for endowment. There is a more intense interest in the promotion of the school than ever before in its history.

The Trustees will soon make final selection of site, have the grounds planned by a landscape artist, and receive at the earliest moment bids on the new buildings. It is hoped to have enough building done by the opening of the fall term to be able to begin work in the new university home. It is certain, however, that the main building will not be complete till a later date. Probably by next week announcement can be made concerning the site and its surroundings.

Anglo-American Conference on Christian Union

Caxton Hall, Westminster, London, July 4-6, 1910.

The arrangements for this gathering in the interests of Christian union are well under way and letters are coming by nearly every post from American brethren and sisters who are planning to be present. Twenty-five or thirty of these have definitely promised to be present and many more are expected. There will be four sessions during the two days devoted to Christian union, and the subject has been divided into the following phases: "The Necessity for Christian Union: (a) Demanded by the World's Need, (b) Demanded by the Essence of Christianity." "Bases for Union," "Things Already Accomplished: (a) By inter- and un-Denominational Effort, (b) By actual Union," and "The Outlook: (a) The Difficulties and Their Removal, (b) The Consummation." There will be two speakers at each sessions, one Englishman and one from our American brethren. The English speakers are to be Prebendary Webb-Peploe, who is not unknown in the U.. S. A., C. Silvester Horne, M. A., M. P., one of the greatest forces in the Free Churches of England and chairman for the present year of the Congregational Union, W. L. Watkinson, editor and preacher with no superior among the Wesleyans, and T. E. Ruth, of Liverpool, a rising young preacher among the Baptists, who recently refused a call to become co-pastor and successor to John Clifford. The speakers from our American brethren include, J. H. Garrison, A. McLean, Errett Gates, Charles Clayton Morrison, and we hope, W. T. Moore and Carey E. Morgan. Extensive plans are being arranged for advertising this conference and it is expected that a good hearing will be obtained from the general public. A third day's sessions has been arranged to take place at West London Tabernacle, when themes of general interest will be considered, such as the Brotherhood Movement, Work Amongst the young, Missionary Interests, and a symposium on "The Progress of our Cause in the World." Any inquiries concerning this conference should be addressed to the organizing secretary, Leslie W. Morgan, "Wringcliff" Priory Road, Hornsey, London, England.

Encouraging Reports from the Home Field

I enclose my check on Fourth National BaBnk, Jacksonville, Fla., for $50, the offering of the Eustis, Fla., church. I want you to know we have but thirty members, and you know how many in a church donate usually. Twenty-five of our thirty made an offering. We gave $60 to foreign missions, but we had about twenty winter residents who contributed.—G. D. Jackson, Treasurer.

The Ballard Church, Seattle, Wash., more than trebled its apportionment for home missions yesterday. The money will be forwarded next week.—L. E. Lakin.

Took offering last Sunday. Will continue until next Lord's Day. So far it is $30. Hope for more.—J. W. Street, Mackinaw, Ill.

Please find enclosed $14.30, the offering of the Holdenville, Okla., Christian church for American Missions. Many earnest prayers accompany this offering in behalf of the cause of missions.—A. E. Underwood.

We took our offering yesterday, although our attendance was light on account of an epidemic of measles, we have doubled the offering of last year. I am sending you a draft for $42. We are hoping that this is a good year for the A. C. M. S.—Frank Jalageas, Pastor, Langdon, Kan.

I am sending you draft for $51.25, which covers our offering of yesterday. I wish it might have been more, but it is good for this church, considering the extra pulls this year, including $2,000 cost of parsonage. Next year will make it 100.—Baxter Waters, Minister, Lathrop, Mo.

Find enclosed draft for 30 from the Bethany church for home missions. This is the amount of our apportionment. We hope to be able to send more than this amount before the year closes. I hope the churches all over the country will respond liberally for this great cause.—L. F. Drash, Pastor, Evansville, Ind.

A Plea for Calcutta

For twelve years past the C. W. B. M. has been at the task of opening a mission in the capital of India. In that time two of the great presidents who labored for that enterprise have died, and one other has been removed from her former activity by advancing years and sore bereavements. One man appointed for the work was prevented from going. Another who went was driven back home by the dire effects of the climate upon his family. A third worker sent out has been taken from the city by pressing duties elsewhere.

But through it all the people have been true to the heavenly vision that flashed upon them a dozen years ago. Year after year they have reaffirmed their purpose to have the work done. They have gathered together and sacredly devoted to Calcutta two funds that aggregate $35,000. Last year when the executive committee at Indianapolis lost heart and asked whether it might abandon Calcutta the people, through the state C. W. B. M. officers, said No. Indianapolis then promised to go on and send out new workers and use the money as its givers designed. Now another year has gone; nothing has been done; the executive committee is again asking that it may drop the work.

No wonder the people are confused. One state worker has written me: "I am all at sea over the sudden coming up again of the question of abandoning Calcutta. I do not understand. Can you tell me what is back of it all? It is painful to have this come up again, for the arguments against it when up last year were so very, very weak." Another state officer says: "I shall vote 'no,' but I am afraid this will not stem the tide. I do want to see the Calcutta work carried on."

So far as appears there is absolutely no new argument against the work. All that is urged now was urged before Calcutta was first taken up, and was then firmly put aside by the wise leaders. In a nutshell it is simply that some of the missionaries in India want all the money for their own districts. They seek to support their demand by various arguments that are futile. There are other missionaries in Calcutta with churches already established. True, there is one ordained missionary there to about every 50,000, and there are 2,400 Protestant Christians in a population of over a million and a half. The work will be very costly. Not true, after land is bought, but if true what of it to a mighty and wealthy church? All he money we can send to India can be wisely used in the Central and United Provinces. Verily, if it were a hundred fold what it is. But such an argument when used to keep money at home is anathematized by every missionary as rank heathenism. I heard all this before I went to Calcutta. Mrs. Burgess and Mrs. Moses were president and secretary then. They said I need have no fear that such considerations would be allowed to defeat the work. Now they are dead, and I am but a worn out soldier so far as service in India in concerned. And it seems that their work and my work is to be destroyed. May God bring to naught all such counsels!

I had not thought to appeal to our people in behalf of this cause. But it may be lost if I do not, and when I keep silent I am like Jeremiah whose message became a burning fire shut up in his bones. I must ask that the people who have stood by this work do not desert it now. You did your work and gave your money for Calcutta. See to it that it goes nowhere else. We need to be in that city to make our work great in India. The city needs our gospel for its heathenism and our plea for its Christianity. Honor to the dead, keeping good faith with the living, demand no backward step.

The call for votes against Calcutta has been out some time. Many may have yielded to its insistence. But the people can save the day. As individuals and auxiliaries write your national and state officers. Insist for delay if a favorable vote is not now possible. There can be no need for haste in killing a work when there have been so many years of delay in carrying it forward. If the people decide against it after full consideration in district and state and national conventions I will yield to their wisdom. But I am persuaded they will not so decide. From one end of our land to the other I have addressed thousands of you in this behalf face to face. Thousands more have read the printed messages I sent forth when the funds were being raised for it. Do not neglect this final message for the cause.

Illinois Notes

The field secretary attended the ordination of Charles H. Day at his home church, Cuba, A. I. Zeller, minister.

Between trains at Lewiston he found B. H. Cleaver beginning a series of meetings.

He dedicated the new building at Sesser, a new town, and the church has a fine field.

A call at Centralia to attend the ordination of F. M. Warren found the new building coming on well and J. F. Rosborough, the minister, properly pleased.

The Southern Ministerial Institute, Du-Quoin, was up to its usual standard, and W. B. Slater of Mississippi was a visitor. G. W. Wise and the other men of the church gave the brethren a banquet.

Indiana's Splendid Convention

Indiana's most enthusiastic, best attended and "promiseful" convention in a quarter century was held May 16-18 with the great church at Anderson, Ind.

E. M. Barney, state corresponding secretary, had taken hold of the local reins for a few Sundays prior to the coming of the delegates and with rare good humor acted as temporary pastor in the congregation's behalf while the responsibilities of the meeting were on.

The call had been issued at the eleventh hour for a men's banquet as the initial attraction, and while the hopes of Mr. Barney piloting the Anderson ladies in their preparations were high, when the march of men began on last Monday evening at six thirty o'clock they came with such steady tread as to fill all available tables, spaces, and then range about the walls of the church parlors for lap service. Above two hundred men were on deck.

I. J. Spencer of Lexington, Ky., had been engaged by the ministerial association as the chief convention speaker, presenting three addresses, the initial one on Monday night dealing with the local bishopric in the New Testament. He made a plea of force and persuasive convincing worth, for the restoration of the New Testament eldership of the local church to its originally rightful lines of responsibility in the teaching and ruling of the congregations. His second address on Tuesday evening dealt in broad and high way with the Lordship of Jesus, while his third address on Wednesday focussed in a round table discussion of the problems incident to the bishopric. The three were pleasing, profitable studies, constructively, convincingly presented, and Hoosierdom readily grants the acknowledgment of her indebtedness to this splendid son of the Blue Grass State for worth-while messages on the occasion of this appreciated visit.

Bible studies were made the general devotional feature of the convention meetings and were conducted by Vernon Stauffer on "The Sermon on the Mount"; by J. C. Todd on "The Parables of Jesus"; by Walter Mansell on "The Miracles of Jesus"; by W. G. Johnson on "The Passion of Jesus." As a variation from the hackneyed style of devotion they were pleasing and profitable, and the names of the men presenting them are sufficient evidence of their uniform value.

"Stereopticon views and illustrated songs! A tour of the Dark Continent tonight at 8 o'clock in the open air! Corner Lawrence Ave. and Leavitt St. FOLLOW THE CROWD!!"

THE above and similar other calls thrilled the air for many blocks as two men marched up and down the streets announcing, through a large red megaphone, the open-air meetings that were held every night, except Saturday, for three successive weeks in a quiet neighborhood of West Ravenswood, Chicago.

The effect upon the little community was magical, and from the very first the people gathered in such large crowds from all directions, that it was not difficult to "follow the crowd." All were filled with speculation as to just what the character of the "Picture Show" would be, but most people suspected that another "medicine company" had come to town. So it was, but instead of passing out "roots and herbs," a little company of Christian workers literally led the masses to the Great Physician who not only "healeth all our diseases," but who taketh away the underlying cause, "the sin of the world."

Whole families attended the services night after night, and hundreds were reached who had never before attended real gospel meetings. One woman was heard to say in a surprised tone of voice: "Why, I thought these people were against God." Souls were born into the Kingdom and some were filled with the Holy Spirit and labored earnestly for the salvation of others.

Through these services the whole community came to know the ministers and Christian workers in a manner that opened their hearts and homes to them, and to an extent that could not have been effected by many years of earnest toil in the ordinary method. It is really the Lord's own way of reaching the masses.

Jesus says: "Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men." Will you follow Him into the open air this Summer?

The prime interest of the delegates, above three hundred in number, was centered in the business sessions, and especially in the report of the committee on constitutional revision. Spirited discussions characterized every business session, and the gist of the changes made, or practically assured, was first in the consolidation of the interests of the State Missionary Society, the Sunday School Association and the Endeavor Society. Heretofore these organizations have been directed by separate boards, but under the new constitution their management devolves upon one board of twenty-one members whose places of residence cover the entire state, and of which twenty-one men, ten are "business" men and eleven ministers. The entire board chooses its own executive committee distinct from convention officers. The second matter of forwardness was constitutional provision for delegate representation at the conventions, on the basis of one delegate for every hundred members or major fraction therof.

Evangelists Legg, Rose and Chapple presented the usual encouraging chronicles of commendable work accomplished, which were enthusiastically adopted.

The ministerial session of the convention was occupied with consideration of an address by the president, E. F. Daugherty, on "The Minister Among Other Ministers," and its plea for fewer convention—bi-annual in fact—and the showing of a higher conscience on the part of the ministers in attendance upon them all. The three ministerial institutes of the state were abolished as undesired after three years' trial. Ministerial officers for the year were elected, viz., H. A. Denton, Bedford, president; Walter Mansell, Crawfordsville, vice president; E. E. Moorman, Indianapolis, secretary-treasurer.

In behalf of the C. W. B. M., Vernon Stauffer gave a gem of an address on "Woman's Work."

The address of L. E. Brown of Lebanon, convention president, received proper recognition in his continuance at the helm for another year, together with his associates, C. H. Winders as vice president and E. E. Moorman as secretary-treasurer.

Gary L. Cook, Sunday school superintendent for the state, presented the best report of years. The Sunday school sessions occupied the whole of Wednesday afternoon in a series of simultaneous conferences upon the various parts of the Sunday school interests, while the adult class luncheon in the evening was a feature with five ten-minute addresses in answer to practical questions of Sunday school life, answered by competent specialists in every address.

The spirit of T. W. Grafton in organization and stability lingered about the Anderson church building, and so well had E. M. Barney taken hold on the local preparations that the absence of a regular pastor was scarcely noticeable.

W. H. Book of Columbus was floating about with an insistent invitation for the next meeting with the Tabernacle Church, and there it will be, the seventy-second annual convention of the Churches of Christ in Indiana.

Many Women who are Splendid Cooks dread having to prepare an elaborate dinner because they are not sufficiently strong to stand over an intensely hot coal range. This is especially true in summer. Every woman takes pride in the table she sets, but often it is done at tremendous cost to her own vitality through the weakening effect of cooking on a coal range in a hot kitchen.

It is no longer necessary to wear yourself out preparing a fine dinner. Even in the heat of summer you can cook a large dinner without being worn out.

New Perfection
WICK BLUE FLAME
Oil Cook-stove

Gives no outside heat, no smell, no smoke. It will cook the biggest dinner without heating the kitchen or the cook. It is immediately lighted and immediately extinguished. It can be changed from a slow to a quick fire by turning a handle. There's no drudgery connected with it, no coal to carry, no wood to chop. You don't have to wait fifteen or twenty minutes till its fire gets going. Apply a light and it's ready. By simply turning the wick up or down you get a slow or an intense heat on the bottom of the pot, pan, kettle or oven, and nowhere else. It has a Cabinet Top with shelf for keeping plates and food hot, drop shelves for coffee, teapot or saucepan, and even a rack for towels. It saves time, worry, health and temper. It does all a woman needs and more than she expects. Made with 1, 2, and 3 burners; the 2 and 3-burner sizes can be had with or without Cabinet.

MOTHERS' DAY.

No element in either national or domestic life is more important than the mothers of our country. Home virtues are the safeguards of our existence. Our mothers are their highest exemplifications. How better realize this and how better renew the early influence of either a departed or a living mother than by setting apart a day for her whose life was full of denial and self-sacrifice for her sons and daughters. No Memorial day can be richer in personal experience than one in which we hear again a mother's voice that is stilled and feel the touch of her vanished hand, or if she be living, give her the day with your presence in loving reunion one day for the many she gave you, or send her a line of greeting warmer than you have been wont to do.—Governor Harmon of Ohio, in Proclamation to observe the day.

A DISTINCTION WITHOUT A DIFERENCE

This doctrine of Mr. Roosevelt's is sound, every word of it. It is the same doctrine that Mr. William Jennings Bryan made familiar in his first campaign. He packed it into epigrammatic form in the phrase, "The man above the dollar." Mr. Debs, again, is firmly convinced that human rights conflict with property rights in a profound manner; while Count Tolstoy goes further still. In fact, the doctrine so solemnly set forth by Mr. Roosevelt leaves us exactly where it finds us; and every man Jack of us, from Senator Aldrich to Herr Bebel, can subscribe to it without fear that it will incommode him.—New York Nation.

Finishing One's Work

ARE YOU READY FOR A VACATION?

The question is not, Are your goods packed, your tickets bought, your place selected? Those are unimportant details.

Nor yet is it, Do you need a vacation? That we may take for granted. Everybody needs a vacation, if not because his work has worn him out, then because a change will bring to him new and richer outlook and energy.

But are you ready? Have you made the year such a year as a vacation naturally fits onto? As you look back over the year's work does it bring you a solid sense of progress in the thing you engaged in, a sense of real achievement, of completeness?

It is well for us before we go forth to our holiday to let the year pass before us in retrospect, to see it whole, to analyze it and to judge it.

We shall certainly find faults enough in it. We shall see where we tried and failed, and where we failed to try at all.

But in the years of most of us the constant, persistent flaw that runs through all the days and that now mars the total cycle is the sense of incompleteness—incomplete from day to day, incomplete now that the year is done.

We learn many arts and tricks of living. But one art we master only by much struggle and grace—what someone calls "the fine art of finishing."

We are ever in arrears. Much of today is taken up with doing what we should have done yesterday. Much of next year will be taken up with doing what we should have done the past year.

There is no better time to face the perverseness in our nature that is responsible for this rag-edged character of our days and years than just before we go on a vacation.

It does not follow that we should penalize ourselves for our fault by giving up the holiday and turning back resolutely to our task again. But without morbidness we should faithfully examine our methods and motives of work and instruct our hearts in the secret by which the days may be built into next year like solid blocks of granite in a finished temple.

Let it be clear that by "work" we do not mean merely one's vocation—his business or profession. Nor yet do we mean simply what commonly is called "Christian work," for which the church affords so rich an opportunity. By "work" is meant all this and more.

One's "work" is what one ought to do.

It includes the daily task by which one's livelihood is made. It includes those courtesies and self-denials demanded of him who enjoys the privileges and inspirations of home and friendship. It includes the service of helpfulness in neighborhood and church. It includes the obligations for the enrichment of one's personality in mind and heart,—obligations based not in selfishness but in the ethical purpose to make oneself worth as much as possible in every relationship of life.

One's work, in a word, is one's life regarded in terms of duty. And it is the lack of wholeness, of completeness, the haunting sense of constant arrearage, that rebukes us as we earnestly look back over the year before letting it go.

In this work-aspect of our life, as in every other aspect, we find that Christ has provided help for us. We are well along toward practical salvation if we have learned to bring our days and years into the presence of Christ, the master Workman. Here as everywhere in our moral life Christ is without the sin for which our hearts now shame us.

Christ came amongst men as a worker. And at the close of his life he said without self-deception, "I have finished the work thou gavest me to do."

It was big work. It was busy work. No critic of Jesus ever called him an idler. There are the signs of strenuousness and vigor upon every page of his biography. At twelve he assured his mother that he "must be about his father's business."

From the carpenter shop he passed into a strenuous public ministry. Here we find him engaged constantly. Crowds surrounded him. They formed at the door of the house where he was preaching. They came early in the morning with their sick to be healed. They broke up his holiday by following him around the lake into the desert place. Only at night had he leisure to pray.

No loitering, leisurely ministry here. Likely he was aged prematurely by his strenuous toiling, for some guessed him to be fifty years old when he was but thirty-two. His task was serious. The time was short. The will of God drove him on.

But as we watch the busy Master we cannot fail to observe his calm orderliness at his work. Each day seemed complete. He betrays no distraction due to unfinished tasks.

With a steadiness and balance that mark him one of the sanest of men he moves easily among his duties and keeps his work ever ahead of him. There are no arrears from day to day. Sleep came to him easily, as when he lay in the boat and slept through the tempest.

As disciples of Jesus, at work in mart and school, in home and church, no help from the Master is more needed than the help his example affords us in our workaday life. Christ possessed the art of finishing.

Like him we too should learn to round out the day and the year and be able at evening or at vacation time to say, "I have finished my work."

These unfinished tasks are what worry us. They deplete our vitality. They wreck health. They weaken our personal address. They prohibit our undertaking greater things.

Shall we not, before our vacation begins, carry all our unfinished tasks up into the presence of Christ, and with them our careless habit of leaving tasks unfinished, and get his secret of calm, of completeness?

There are two elements that enter into the secret of Jesus as a workman. He planned his work and he surrendered his will to his work with no reservation.

Christ selected his work. It did not come to him by luck. He was not just born to it. Neither did the Father thrust it upon him. All his intelligence and conscience were called into play in that searching experience of the Temptation, which might better be named, Christ Choosing His Life Work.

And in choosing his life work he limited himself. He recognized the impossibility of helping everybody, so he confined his work to the "lost sheep of the house of Israel."

Then, having chosen and defined his task, he surrendered his will to the doing of it. Again and again the Father spoke to him to assure him that He was well-pleased with his work thus far, and at the end he told his distracted disciples that he had finished his work and breathed upon them his peace!

This was the greatness of Jesus at his work: he took God into it. The Father was his Partner and Companion. The clear perception of God's presence brought the values of his work home to his soul. He saw that what God needed most was not that some man should succeed, but that some man should be faithful from dawn to the end of the day. Such a man, though he fail, God could make a Saviour.

It is immensely important if we follow Christ that we follow him in this as well as in other ways. It will bring an experience like a "second blessing" if we should at this end of the year lay our work alongside of Christ's work and let it be measured and judged by him.

Thus a new calmness, a new completeness, would come into the next year. And the vacation upon which we enter would prepare us to make the new year the brightest and best of our lives.

Winning Power Through Temptation

Temptation is common to us all. No one can escape it. It is inevitable. Much life means much temptation. Abounding physical life is a source of temptation. If we do not have to fight for the control of our bodies, we shall not amount to much in the moral realm. Nimbleness and comprehensiveness of intellect tempt men to despise the slow of wit and the mentally poor. Strong emotions tend to crowd out the sober thought that is needed to fit behavior to environment.

The desire of the moment may be so absorbing that it obscures the principles that have been chosen for the regulation of conduct. A healthy mind is interested in the present. It is a sign of weakness to ignore the demands of the moment and try to live in the past or in the future. But there is confusion when the lessons of the past and the hopes of the future are ignored. It is the part of a man to bring present desires into subjection to the needs of the whole life. Strength comes to him who does not permit the intense momentary desire to be the sole standard of action.

The knowledge that all men are tempted enlarges our sympathy and thereby increases our power. The man who thinks he alone has a hard struggle to maintain his standing with his conscience probably gains little from what he endures. He feels that the world is unjust to him. But let him become aware that no temptation has overtaken him but such as is common to man, and he will feel, if he is worthy to be called a man, that a sacred trust has been committed to him and that he cannot yield to temptation without betraying humanity. It is downright mean for a man to create difficulties for his neighbor by obeying appetite and by running away from painful duty.

We measure the worth of the virtues by what they cost. If we have rejected rich material rewards for the sake of truthfulness and honesty, we have a very high appreciation of these virtues. If the merchant knows that he could have increased his profits by overcharging, if the real estate agent knows that he could have induced a buyer to pay more for land than it was worth, if the editor knows that his circulation would be larger if his convictions had been of the marketable variety, these all have a genuine respect for themselves and they have a confidence in meeting men which they would not have if they had never had an opportunity to sell out their integrity.

We can do for others what they are willing that we shall do for them. The untried man does not have the confidence of other men. They do not come to him for advice and they turn from him when he freely offers advice. Nobody cares to listen to the opinions of a clumsy coward when he discourses on war. The brave and skilful veteran commands attention. The veterans of the spiritual army speak with authority and earnest persons give heed to them. The reformed drunkard wins other drunkards, not because he has wallowed in the mire, but because he knows the strength of the temptations that come to men. He invites men to follow him to victory; he does not stand on a pinnacle and shout directions to men traveling a road his feet have never touched. It is absolutely useless to preach to tempted men unless the preacher knows something of what they have to face.

Fulness of power is the possession of those whom temptation has driven to the throne of God. The weakest of men is the self-sufficient man. "Do you know what you are like?" said a wise friend to a young preacher who had exhausted himself in a foolish effort to be eloquent. "You are like a pipe closed toward the reservoir and open toward the outlet." The young man was looking in the wrong place for the source of power. He soon found that the desire to speak to the hearts of men must take the place of the ambition to be eloquent. Then he found that he was a co-worker with God and he became a great preacher. There is power in the man who commits himself without reserve to the divine order of things. Temptation is God's messenger when it reveals the weakness of the life without God and disposes it to accept help from above. "Power is made perfect in weakness." Doubtless the weakness meant here is that of individualism, of the man who tries to run the universe. When he realizes the futility of his efforts, he discovers God's way of doing things and begins to do something that is worth while.

Midweek Service, June 8. Luke 4:14; James 1:12.

Professor H. L. Willett recently delivered a series of lectures on the Life of Jesus in the Central church, Des Moines, Iowa, concerning which many grateful words have come to the Christian Century office from those who heard the addresses. The series was largely attended by students and faculties of Drake University and other Des Moines colleges in addition to the Central church members and Des Moines' citizens. Evidently the minds of some who heard Dr. Willett are greatly puzzled over some things he said. Professor A. M. Haggard, of Drake Bible College, is reporting the lectures in a series of articles in a Des Moines paper. In his initial article he published a set of twelve questions which he had sent to one hundred of the most intelligent of Professor Willett's auditors, questions which would get at the impression made by the lecturer upon the minds of these persons. The announcement of this questionaire promised much. If the material gained by this method were organized systematically and set forth it would make "mighty interesting reading." And it was a happy inspiration of Dr. Haggard's to adopt this method. But we fail to find in the subsequent installments of his report that he has utilized his questionaire in any serious and systematic fashion. In this we are disappointed. Having undertaken a good work like this, all those who are following Professor Haggard's report and analysis would wish him to complete it in a thoroughgoing manner. It is hardly a report of Dr. Willett's lectures to fill up five-sixths of the space with a dissertation on the writer's own conceptions of biblical method. The Christian Century has been expecting to get a good-sized, juicy clipping from The Christian-Union in the report of this questionaire and having had our hopes built up by the initial promise of the enterprise, we cannot give up without making a little bit of a plea.

A good illustration of the reflex influence of missionary giving on the domestic activities of the local church is afforded in the case of the Hyde Park congregation of Disciples in Chicago. Three months ago this church of 165 members undertook and carried through a campaign for backing two missionaries in China, Mr. and Mrs. Guy W. Sarvis. The story of that achievement was told in The Christian Century at the time. What they did put their modest church at the head of all the churches of the brotherhood in the matter of missionary giving, and at the head of all the churches of Chicago, of all denominations, in this same grace. And now comes a letter to our desk indicating that this same membership which has given far beyond the conventional amounts to foreign missions, is squaring itself to attack its local debt of $2,100. It hasn't been accomplished yet; it is just being proposed. But we believe the spirit and the self-sacrifice that made the raising of $1,200 for foreign missions possible will do this other also. All our Chicago churches will watch the Hyde Park congregation's undertaking with eagerness and applause, and, perhaps, with the faith to see that the way of their opportunity lies in their going and doing likewise.

A Missionary Secretary in the United States senate!—this is a proposal growing out of the Laymen's Missionary Congress held in Chicago recently. The secretary whose name is proposed for this political distinction is Mr. Robert E. Speer, leader of the Presbyterian church in things missionary. The proposer is The Living Church (Episcopalian), whose editor was that much impressed with Mr. Speer's splendid address on "Christianizing the Impact of the West upon the East." "If public men of affairs," says our Milwaukee contemporary, "could have heard the magnificent address of Robert E. Speer, we believe it would have occurred to very many of them, as it did to us, that Mr. Speer might be the best and most available man that New York could select for the senate in succession to Mr. Depew. Certainly Mr. Speer showed himself a statesman of high rank in that address; and it would be a great step forward if men of his sort might be found in the United States senate."

The University of Chicago will send another Travel Class to Egypt and Palestine at the end of January next. The class will be under the direction of Prof. Theo. G. Soares. Professors Mathews, Willett and Price have taken previous classes. Some of the members work for University credit and some join the class for the benefit of the lectures on history, literature and archaeology. Correspondence work is done during the months previous to sailing. The class next year will spend five weeks in Egypt, five weeks in Palestine, including two weeks' camping, a week in Constantinople, and visiting Greece, will close at Naples about the middle of May. Those interested may address Professor Soares at the University.

Social Survey

Loss of Life in Factories and Mines—Bad Revelations.

The Bulletin of the Bureau of Labor for September, 1908, stated that, while it is impossible to secure accurate figures of the number of accidents, fatal and otherwise, occurring among the working people of the United States, it was estimated that during that year the number of fatal accidents among occupied males would be between 30,000 and 35,000, and many times that number of non-fatal accidents. In every fatal accident, of course, one life is lost, and in some cases the loss of life runs into the hundreds. In the non-fatal accidents many are wounded and maimed for life. John Mitchell put it none too strongly when he stated in a recent speech that continual war between two great nations would be no more disastrous to human life than are accidents in our industrial world.

A Concrete Example.

The American Federation of Labor is now urging upon congress that it make an investigation of steel plants throughout the United States with special reference to ascertaining their health conditions and their precautions for preventing accidents. Such an investigation would certainly be in order. As a concrete example, the coroner's records show that in the Illinois Steel Company's plant at South Chicago there were forty-one fatal accidents last year, resulting in the deaths of forty-six men.

Steel Magnates Indifferent.

The Federation's representative declared before the congressional committee that the steel magnates are indifferent to the welfare of their employes, as illustrated by the recent investigation of the Bethlehem plant, where it was found men were compelled to work seven days a week and twelve hours a day. If the public health is to be guarded by the federal government, he would have some legislation which would in a measure protect workmen whom he described as helpless under the systems which prevail. These men, utterly exhausted by the excessive strains placed upon them, grow weak and fall victims to accidents. The awful death rate was emphasized by the citation of plants in Ohio, where in one instance enumerated it amounts to 30 per cent a year. The deaths covered are only those caused by violence and not due to natural causes. A plant employing a force of 900 people has in the last nine years killed 1,200 workmen, he said.

During the year 1909 more than 500 men lost their lives in coal mine disasters in the United States. In Illinois and Pennsylvania alone during 1907 coal mine disasters left 910 widows and 2,074 fatherless children. A large percentage of these accidents could, no doubt, have been prevented had proper precautions been taken.

What Is to Be Done?

What must be done about it? Accidents will happen, in spite of everything that can be done to prevent them. True; but by safeguarding machinery, factory inspection, etc., their number can be greatly reduced. Some of the European countries are far ahead of the United States in these respects. A full public report, with nothing suppressed, of every industrial accident would be an excellent thing. It would point out the danger spots, and that is what is needed.

Carnegie Hero Fund.

Thirty-two awards of medals for heroism were made by the Carnegie Hero Fund Commission last week. Seven silver and twenty-four bronze medals were ordered struck off for the fortunate ones, while monthly pensions aggregating $196, death benefits of $4,880, and special awards totaling $13,100 were made. The cash awards were to liquidate mortgages and other indebtedness, and for educational purposes. In thirteen instances the heroes met death either in the act or as a result of injuries received. Five rescues were made from injuries or death by train, two from fire, one from electrocution, fourteen from drowning, four from suffocation in wells and tanks, five in a mine cave-in, and one from a runaway. The commission has found through its agents, who go all over the United States and Canada, that it is harder to find heroes than it is to reward them. The commission last week considered reports on fifty-three cases, and threw out twenty-one. Since the fund was inaugurated, a little over $500,000, one-tenth of the original donation, not counting its own earnings, has been spent, and half of this went for the relief of sufferers from disasters. 336 medals have been awarded. There are 788 cases pending and 3,701 applications have been refused.

U. S. Steel Pension Fund.

The United States Steel Corporation has established a fund of $8,000,000 for pension purposes, which, by agreement with Mr. Andrew Carnegie, will be consolidated with the $4,000,000 fund heretofore created by him. The aggregate amount will be known as "The United States Steel and Carnegie Pension Fund." The net proceeds will be administered by a board of twelve trustees for the benefit of employes of all subsidiary companies of the United States Steel Corporation. Eight of the trustees have been appointed by the corporation and four by Mr. Carnegie. At the same time that this generous announcement was made, information came to the effect that at the Bethlehem Steel Works at South Bethlehem, Pa., 2,322 men worked twelve hours a day for seven days a week, a large percentage of these laborers earning only 12½ cents an hour, or $11.22 a week. Of course these unfortunate workmen had no union.

British Ship-Building.

This will be a boom year for British shipbuilding and engineering industries. From the returns compiled by "Lloyd's Register of Shipping" it appears that, excluding warships, there were 386 vessels of 1,057,636 tons gross under construction in the United Kingdom on March 31. They included 349 steamships with a gross tonnage of 1,,052,887 and thirty-seven sailing ships of 4,749 tons. The total cost of warships and floating docks to be constructed during the coming eighteen months is put down at $296,250,000. The proportion of the cost of shipbuilding which is spent for labor is estimated at 70 per cent. Spread over thirty months,, this means that for each of 130 weeks nearly $1,600,000 will be paid out in wages, giving constant employment for that period to an average of 182,200 men at $8.50 a week.

Raising the Maine.

After twelve years, the ill-fated battleship Maine is to be removed from the Havana harbor, and the bodies which went down with the vessel will be interred in the national cemetery at Arlington. The bill providing for such removal and burial, has been passed by the House and by the Senate.

William Warns Against Beer Drinking.

Enemies of prohibition are always calling attention to Germany as an example of the right kind of a "personal liberty" country, where beer drinking is a national custom, and is a promoter of happiness rather than a detriment to the people. But now comes the Kaiser, himself, condemning "the beer swilling habits" of the German people. Writing to a freshman in Freiburg University, who has just joined a students' organization noted for drinking great quantities of beer, he earnestly warned the lad that the drinking habit is seriously damaging not only individual students but the German nation, with the result that both are falling behind foreigners, particularly the Americans and the English, who, in consequence of their more sensible ideas regarding drinking of youths, show in later years much greater power of resistance in the battle of life. The Kaiser has set a splendid example by refusing to have alcoholic drinks of any kind, a big help to the cause of temperance in Germany.

Labor Party Controls Australia.

For the first time in its history Australia is now ruled by the Labor party. They have held the balance of power before, but now they have a decided majority in the legislature. They favor a graduated land tax, and propose to establish a method of insurance against unemployment. Their most popular proposal,, however, is to establish a federal arbitration court, which shall be supreme in settling industrial questions. Strange to say, they are in favor of giving the federal government control over land and immigration matters, and greater financial resources. In other words, they favor a strong central government, which seems rather remarkable in a workingman's party.

Imprisonment for Taxes.

It falls strangely upon American ears to hear about people being imprisoned for nonpayment of taxes, but that is what takes place in England occasionally. Recently a Baptist minister, Rev. S. J. Ford, was sentenced to jail for two months, for the nonpayment of his "poor rate." He is a nonconformist, and what they call a "passive resister." His refusal to pay the tax-rate was on the score of conscientious objection to the sectarian portion of the education rate. He was willing to pay the poor rate part of it. Mr. Ford is a man of marked character, and is very popular with his congregation. There is a good deal of indignation about the matter. At Leicester recently, two ministers, Rev. Mr. Thompson and Rev. Mr. Jenkins have been imprisoned as "passive resisters." This is the seventh experience of the kind for Mr. Thompson and the fifth for Mr. Jenkins, so they are becoming somewhat accustomed to it. This is what comes of mixing up church and state.

Great Tunnel in South America.

The time is not far away when great things will be going on in South America; in fact they have begun already. For instance, the great Transandine tunnel, giving direct railway communication between Buenos Ayres and Valparaiso, has been completed. This is the first tunnel to be built through the Andes, but it is not likely to be the last. It is nearly two miles in length, and with the exception of a slight curve at the eastern entrance it is absolutely straight. Argentina is very proud of it. The revolution, by the way, which ended in the independence of Argentina six years later, began in 1810.

Alpine Accidents Increasing.

Statistics of fatal Alpine accidents published in Vienna show an alarmingly rapid increase in the last few years. Fifty-three climbers were killed in 1901, but in 1908 the total was 108, and in 1909 no fewer than 148.

Germany Shies at U. S. Bonds.

Under the heading of "A New Invasion of American Bonds" the Berliner Tagenblatt comments upon a New York telegram reporting the proposed placing of American bonds in Germany. It says: "Whether the German money market is strong enough to bear blood letting to the amount of a quarter of a million of marks through taking over these American bonds through German banks must be regarded as doubtful. It would not be amiss if a breath of the mistrust which has long existed in England were transmitted to the German banking world."

A Term of Reproach.

Stories of graft and corruption in three states—Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York—occupy columns in the newspapers. All these stories of legislative corruption concern business matters. We are fond of blaming legislators for graft, but first and foremost the blame is on business men. Commercialism, which should be an honorable word, has come to be a term of reproach. Honest business men know the truth and feel a sense of shame at these exposures.—W. J. Schieffelin, President of the New York Citizens Union.

France's Old Age Pension Law.

The old age pensions bill was passed recently by the French Chamber of Deputies by a practically unanimous vote. France has had such laws before, but they were inadequate. It is believed this one will be satisfactory. It will affect about eleven and a half million people. These will be obliged to contribute to the fund. Besides, there are about six million peasant proprietors and small owners who may come in or stay out, as they choose. Men workers must pay $1.30 a year into the fund, women workers $1.20, and youths 90 cents. In each case the employer contributes an equal amount. At sixty-five a worker will receive a weekly pension of about $1.44, provided he or she has made not less than thirty payments. In the meantime, workers of sixty-five and over will be given an annual allowance not exceeding $19.36. The fund from which the pensions are to be paid will be accumulated from three sources: contributions from the workers, contributions from the employers, and an annual life allowance for each pensioner by the state of $12.08.

Investments in South America.

Why is it that so little North American money is invested in the industries of South America? Here is the Argentine Republic, for instance, with an area one-third as large as the United States, and having one city, the capital, with a population of more than a million, with exports amounting to over $350,000,000 a year, and with vast agricultural and manufacturing possibilities, yet very little capital from the United States is invested there. John Bull's interests (and John is a wise one when it comes to investments) amount to almost $2,500,000,000, and the Germans and Italians both have large financial interests. Perhaps our North American capitalists are awaiting the completion of the great canal.

Reversing the Process.

America is doing good to Europe in a reflex way. Every year a considerable number of Europeans who have come to America as emigrants return to the fatherland, some on a short visit, but many to remain. As a rule, the latter are people who have made considerable money in the western "land of promise." These people take back with them the new ideas they have gained by their contact with our civilization. Especially is this true of Italy. Many who have thus gone back have been converted to Protestantism during their stay in America, and in numerous cases they have begun and are carrying on a work of evangelization in their native towns. They are eagerly listened to, for have they not been abroad in the world, and seen and heard strange things? Often these earnest men have succeeded in arousing whole communities. If Italy is to be spiritually regenerated, it may be largely due to their work and influence.

New Labor Exchange.

The operations of the new labor exchanges will, it is said, have a marked effect on this year's emigration from Scotland to America. They have been working for about three months and Scotland has taken far more advantage of them than England. So much is this the case, indeed, that there are people who say that they will make the finding of work at home so much easier that men who would otherwise emigrate will stay in their own country. This is, of course, only an anticipation, but there is no doubt whatever that the exchanges in Scotland are proving valuable additions to the machinery of social government. That in Glasgow has been especially successful and leads the way for the whole country, at least outside of London, in the number of people for whom it has found employment. Within the first month it was the direct means of finding work for about 2,500 applicants—men and a fair number of women—who would otherwise have had to tramp from place to place, meeting rebuffs at every gate, and becoming more and more discouraged as the prospect of a start became more and more remote. Apart from the exchanges the improvement in trade that is now making itself felt pretty well all over the country, will tend to restrict the emigration this summer of anything like large numbers of artisans. The shipbuilding industry of the Clyde is in better condition than it has been for three or four years, and most of the yards are now employing about their average number of hands.

Smaller Circulating Notes.

Announcement is made that the secretary of the treasury may recommend that our circulating notes—that is, our paper money—be reduced in size. The reduction, it is said, would mean a saving of $500,000 a year to the government in paper and engraving. The further suggestion is made that the notes of different denominations be made of different sizes, which would be an additional safeguard against mistakes, counterfeiting, etc. The suggestion is a good one. Such an arrangement would resemble that in vogue during and after the civil war, except that the bills, or "shinplasters," of those days were in denominations less than a dollar, going as low as 3 cents.

Brewers Own the Saloons.

No wonder the brewers of Massachusetts bitterly opposed the enactment of the "bar and bottle" bill, which recently became a law and which goes into operation next year. They had good reason to do so. More than 80 per cent of the retail liquor trade of Boston is controlled by them, and this law takes from the saloon the right to sell bottled liquors. If the truth were made known it would probably reveal that a very large percentage of saloonkeepers everywhere are in bondage to their bosses, the brewers, through mortgages and other legal instruments.

Chicago's Home Coming.

Chicago is to have a home-coming week that will surpass anything of the kind ever carried out, if present plans carry. At the last meeting of the Convention Bureau of the Chicago Association of Commerce the matter was taken up and the work of arranging the details was left in competent hands. The exact date has not been decided upon but August, 1911, is favored and it is proposed to make the event so novel and featureful that it will draw to Chicago tens of thousands of people who claim this city as their home as well as many visitors from all parts of the United States and Canada.

Iowa's Insurgents Speak.

The speeches of the Iowa senators at the DesMoines rally of insurgents were marked by a severe arraignment of leaders of the party and by a denunciation of the tariff. Senator Dolliver took the measure up schedule by schedule and denounced it as a bill deliberately framed to exploit the people of the United States in the interest of the trusts. He went further and declared that President Taft in his Winona speech had used as his principal argument in favor of the new tariff law a table of figures which was not only false and deceptive, but was prepared with the deliberate intent of deceiving the country. Senator Cummins confined his remarks more to the state politics, but he arraigned Messrs. Aldrich, Cannon, Payne and Dalzell as men who looked at all vital problems from the corporate standpoint.

Political Readjustment.

In the turmoil and confusion inseparable from the approaching realignment of parties in America, it is well not to lose sight of one of the fundamental moving causes beneath the present one—and that is, the emphatic and conclusive reaffirmation of the democratic principle in American government. For instance, the insurgency of Cummins and Dolliver in Iowa would have ravelled into a fiasco had not the people been behind it. A year ago, it was an axiom with the complaisant politicians that the middle west furnished the dead-line for the "insurgent heresy." Today the beacon fires of that same "heresy" burn brightly in the once rock-ribbed Massachusetts. In New York the same note is sounding, in principle if not in appellation. In Maine and Rhode Island, long dominated by the trusts through the republican party, the spirit of insurgency is manifest. In virtually every eastern state, with the possible exception of Pennsylvania, the yeast is working, sometimes silently, sometimes in an audible ferment. In the south, the sentiment that gives vitality to insurgency is equally active, but it travels under other designations.—Atlanta Constitution.

Strikes in Australia and New Zealand.

Strikes were formerly very prevalent in Australia. The Australian working man is to all intents and purposes a Britisher, and all Britishers are disposed to strike for their rights. In Victoria, one of the most important political divisions of Australia, certain labor laws were enacted some years ago which have had the effect of pretty nearly doing away with strikes. The chief features of these laws are arbitration and conciliation. New Zealand has had a similar experience. In that country all industrial disputes are settled by a court of arbitration, and its decision is final. Not only so, but the court makes its own rules and chooses its own methods in arriving at judgments and making awards. This unique tribunal is said to use common sense instead of legal technicalities in its work.

World's Sunday-School Convention

Washington Thronged for the Most Cosmopolitan Gathering Ever Held on Continent

REPORTED FOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Unprecedented for its cosmopolitanism, unequaled in the magnitude of its constituency, and unsurpassed as a spectacle, the World's Sixth Sunday-school Convention in Washington, D. C., May 19-24, marks an event in religious history.

President Taft was not alone in expressing amazement over the size and character of the convention. He looked out over a sea of six thousand faces on the opening night, while outside the convention hall a still larger number of persons congregated, unable to enter. Nearly twenty-five hundred of the official delegates wore red ribbon badges with the legend "North America." Some five hundred others wore blue badges bearing the names of more than fifty different nations, as remote as China and Soutn America, Turkey and Australia. In addition to these three thousand official and representative delegates from every state and province in the United States and Canada and from foreign lands, there were about seven thousand unofficial delegates or visitors. Sometimes three and four simultaneous convention sessions were inadequate to hold the throngs.

A Great Spectacle.

It was a spectacular convention. The great Men's Bible Class Parade on the afternoon of May 20 opened the eyes of Washington to the virility and masculinity of modern religion. In order that some members of Congress might march in the parade, as they did, and that others might witness it, Congress adjourned early on the day of the demonstration. Torrential rains immediately preceded and followed the parade, largely reducing the ranks; nevertheless five thousand men in a bannered procession a mile long marched down Pennsylvania avenue, and were reviewed at the Capitol by a throng of ten thousand persons.

All these marching men belong to the Sunday-school, and the thought uppermost in the minds of many of the spectators who lined the sidewalks was expressed on one banner, "Where the men lead the boys will follow." A huge mass-meeting for men, with ringing speeches by Rev. Dr. Homer C. Stuntz and Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, followed the parade. At the same time two big meetings of women delegates were in session.

Another spectacular feature of the convention was a great open-air gathering on the east steps of the Capitol, when a multitude of people joined in the singing of Christian hymns.

The demonstration accorded President and Mrs. Taft—whom the former introduced to the cheering throng as "the real president"—stirred the nation's chief executive greatly.

Met Under a World Map.

The convention sat with a monster map of the world before its eyes. The official button showed the globe with a red cross superimposed thereupon. Part of each day was given to a "Roll Call of Nations." The ends of the earth came together at Washington.

Strikingly, the note of international peace resounded from session to session; the depth of conviction upon this subject which possessed the delegates made the gathering worthy to rank among the great peace conferences.

On the closing night of the convention there was a tableau of seventy-five children reproducing the picture which this convention has made famous: "The Twentieth Century Crusaders." The children of many nations gathered under the Sunday-school flag. At the same time delegates from many lands—Korea, China, India, Japan, Mexico, Brazil, Turkey, etc.—gathered on the front of the platform and all sang together to the one tune, but each in his own tongue, one of the familiar Christian hymns that is sung the world around.

The World's Largest Organization.

The statistics of the convention were presented at this time, the flag of each nation being added to a display stand as the figures from that land were given. The total showing is 27,888,479 members, of whom above 16,000,000 are found in the United States and Canada. This includes 2,500,000 officers and teachers; the number of schools reported being 285,842. All ages from octogenarians and other adults by the million to infants on the cradle roll and in the kindergarten department are now found in the Sunday-school. This vast company is scattered over the habitable globe, the increase in non-Christian lands being especially noteworthy.

Various factors combined to make the convention a missionary occasion. Many distinctively missionary addresses were made. The presence of several hundred missionaries helped. So did the Missionary and Educational Exhibit. The realization that the agency which deals with childhood is the most potent evangelizing force contributed powerfully.

The wide-spread observance of World's Sunday-school Day, in more than two hundred languages and dialects, as reported to the convention by cables from various lands, was a real missionary factor. Literally thousands of sermons upon the religious training of youth seem to have been preached upon that day.

Remarkable Action Taken by the House of Representatives.

The resolution for adjournment by the House was in part as follows:

"Whereas, There will be convened in this city on Thursday, May 19, 1910, the World's Sunday-school Convention, composed of representatives of all religious denominations; and

"Whereas, There will be represented at this meeting practically all the civilized nations of the earth; and

"Whereas, The people of the United States have always stood abreast of the foremost advance of the Christian religion; therefore be it

"Resolved: That as a mark of respect to the delegates assembled, as well as to the cause they represent, and for the further purpose of permitting the members of the House who may desire to do so, to participate in said parade, the House of Representatives do adjourn not later than 4 o'clock p. m., on Friday, May 20.

The President Speaks.

In his address, President Taft said:

"One remark of your presiding officer sank so deep in my mind that I hope he will continue to pray for the president of the United States. My experience is that it is needed. It is a great honor to welcome to Washington, the city beautiful, a world's convention at a time when the city is so beautiful. From all parts of the world I welcome here the representatives of one of the three or four institutions that are making the world better, more moral and more religious. Youth is the time to inculcate in their minds the things which are lasting. Public education is teaching morality in general, but that is not enough. Public education is not distinctively religious education, and many are of the opinion that education is dangerous unless associated with religious education. We are all agreed, Protestant, Catholic and Jew, that Sunday-school education is necessary to insure moral uplift and a religious spirit. Such a movement as the Sunday-school movement we ought to encourage and welcome."

Dr. Meyer's Sermons.

Dr. F. B. Meyer, president of the World's Sunday-school Association preached the sermon. His subject was "The Possibilities of Child Life." The text, Psalm 8:2: "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou established strength, because of thine enemies." Dr. Meyer said in the course of his sermon:

"Very various are the fabrics cast off from God's creative looms—the foundations of adamant, the vail of waters, the rainbow mist, ether and star dust; but among them all, none is to be compared to the soul-plasm, enshrined in the nature of a child, and which is capable of being shaped for endless destinies. Jesus Christ discovered the child, and the child discovered Christ. There are two types of religion. The first, that of the understanding, the religion of the schools, the creeds of the scholastic type, and the heritage of church councils. But these will never still the enemy and the avenger. The second is the religion of the heart; the religion of the child, which reflects the over-arching step. The love which is attracted by nobility and purity; the thought so deep because so artless; the faith that finds irresistible reason in the beauty and goodness of things; the snowy innocence which becomes the purity of fire; the forgiveness which takes no account of evil."

John Wanamaker's Address.

"Neither stars of the night," said Mr. Wanamaker, "nor the sun of the day, nor the angels in heaven can look down upon another such sight upon this earth as great as the world's whole army of the Sunday-schools. The larger half of it in number of schools, number of teachers and officers and number of scholars, is in North America, and, all told, in this country alone in round figures, is not less tonight than fifteen millions strong.

"The Sunday-school was not evolved—it was revealed. It is not an agency of man's device—it came to man through the mind and heart of God. Men have not always taken account of this, but they are beginning to take a fairer account."

Dr. Cadman's Stirring Talk.

Dr. Samuel Parks Cadman said: "The hour has now come when this convention must cease to rely on its magnitude, or quote numbers and excitement as though these were the sources of power. Let us, in simple, unalloyed faith, rest our cause on God alone, and on his Son, whom he has sent. It is in this attitude of mind that we should survey the triumphs of the Bible in the histories of past civilization. Then shall we better understand the secrets of progress, and know how it comes to pass that the scepter has been transferred to Berlin, London and Washington.

"Some pious souls imagine this transfer of authority and rule was due to a heavenly fiat that ordained that Teutonic civilization should predominate; such an ascription is an escape from any adequate explanation. The reason why we are the head and front of international superiority is in this—our fathers played the game: they followed the laws that govern, they obeyed the teachings that instruct, and when I heard today that the House of Representatives had adjourned in honor of this convention, I reflected that they did themselves credit by that action. We could have welcomed the Senate here, and I have no doubt that august body would have received benefit, and the Speaker of the House would have been wise if he had appeared with them.

Religion the Root of Growth and Power.

"For politics and the growth and decline of states have their root in people's religion. The story of their faith lies behind every other record, and if we can Maintain that story as did the ancestors of Germany, Scotland, England and Scandinavia, then we shall continue to prosper. If you study the maps of territorial arrangement and expansion of nationality for the last four hundred years, you will speedily see that the Bible-moving, Bible-reading communities have risen to supremacy. The Book has been the mother of lawful freedom, the friend of literature, the companion of conscience and the guide of individual and aggregate humanity. It has kindled a sacred flame in our cold northern hearts. It has empowered statesmen, inspired poets, wrought righteousness, ended innumerable evils, and promoted an equal amount of positive good.

A Christian Proclamation.

"We are here to proclaim in the name of the New Testament that useless wars shall cease, and that the vast and ruinous expenditures for battleships and battalions must be curtailed by the stipulations of Christianized politics. Diplomacy must bow to the King of Kings far more in the future than it has hitherto done. We are here to say that saloonism, and gambling, and vice are sentenced to death by Almighty God, and an invigorated church must see that the sentence is progressively and duly carried out. And our children, than whom nothing can be dearer or nearer to us, must have the same access to the one Book that created modern Europe's better side, and handed back to the people the usurped monarchies of their primogenital liberties and privileges."

Drew the Color Line.

In spite of all the fine talk and heavenly professions of brotherhood, there was an attempt to draw the color line. No place was provided for the colored Sunday-schools of the city in the parade or on the floor. President Meyer side-stepped the issue on the ground that he was a "Britisher" and not familiar with such issues. But Dr. E. Bourner Allen had something to say about it when his turn came at a later meeting, and he was cheered and re-cheered for his utterance. "This brotherhood of Jesus Christ," said Dr. Allen, "does not limit itself to one country or to one race. It proposes to help any man on the Jericho road, whether he be black or brown, red or yellow, ignorant or learned, whether he lives in America, China or Africa. I want to take this opportunity of saying, in referring to this civilization of brotherly men, that it will not refuse to walk with any man under the banner of the cross, no matter what his race, and, incidentally, that it will not refuse to play with any man under the banner of the cross."

A Whirlwind of Money Raising.

For the first time in its history, the World's Association tried to raise a budget for the expenses of the ensuing triennium. The sum asked for, $75,000, was all secured in a few hours. Marion Lawrance started the enthusiasm when he and the Rev. Carey Bonner, secretary for Great Britain, clasped hands and made the pledge. While these noted Sunday-school workers clasped hands and made their demonstration of embracing one another it became contagious, and men were manifesting their joy over the pledge by hugging each other in many sections of the great audience.

Former President E. K. Warren of Michigan subscribed $2,000, of which $1,000 was for Dr. Meyer and $1,000 for the Rev. Dr. George W. Bailey, chairman of the executive committee. It had been suggested that a number of life memberships in the World's Sunday-school Association be created by the payment of $1,000, and Mr. Warren thus made the two men named life members.

Mr. Warren also gave a reception at the Arlington Hotel to foreign missionaries.

D. George W. Bailey of Philadelphia, is the new president of the association.

W. J. Bryan on the Liquor Traffic

Holds that Personal Liberty Cannot Stand Against Rights of Community

Under the auspices of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of Chicago, William Jennings Bryan delivered an address to a large audience at the Auditorium on the liquor traffic and its prohibition. Inasmuch as the plea of personal liberty is much urged by friends of the traffic in Chicago, Mr. Bryan devoted his address largely to that phase of the subject.

"Personal liberty," said the distinguished speaker, "is a phrase which is used a great deal by those who oppose legislation on the liquor question. It is time that we had a definition of 'personal liberty.' We are all opposed to any unnecessary restrictions upon personal liberty, and yet we all are in favor of such restrictions as may be necessary. The question is, what is necessary?

A Surrender to Society.

"The individual surrenders a certain amount of his personal liberty when he enters society. He makes this surrender in return for the advantages derived from society. For instance: If a man is living on a desert he can ride his horse as fast as he pleases. But he cannot run his horse on a public highway. He cannot gratify his love for horse racing at the risk of the lives of others.

"Every city fixes a speed limit. Even the liberty of the automobilist is restricted at times, and he is compelled to reduce the speed of his machine to a point that is considered safe. And so with the restriction upon the sale and use of liquor. No individual can claim a right to use liquor in such a way as to infringe upon the equal rights of other people.

"I would not favor legislation forbidding use of liquor at any time or under any circumstances. I would consider this an unnecessary limitation upon the liberty of the individual, but I am in favor of such restriction as may seem necessary for the protection of society.

The Unit in Prohibition.

"There is a good deal of discussion at this time over the unit. That is, as to whether the power to regulate the liquor traffic shall be vested in the town, in the precinct, in the county, in the state, or in the nation. I hold that every unit ought to have authority to act on this subject, except as restrained by a larger unit. That is, that the block, the ward, the city, the precinct, the county, the state and the nation should have the undisputed right to exclude the sale of liquor within its limits, or to fix such restrictions upon the sale of liquor as the people of the unit may deem necessary for their protection and welfare.

Answers an Objection.

"It is sometimes objected that this rule does not work both ways. That is, that while a county has the right to close all the saloons within its borders in case the county goes dry, that a victory for the wets does not give authority to open saloons anywhere and everywhere within the county. But this is not a valid one.

"The saloon differs from all other businesses in that no one regards it as a blessing. It is not defended as a good thing. It is not an educational center. It is not an economic or moral asset to a community. It is a nuisance, and only tolerated when it is believed to be necessary. It cannot be defended at all if the community does not want it.

"No one would be willing to stand sponsor for the doctrine that a saloon ought to be forced into a town against the wishes of the people of the town. But the right of the people of the community to protest is so well recognized and so firmly established that I need not discuss the matter.

Must Recognize Authority.

"What I want to emphasize is that there ought to be no objection to the exercise of authority by any unit. The liquor dealer ought to be content to sell where his services are desired, and the manufacturer of liquor ought to be content to dispose of his products among those who desire them. He is entirely outside of his sphere when he attempts to force his business upon a community or to interfere in decisions upon the liquor question.

"Whether liquor should be sold or not in any community is a question which the community can determine better than outsiders, and I have no disposition to lay down rules upon this subject. If the people of a block object to having a saloon in the block I think they ought to have a right to exclude it. If the people of a ward object to having a saloon in the ward, I think they ought to have a right to exclude it. If the people of a town object to having a saloon in the town, I think they ought to have the right to exclude it. If the people of a county object to having a saloon in the county, I think they ought to have the right to exclude it, and so with the state and with the nation.

Saloon A Menace.

"If, on the other hand, the people of any unit desire a saloon, they ought to have it, provided the people of the larger unit consent. It cannot be argued with justice that people of any ward or town or county shall have the right to open saloons without consulting a larger unit, because the saloon at its best is a menace and a demoralizing influence. Moreover, it increases taxes and jeopardizes both property and life. All who are in a position to suffer from the existence of a saloon have a right to a voice in deciding whether it should be permitted to exist."

Federal Nullification.

Turning to the question of federal interference with prohibition laws in the states, Mr. Bryan said:

"The interstate commerce clause of the Constitution has been used in the nullifying of state laws on the liquor question. I believe that we ought to have an act of Congress recognizing the right of a state to control shipments of liquor the moment the liquor enters the state. If the state can be intrusted with the enactment of laws for the protection of the home, for the protection of property and for the protection of life, it ought to be intrusted with the enactment of liquor laws. If the state can be intrusted with the imprisonment of the individual and even with the taking of human life, surely it can be intrusted with the control of the use, sale and transportation of liquor within its borders.

Government Should Not Be In Partnership With Lawbreakers.

"The federal government should not be in partnership with lawbreakers. I believe that we should have a congressional statute prohibiting the issuance of a federal license except where a local license has been issued. Objection has been made to this on the ground that the Constitution would prohibit such partiality in the issuance of federal licenses.

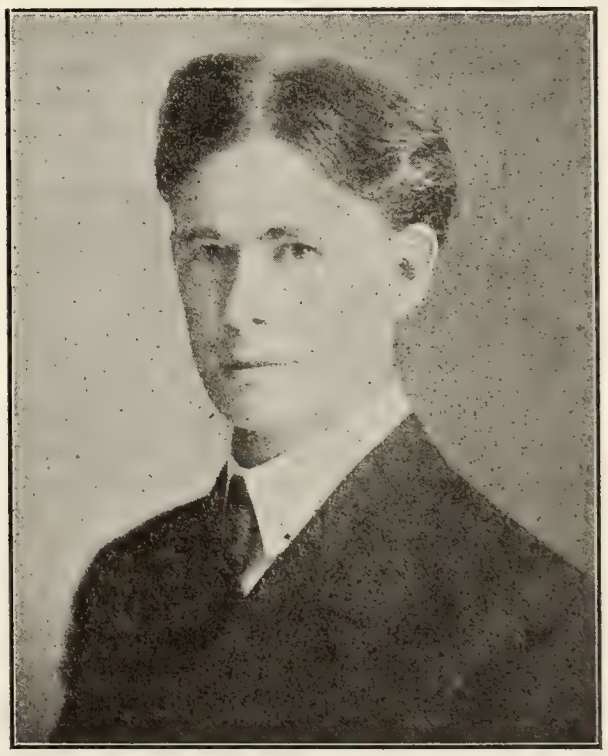
"Without attempting to decide this constitutional question I venture to suggest that the same end might be reached in another way. The law might require every applicant for a federal license to furnish proof that he has published notice of his application for a federal license and has served written notice upon the local authorities; in this way the local authorities would be put upon their guard. Certainly no objection can be made to such a measure.

"If the federal government cannot withhold a license in dry territory, it certainly cannot do less than require that the local authorities shall be notified of the intention of the local dealer to sell liquor in violation of liquor laws.

A Talk on New Theology

A Sensible and Reassuring Interpretation of Progress

BY REV. LYLE DE JARNETTE.



There are some people, who, when you mention the term theology, begin to blink their eyes or do something very fantastic, because they do not like the term; but anybody who dislikes the term theology does not understand what it means. I remember not long ago of hearing a preacher say, "Why, we do not need theology." But that is the thing we need above everything else. We do not need dogmatic theology, sectarian theology, but we need theology.

We need a practical theology, a kind that is helpful to us every day. It is true every man has a philosophy of life. "I do not know anything about philosophy," some one says. But your way of looking upon life is your philosophy of life. Your way of looking upon God is your theology of God. You all have a theology; it may be a very ignorant or false kind, but you have a theology, because you have, or think you have, a conception of God. When I talk to you about your theology I mean to be talking to you about your interpretation of God. When I talk to you about your philosophy of life I mean to talk to you about your understanding of the meaning of life. There are differsent kinds of philosophy and theology. Some people think that it is perfectly proper for us to love and look after our own selfish interests, regardless of others. Some people say, That is not the right idea at all; we ought to look after other people." Some people say, "I believe God is a father, a God of love and mercy." That is their theology. Others may say, "I do not think of God that way at all. Somehow God seems to have made us his playthings." So whatever way you understand it, it is a matter of theology, a matter of philosophy, after all.

All Are New Theologians.

Some people just get scared at once when you begin to talk about a new theology. I remember not long ago reading from an editor who in many respects is a most excellent kind of man, but he was making a fussy noise and saying unkind things about the new theology, yet he is a new theologian himself. We are all new theologians. No man or woman believes wholly in the theology of the past century. If we did believe it we would be Hardshell Baptists or something of that kind, or perhaps materialists. How many of us are that kind of people? Then we are new theologians in a sense, because we do not believe the old interpretations of God. Alexander Campbell was a new theologian. If he had not been he could have stayed with the Presbyterians or with the Baptists as long as he wished.

The world needs a new theology today. I say that, I think, advisedly. Do you know the reason why the world has not more new theology today than it has? It is because the most of us as ministers have not the courage to say what we really believe. We get our sermons ready and then we trim them so as to be sure they will fit the past century's theology and thus be accepted by the people to whom we preach. But there are some people who are beginning to appreciate the fact that we do need a new theology and are brave enough to give the world what it ought to have. What are you going to do with the people who take exceptions? Why, be as tolerant with them and as kind as we can. The last thing is to harshly condemn them. But these people who take exception to this new theology are often inconsistent. When they were younger they said, "We must break away from these old beliefs," and they broke away, and now since they have grown older, they say in effect, "When we were young we figured this out; you cannot improve upon it; you cannot see anything beyond what we ask." How did it happen that they saw and had sympathy with new things?

There are people everywhere who are saying, "I want to hear the old things." I have great sympathy and love for these people. You want to hear the old things because you love them, and yet do you not realize and understand that, like it or not, we shall have to break away from some of the old things that we love so much. The world is built that way and some of you who have read the history of the reformers know something of their struggles. They said, "We must break away from the old things," and others said, "Some of these things are the things we have loved all our lives; must we give them up?" When John Wesley said, "We need to have a better interpretation of religion in this day," some people said, "John Wesley, you know we must hold onto the old Church. This we sacrificed for in our childhood," and they made it as hard as they could to blaze the way of religious truth. The same with Alexander Campbell. There were people who called him a heretic. Do you imagine that you could have stopped the world with Martin Luther or John Wesley? Why should we be so inconsistent as to say that if anything comes out today that is different from the theology of Alexander Campbell it must be heretical?

God, I think, must have meant for theology to grow. "We shall not go beyond Christ!" you say. Certainly, we shall not get beyond Christ. "We shall not get beyond God!" you say. Certainly, we will not get beyond God. But there is one thing we shall do; we shall come to understand Jesus better and learn better how to interpret God. I think the world is learning to understand God better.

Theoretical and Practical Theology.

There are two kinds of theology that might be called theoretical and practical theology. Theoretical is the kind you believe, and the practical theology is the kind you live. This explains why some people are theoretically intolerant yet personally most affable. We need the sort of theology we can live up to, the kind that helps us in our every day relations. It is necessary that in some way we should try to harmonize our thinking of God. You know why some of us are so upset intellectually. It is because we cannot quite make out any harmonious relation in our thinking about God and man. The better we can harmonize our thinking of God into a system the better we will understand life and the better we can live. A man says, "If there is anybody who is mixed up and does not understand where he is at I am that person." That is a good sign. That simply means that the moorings of your childhood will not hold you, so far as any traditional or sectarian or outgrown theology is concerned. It may mean that you are growing, and are thinking about these things for yourself. Do you realize that God does not mean that even you yourself shall take a thing upon his say-so? The Apostle Paul understood that perfectly: "Whatsoever is not of faith is of sin," etc. You say, "I cannot understand a certain thing; I cannot see it that way." You are under no obligation to accept it. You do violence to your better judgment when you force acceptance. What are you to do then? If God says it then you ought to try to adjust your life so you can accept it, but not by forcing your belief. God is not saying, "This is the truth and you must accept it against your own thinking, against your own believing." Undoubtedly I think we come to think of things as God thinks of them, but not simply because God says so, but because He means for us to work these things out.

Beliefs Not to Be Forced.

You are a temperance man. Perhaps you teach the boys that they must stay away from the saloon, but will they stay away just because you tell them to? You do not always help boys that way. The best way to insure your boy staying away from the saloon is to teach him to use his own brain about it. If you are wise you show him why it is a dangerous place, why drinking liquor is a dangerous thing, and put it so it appeals to his reason, then you have made the boy strong.

We need to have right ideas and conceptions of God. Often our theology is not right because we do not live up to the light and privileges that we have. No man ought to be satisfied in saying, "This is what I learned when I was a child." Strange to say, some of us get to be twenty-five or thirty-five and say, "I have learned it all now. Let any man come along and tell us anything new or different!"

Every man has a God, even the agnostic. His God is, "I do not know." The infidel's God is, "I do not believe there is any God." Every man's God is different. Tell us what you believe about God. Let the man next to you tell us what he believes about God. Do you think they are going to agree in all particulars? They certainly would not. Why do we believe in a God? In the first place, I think we believe that there is a ruling intelligence in the universe, and I think we shall be inclined to say, "The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament showeth His handiwork." Perhaps you want to call him "Supreme Ruler." The Jew thought of him as Jehovah. Jesus called him Father. The Mohammedan calls him Allah, and the Buddist has some other name for him. Some people say he is the Great Spirit. Everybody will not have the same name for him any more than everybody will have the same idea of him.

Knowledge of God Is Possible.

Then again, I think a knowledge of God is possible because we believe that there is goodness in the world. As we understand God he is good. Goodness must have its source somewhere. And if we take goodness and try to follow it back and back, I think we shall come to God. I think there is a good God because there is goodness in the world. I believe there is a beautiful life giving force in the world because nature is so beautiful. I believe that there is a flaming fire somewhere because there is light for the day. I believe that He is a God of love, and I think there is a love somewhere because there is love in the world. And I believe there is a God of mercy somewhere because as human beings we have learned something of mercy, and if you can be merciful can you imagine that the Supreme Being can be less merciful than you are? If a father can be kind to his children can you

I believe that a practical theology is what people need today, a knowledge of God that will help them to be noble, kind, worthy, and if we have not the right idea of God, of the Bible and Jesus Christ, we are not going to live our best. But a practical theology will necessarily greatly differ from our usual theoretical theology. Are we tolerant enough to listen to the message of the man who wishes to give an every day practical knowledge of God, even if it runs counter to our conventional notions of religion? If it is to be a theology that will meet the demands of the new men of the new century it will have to be a new theology.

Our Church Men

By John Ray Ewers

Tolerance

Here is a message white-hot from my heart. In my study I am reading, "The prophets of the Christian Faith" and have just come upon these mervelous words of John Wesley, marvelous in their wisdom and breadth, "Some may say I have mistaken the way myself, though I have undertaken to teach others. It is very possible that I have. But I trust, whereinsoever I have been mistaken, my mind is open to conviction. I sincerely desire to be better informed. What I know not, teach thou me. If I linger in the path I have been accustomed to tread, take me by the hand and lead me. But be not discouraged if I ask you not to beat me down in order to quicken my pace. May I request you further not to give me hard names in order to bring me into the right way? For God's sake, if it be possible, let us not provoke one another to wrath. Let us not kindle in each other this fire of hell. If we could discern truth by that dreadful light, would it not be loss rather than gain? For how far is love, even with many wrong opinions, to be preferred before truth itself without love. We may die without the knowledge of many truths, and yet be carried to Abraham's bosom. But if we die without love, what will knowledge avail? Just as much as it avails the devil and his angels."

Now I submit that as a rare bit of common sense.

We have several folks among us that, whatever else they may or may not have mastered, have not learned to speak the truth in love. Unfortunately such unwise people are not limited to any one class. Unloving cocksureness is equally reprehensible in the crab-apple conservative or the upstart liberal.

On the one hand how the good old-fashioned brother smarts under the cruel lash of some self-contained modern, and on the other hand how the open-minded youth rebels at the harsh and vicious judgments of some man of the old school.

We will get nowhere by calling each other names. Ridicule is always a cheap and cowardly weapon. You cannot make people good by force. You cannot hammer truth into one's head. The gentleman is after all the mightiest man.

Some of our older men may know much about the Bible, but they know little about tolerance. Some of the modern men may have grasped some vital principles but they have ignored the laws of winning men.

I know of one of our older men, who is no doubt a very fine man in many ways, who some years ago practically read one of our younger men out of the ministry, for no other reason than that this young man dared to differ from him on a matter of biblical interpretation. How much wiser it would have been had the older man approached the younger as a father and in a gracious spirit sought to show him the truth as he saw it, being even willing to learn from the youth if indeed he had grasped some new truth, which is not impossible.

While on the other hand we all know many old-fashioned people who are as good as gold, whose lives are above reproach, who fret and smart under the unkind and almost brutal blows of their very children. How unwise it all is! How far removed from the laws of psychology! How it defeats our very ambition. How it splits us up into hostile parties!

No man is fit to be an editor or a minister, especially for the Disciples of Christ, who has not the spirit of broad tolerance. No man is fit to be a teacher in one of our schools who has not mastered the art of being gracious.

This is no soft appeal. This is not asking anyone to surrender convictions. This is only an appeal for the revival of true gentlemanliness. Gracious persuasion is more powerful than brow-beating egotism. It may be that no single one among us quite knows it all. Let us bury some of our titles such as "Moss-back" or "Unitarian." People are not converted by being called names.

Let us reason together in love. Lovlessness is the heresy of the world. The truth without love is a poor thing. How utterly silly to despise character. Life is the thing that counts. Unbrotherliness is the curse of our day. The old men should love these sons in the gospel, so long as their lives are above reproach, even if they do not see alike. The young men should reverence the fathers of the church, even though some of their notions may seem antiquated.

We want no loveless truth. We, who plead for union, dare not be divided. Let us speak the truth in love.

Since human ature is a fact, we will be wise to recognize it. Remember the fable of the wind and the sun.

Third Degree Tortures

It is high time that a stop was put to the despicable methods of the police in this country in administering the "third degree" to prisoners from whom they wish to wring a confession of guilt. There is no warrant of law for such procedure as the torturing of a prisoner in Chicago last week who was suspected of having killed a policeman. It was given out in the daily papers that the unfortunate man had committeed suicide as a result of "third degree" methods. It would not be a rash statement to make in this case if we said that he died of injuries inflicted by brutal officers of the law. All violators of the law are supposed to be innocent until proved guilty. The constitution of the United States protects the alleged criminal under article V of the amendments. If a prosecutor should seek, by a question, to draw from an accused person testifying in his own behalf an incriminating answer, the attorney would be rebuked by the court and the witness instructed not to answer. And yet in this alleged civilized country the tortures of the inquisition are employed to extort confessions that are made falsely in many cases because of the physical exhaustion of the prisoner; this, too, by a man who is not an officer of the court and without judicial authority. America is falling fast enough into old world ideas and practices without adopting the horrible brutality of the Russian police system.

Our Readers' Opinions

Another Classification

Apropos of the discussion as to "Incorrect Clasification" it is well to note that the difficulty arises from our anomalous position.

Some say we are not a denomination. Then we have no distinctive name and no separate existence and the government knows nothing of our spiritual niceties, if it did it could not represent them in census statistics.

We could only be embraced in some "denominational family" or distributed among the denominations,—a disappeared brotherhood.

Then our plea for union assumes that the disciples of Christ are dispersed among all denominations and we plead with them to lay aside divisive differences for the sake of union.

We cannot afford to permit the government to publish our segregation under a distinguishing name without protest. It would be a stulification of ourselves and a falsification of "our distinictive plea." In fact, in its deepest sounding, there are but two classes in Christendom. Historically speaking, they are Papists and Baptists.. Paptists crown the Pope of Rome as the head of the church on earth and salvation comes to them through the Pope by priestly ministration. Baptists crown Christ as the Head of his body on earth and salvation comes to them from Him only by faith, though not by "faith only." This is the chasm between Protestantism and Romanism. All protesting bodies are on the Baptist side of this narrow, though impassable, gulf. Some of these protestants have brought from Papists a few "rags of tradition."

Our plea for union rests on Baptist ground viz., a personal faith in the personal Christ of God, and accepts his sayings, rejects all papal substitutes and respects personal liberty, regulated by the law of Christ alone. Standing on this foundation, the Disciples and Baptists are one and since it is so hard for either body to find justifying differences for unbrotherly separation, the census compilers may well be excused for a classification as one "denominational family."

Instead of criticizing the inevitable, it were better to accomplish the unity of the family. However, this incorrectness has been the occasion of some fine editorials and enlightening "opinions" of readers.

Entering New Fields

Editors Christian Century: The writer is always interested in editorials in the Century but he is unable to understand some things; and one is that there never has been a place where the plea of the Disciples was welcomed by any great number of people when the plea was first presented.

If we are to stay out of a field till the other church people or the people of a community think it is time for us to enter we shall stay out forever and this work in which we are engaged would never have been begun.

If our preachers will be broad and manly enough we can go into any and all places and demand a hearing that will not hurt our plea for the union of Christendom at all. Lecturing in various places with a view to getting the churches to unite would go very slowly, since even religious people are backward about taking hold of anything not presented in its most positive form.

Your plan would be good for a beginning; then if the churches are not willing to unite let us in each place establish a church to continuously maintain the work. We must be loving and considerate but positive also.

The Allegorical Method

The chief object of my article of a few weeks since was to learn from Dr. Gates his real attitude toward the Allegorical method of Scripture interpretation. I had supposed that modern thinkers, as far as a considerable part of the Bible is concerned, are favorable to such method. But Dr. Gates in his Congress address has outlined modern thought, not only omitting allegorical interpretation, but as I understand him, even positively antagonizing it. Still I am slow to believe that so clear and methodical a writer as Dr. Gates would thus mutilate, cripple and devitalize his own favorite philosophical system. With less curiosity than higher interest I await his explanation.

Madison, Ind. J. W. LANHAM.

RESPONSE BY DR. GATES.

The "Allegorical Method" of interpretation to which I referred was the method officially sanctioned by theologians and in use from the second to the sixteenth century. It proceeded upon the assumption that the language of Scripture contained three meanings, the literal, the moral and the spiritual, corresponding to the tripartite division of the human personality into body, soul and spirit.

The difficulty with this method is that it is utterly unscientific and uncertain. The meaning of a passage of scripture is made to depend upon the caprice or fancy of the interpreter. If he does not like the literal sense, he can retreat to the moral; if he does not like the moral sense, he can take refuge in the spiritual. Scripture can be made to mean anything the exegete wants it to mean.

Before Origen took it up and established its use in Christian theology, it had been a favorite method among the Greeks, and the Alexandrian Jews. It was the ancient method of reconciling the older to the newer thought, and of surrounding the embarrassments of sacred writings that had come down to a new age carrying the outgrown religious beliefs and moral ideas of an ancient time.

This was the apologetic use Origen made of it in application to the writings of the Old and New Testaments. He found many things narrated in both Old and New Testaments which were clearly "impossibilities," "irrationalities," and "mysteries," when taken in their literal sense. He was obliged to penetrate to the psychological or spiritual meaning to find the rational truth. He says: "Nor even do the law and the commandments wholly convey what is agreeable to reason. For who that has understanding will suppose that the first and second, and third day, and the evening and the morning, existed without a sun, and moon, and stars? and that the first day was, as it were, also without a sky? And who is so foolish as to suppose that God, after the manner of a husbandman, planted a paradise in Eden towards the east, and placed in it a tree of life, visible and palpable, so that one tasting of the fruit by the bodily teeth obtained life? and again, that one was a partaker of good and evil by masticating what was taken from the tree?

"Nay, the gospels themselves are filled with the same kind of narratives; e. g., the devil leading Jesus up into a high mountain, in order to show him from thence the kingdom of the whole world, and the glory of them." He thought it clearly absurd that any one could see with the eye of the body from a lofty height, "the kingdoms of the Persians, and Scythians, and Indians, and Parthians." He concludes that the whole of Scripture has a spiritual, but not a bodily meaning "because the bodily meaning (the literal sense) is in many places proved to be impossible."

But just what the spiritual meaning was when the literal meaning was irrational or impossible, depended upon the speculative fancy of the interpreter. In this way all conflict between Scripture and the science of the time, and between the morality of the past and the present disappeared. This apologetic method prevailed in the church until it was superceded by the principle of pedagogical accomodation, or the covenant idea, or the more recent doctrine of historic development. By one method or another the religious and moral ideas of ancient Israel are reconciled with the dogma of an infallible and inspired revelation without doing violence to either. The allegorical method, however, was gradually abandoned after the sixteenth century. There are certain allegories in the New Testament which carry with them the key to their own interpretation. The Scriptures as a whole are now interpreted as all other writings, according to natural and grammatical principles of exegesis. ERRETT GATES.

A Deserved Compliment

In my opinion the article on, "Among England's Great Preachers," by Albert J. Saunders is far and away your strongest message for a long time. What can be more helpful than to learn how these great brothers of ours do their work. What more stimulating than to learn how they study and preach. Give us more of this. We are hungry for it. I regret that I do not know Mr. Saunders, but if he has any more like that get it.

JOHN R. EWERS.

Pittsburg, Pa.

[Besides the above, we have received a number of words of appreciation from readers who found Mr. Saunders' English article especially good. He has promised to write for The Christian Century from Australia, where he has gone to preach the gospel. No doubt many besides Mr. Ewers have had an appetite created by this first article which will make them approach his further contributions with zest.—EDITORS.]

Other Commendations

Editors Christian Century: The Christian Century is a constant surprise in its freshness and vitality. It is inspiring in its optimism, stimulating in thought, prophetic in vision, Christian in spirit. If I do not agree with every utterance in its pages, I am nevertheless provoked to thought and brotherly love. You are doing a constructive work.

CHAPTER FOUR.

Delays Are Dangerous.

"Could you grant me a few minutes' private conversation, Uncle?"

"Ay, surely, Archie. But what for look ye sae blate, laddie? Nae freen deid I hope?"

"Something more important, Uncle David," replied Archie, doing his best to appear at his ease.

"Weel, come awa' doon the garden. I'm fair deein' for a blaw o' the pipe." As the two men walked side by side along the well-kept garden path Archie Montieth felt, rather than saw, that his uncle was scrutinizing his appearance with that half-serious, half-mischievous expression in his shrewd blue eyes that at that particular moment the younger man found to be most disconcerting. After a minute or two of awkward silence the old man exclaimed in what he meant to be a jocular tone, though Archie felt vastly taken down by it:

"Ma word, Archie, but young folk think a power more o' dress nowadays than they did when I was a yonker. I suppose noo, ye gaed awa' up tae Glesga, the day, for nae ither reason than tae change yer licht gray tweeds, that ye lookit rael weel in, for the navy blue serge ye hae come back in." Archie colored in spite of himself, but he feigned good humor as he replied:

"You are not complimentary, Uncle. But I know fine you are only in jest. Business men understand each other."

"True an' fair, Archie, but that disna explain why ye changit the gray for the blue?"

"Well, to tell the truth, I don't like a tweed suit for going to church in, especially when I am on a visit. It's not fair to one's friends."

"Ye're no pretendin', I see, that it a' for the honor o' the Sabbath day." Archie took his uncle's quizzing in good part, and laughed heartily, as if he were enjoying himself immensely. When they reached the end of the garden they paused and looked over the wall on the outside of which babbled a sparkling stream, which, before it reached the sea, would be dark and foul with the refuse of many a busy factory staining its once pure life.

"Weel, Archie," said the old man, "had yer journey tae Glesga onything tae dae wi' the maitter ye wad spin o'?"

"My coming back has more to do with it. The going to town was a mere matter of business. I will try to be brief, uncle, and no matter how you may look on my suit, I know I may rely on you for sympathy, in what you will easily understand, will mean happiness or else the most bitter disappointment to me. I love Jeanie, uncle, as deeply as it is possible for a man to love. I crave your permission to woo her, and win her if I can." The old man, silent and grave for what seemed to Archie a long time, looked down into the rippling stream. Then removing his pipe from his mouth, he looked his nephew full in the face, as if he would read the character of the soul, behind the young man's dark, flashing eyes.

"Ye hae askit a hard thing, Archie, seein' she's oor ae ewe lamb. But ye ought tae know ye'n anither's minds by this time. Three years she has been in yer mither's hoose, an' nought but kindness atween ye a' the time. Hae ye speind at the lassie, herself, Archie?"

"Last night I spoke to her, but she seemed unable to decide. She wanted to say 'no,' but I refused to take her answer. She is very young, uncle, and I think I was in too much haste. All I ask now is permission from you and her mother to visit you frequently. I ask no promise except as Jeanie herself may wish. I will be content to wait, and hope, for years."

"It disna look as if ye were content tae wait for years, laddie, when ye hae spoken sae soon."

"True, uncle, but I may as well tell you; since I came here yesterday I have noticed something that has made me fear that 'delays are dangerous.' You and aunt 'Lizabeth perhaps would never think of it, but a lover's eyes are quick to detect a rival."

"A rival, Archie. Wha may he be?"

"James Douglas."

"Jamie? Havers! Ye micht as well say Donald, a'most."

"I am not deceived, uncle. This very evening on my return from Glasgow, James was leaning on the counter speaking earnestly to Jeanie, with a look in his eyes which was saying plainly, 'For bonnie Jeanie Graeme I wad lay me doon an' dee.' The moment I entered the shop he drew himself up, as straight as a rush, and looked as self-conscious as a man could well do."

"As to character, Archie, I could wish for nae better man than Jamie. But a' the same I'll no just say that I wad like Jeanie tae settle doon, after a' we've spent in educatin' her wi' a beeziness man, nae better than her ain faither."

"I should be very sorry, Uncle David, to say that James Douglas is your equal, either in position or in any other way. You know my circumstances, sir, and that my wife may drive in her own carriage, or indeed, in her own motor car, if she wishes."

"Weel, Archie, for the maitter o' circumstances, I ken that since yer faither's death, an' a while before it yer mither an you hae lived in a fine house in Kelvin side. How ye hae win a' the needfu' siller for sic outlay, I'll tell ye plainly, has been a sair puzzle tae me, mony a time."

"There is no mystery about it, uncle. Our company is paying well. That is all."

"Ay, but the company! Whar did the company come frae? When yer faither married yer mither, he was just a bit clerk in an office."

"He got a legacy, you know, sir."

"Oh, ay, a sma' legacy. But is't a sma' thing tae start a shipping company?"

"Nothing easier, uncle; put out your prospectus and the money comes in."

"Losh me, that's not the wy I started my beeziness. But then, I'm no' in a poseetion tae drive a carriage, nor yet a fleein' deevil, Archie, an' from what I hae known o' ye for mony years, yer weel enough established in this warld's gear. Sae if ye can win the lassie, I'll no stan' in yer way, only there maun be nae talk o' marriage for mony a lang day. Her mither an' mysel' hae the richt tae keep her yet awhile."

"It was the consciousness of this, sir, which induced me to approach you, as I have done today. Believe me, I fully realize that it is due to her mother, to you, and to Jeanie, herself, that my wooing should be attempted only in the most honorable way." Archie Monteith, whatever else he may have lacked, proved himself by these sentiments, in no way lacking in discernment. He knew that the man to whom he spoke was himself the soul of honor. The old man was mightily pleased. Extending his hand to the young man cordially, he clasped his in a firm grip as he exclaimed:

"It is a guid thocht weel expressed, Archie. Ma ain opeenion is that the honorable wy o dain' things, whether in love, or in beeziness ought tae succeed, though it's not aye sae, laddie, an' for that reason, mayhap, we're a' in danger whiles, o' forgettin' that if the merchants o' a nation are honorable men, it disna sae muchle maitter even if the duke and sic like, should be scapegraces. Ma hert felt guid wishes tae ye, Archie. Be aff wi' ye," he added as Archie modestly attempted to express thanks, and was so much overpowered by his feelings, that he was unable to do so. Jeanie Graeme, standing behind the curtain almost on the same spot where she had stood the evening before, and heard her brother's confession of his great folly, never for one moment imagined that she was herself the subject of the conversation so earnestly engaged in between her father and her cousin. That Archie would think of speaking to her father concerning his offer of marriage to herself without her full consent did not occur to her. The matter under discussion, she felt, could not be a light one, as she knew full well from her father's gestures, and grave expression of countenance, that it was a matter of deep seriousness on which her cousin was apparently consulting him. Her thoughts at once flew to Donald. Could it be possible that Archie would be so base as to betray her brother, and wound her dear old father, at the same time, by revealing to him the miserable truth about his only son. If so, all her attempts at saving Donald were in vain. She had placed herself in a false position too, in Mr. Sinclair's eyes, perhaps forfeited his respect and esteem forever, for Donald's sake, and now it was no good. Donald would be driven to despair and it was hard to say what he might do. And Archie was the cause. She would never forgive him. Never. Her attention was simply riveted on the scene before her. They had been talking only a few minutes. Yet she thought it an age. She grew hot and cold by turns, as she saw the two men clasp hands. Her father was speaking most earnestly to her cousin. Thanking him, no doubt, for putting him on his guard about Donald. And this man had asked her to be his wife, and only yesterday, he had solemnly promised to keep Donald's trouble from everyone—her father most of all. How she scorned the man for his falsehood. She saw Archie turn away with radiant face from her father, and walk quickly down the broad, white garden path. With a face burning with anger, she stepped close to the window and threw it wide open. Archie hastened to her and before he had time to speak, she said in quick agitated tones:

"I saw you talking to father, Archie. Have you told him?"

"Yes, Jeanie. I think the straightforward way is the right and honorable one. Don't you?"

"I hate you, Archie Monteith, and I never want to see your face again," she exclaimed in an angry whisper, and she shut the window before he had time to reply. She was about to escape from the room, seeking quietness in her own cozy bedroom, that she might give full vent to her grief. But he met her in the hall and laying his strong hands firmly on hers, he led her back into the dining room. Looking steadily and sorrowfully into her flushed, troubled face, he said:

"Jeanie, surely you owe me an explanation. What have I done wrong?"

"Can you ask me such a question, when you have just told me that you have told father all?" She tried to draw away her hands, but he held them tightly clasped in his.

"I have only spoken to him as any really honorable man ought to speak, under the circumstances."

"You have no right to speak of honor after what you have done." She looked at him with flashing eyes. He grew pale and winced visibly.

"What have you heard, Jeanie? Has any one dared to couple my name with—" He stopped, covered with confusion.

"You have coupled your own name with shame, Archie by breaking a solemn promise." Her woman's heart could not withhold pity, when she saw his distress.

"But I thought it only right to speak to your father about—" he paused.

"About Donald," she said. "After giving me your solemn promise of secrecy, only yesterday."

"Oh, Jeanie," he said as he heaved a great sigh, "what a terrible misunderstanding! And what pain you have given me. I have not been speaking about Donald to your father, but about you." He did not need to say another word, the look he gave her told her all. She knew in an instant that she had wronged him. How could she atone for her fault.

"Archie, Cousin Archie, forgive me. How could I ever have imagined that you would be anything but true? But, oh, you don't know how everything seems small to me, compared to Donald's trouble." Her apology did not bring the glad light back to his eyes—

"Does my love seem a small thing, too, Jeanie?"

"I scarcely know, Archie. I fear I have thought much more of Donald since yesterday than of you."

"You give me but poor encouragement, Jeanie, yet I tell you plainly I will wait and hope, should it be for long years."

"Believe me, Archie," she said kindly, "I do not undervalue the high compliment you have paid me. When a good man asks a woman to be his wife, he pays her the highest honor he has it in his power to offer. I thank you from my heart for your thoughts of me, but for the present at least, I have no affection to bestow in return. All my desires are centered just now on my erring brother." She was so calm and sad that he saw at once that to press his suit further, at that moment, would but injure his cause.

"Have I not been thinking of Donald, too," he said, "though I must confess it is for your sake. See, I have got the money. Two fifty-pound bank of England notes. Say you accept them from me as a gift, dear Jeanie. Then do as you wish with them."

"I thank you from the bottom of my heart, Cousin Archie," she replied, "but I am glad to say I do not now need the money. Indeed, I am very sorry that you have had the unpleasantness of knowing anything about poor Donald's foolishness." He looked embarrassed and deeply disappointed. After a pause he inquired a trifle bitterly:

"I am sorry, Jeanie, that you decline my offered assistance. May I ask if you have already obtained the money from some one else? Or, better still, has Donald's creditor become merciful?" She felt that she owed him much for his offered kindness and for the trouble he had gone to in order to serve her. So she replied simply and truthfully:

"Creditors of that kind are never merciful, I fear. I have got the money from a friend."

"A friend?" he answered gloomily. "Would he have done so much to obtain it for you as I have, I wonder?" The words seemed to escape him almost unconsciously. The moment he uttered them he started violently and uneasily glanced round the apartment as if he feared that they were not alone. Jeanie noticed his embarrassment but attributed it entirely to disappointment over her refusal to accept his proferred aid. Besides, like every truly good woman, she was sorry in her heart for the man whose love, she felt, had been bestowed on her in vain. Scarcely able to restrain tears she answered him kindly and sympathetically:

"Archie, I am sure you know that I am deeply sorry for this misunderstanding that has arisen between us. I know, also, that you are not a man who could be satisfied with a marriage entered into as a mere worldly arrangement. No more could I. Therefore it is only fair to you, and to myself, that I should be perfectly honest with you. Try to think it is all for the best, Archie, when I tell you that you can never be more to me than you are at present."

"You are cruel to me, Jeanie—and I could die for you."

"It might be harder to live for me."

"To live for you would be my highest aim in life."

"I fear you have not high ideals, Archie."

"What higher ideal than that love rules all?"

"The love that rules all, forgets self, for the sake of its object."

"How can I prove my love for you, Jeanie?"

By trying to forget me."

"You ask what is impossible; and I do not wish to forget you." There was a fire in his eyes she did not like. She was suddenly touched with a feeling of resentment. Drawing herself to her full height, she answered gently:

"It is useless to discuss the matter further, Archie. Surely you can understand that my wishes ought to be considered as well as yours." She saw the mighty effort it cost him to control his temper, and she felt herself tremble and grow chill, as he whispered:

"The obstacles which stand between us shall be removed, Jeanie. You shall one day be my wife, in spite of man or devil."

Huckleberry Finn

Excerpt from "The Feud" from "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn":

"One day Buck and me was away out in the woods, hunting, and heard a horse coming. We was crossing the road. Buck says: 'Quick! Jump for the woods.'

"We done it and then peeped down the woods through the leaves. Pretty soon a splendid young man came galloping down the road, setting his horse easy and looking like a soldier. He had his gun across his pommel. I had seen him before. It was young Harney Shepherdson. I heard Buck's gun go off at my ear, and Harney's hat tumbled off from his head. He grabbed his gun and rode straight to the place where we was hid. But we did not wait. We started through the woods on a run. The woods warn't thick, so I looked over my shoulder to dodge the bullet, and twice I seen Harney cover Buck with his gun; and then he rode away the way he came—to get his hat, I reckon, but I couldn't see. We never stopped running till we got home. * * *

"Soon as I could get Buck down by the corn-cribs under the trees by ourselves, I says:

"'Did you want to kill him, Buck?'

"'Well I bet I did.'

"'What did he do to you?'

"'Him. He never done nothing to me.'

"'Well, then, what did you want to kill him for?'

"'Why nothing—only it's on account of the feud.'

"'What's a feud?'

"Why, where was you raised? Don't you know what a feud is?'

"'Never heard of it before—tell me about it.'

"'Well,' says Buck, 'a feud is this way. A man has a quarrel with another man, and kills him; then that other man's brother kills him; then the other brothers, on both sides, goes for one another; then the cousins chip in—and by-and-by everybody's killed off, and there ain't no more feud. But its kind of slow and takes a long time.'

"'Has this one been going on long, Buck?'

"'Well, I should reckon! It started thirty years ago, or som'ers along there. There was trouble about something, and then a lawsuit to settle it; and the suit went agin one of the men, and so he up and shot the man that won the suit—which he would naturally do, of course. Anybody would.'

"'What was the trouble about. Buck?—land?'

"'I reckon maybe, I don't know.'

"'Well, who done the shooting? was it a Graingerford or a Shepherdson?'

"'Laws, how do I know, it was so long ago.'

"'Don't anybody know?'

"'Oh, yes, pa knows, I reckon, and some of the other old folks; but they don't know now what the row was about in the first place.'

"'Has there many been killed, Buck?'

"'Yes—right smart chance of funerals. But they don't always kill. Pa's got a few buckshot in him; but he don't mind it, 'cuz he don't weigh much anyway. Bob's been carved up some with a bowie, and Tom's been hurt once or twice.'"

It Takes Two

A lad of seventeen was telling an older friend, recently, of an experience he had had that day. As the apprentice of a carpenter, he had been sent to a saloon to take the measures for a new counter. It was very cold weather, and he arrived with his teeth fairly chattering in his head, for his coat was thin. The saloon-keeper immediately mixed a hot drink and pushed it over the counter to him. "It'll cost you nothing," he said; "drink it down, and you'll soon stop shivering, my boy."

"He meant it kindly, too, and didn't think any harm," said the apprentice, as he told the story. That's what made it harder to push it back, and I didn't want it."

"It must have been a big temptation," said the friend. "That saloon-keeper might have started you on the road to ruin."

"Well," replied the lad frankly, "I'd rather have had it than some other kinds. You see, it takes two to make a temptation. There's no saloon-keeper and no cold weather can make me drink when I don't want to. The temptation I'm afraid of is the one that I'm ready for before it comes, by hankering after it. I don't take much credit to myself for refusing that drink; and, if I had taken it, why, I wouldn't have put all the blame on the saloon-keeper, as some folks do. It takes two, every time, to make a successful temptation."

It was an honest way to look at the question. Temptation is not all a matter of outward happening, but also of inner readiness. No outsider can be responsible for our sins as we are responsible. "He tempted me" only explains one side of the temptation. The other side—the personal side—we must answer for, and no excuse will save us. "It takes two," and one of the two is always our own responsible self.—United Presbyterian.

I have long made up my mind to take for granted the genuine heartedness of my friends, notwithstanding any temporary ambiguousness in their behaviour or their tongues.—Keats.

Contentment

By Eugene Field.

Once on a time an old red hen
  Went strutting round with pompous clucks.
For she had little babies ten,
  A part of which were tiny ducks.
"'Tis very rare that hens," said she,
  "Have baby ducks as well as chicks;
But I possess, as you can see,
  Of chickens four and ducklings six!"

A season later, this old hen
  Appeared, still cackling of her luck,
For, though she boasted babies ten,
  Not one among them was a duck!
"'Tis well," she murmured, brooding o'er
  The little chicks of fleecy down;
"My babies now will stay ashore,
  And consequently, cannot drown!"

The following spring the old red hen
  Clucked just as proudly as of yore,
But lo! her babes were ducklings ten,
  Instead of chickens as before!
"'Tis better," said the old red hen,
  As she surveyed her waddling brood;
"A little water now and then
  Will surely do my darlings good!"

But, oh, alas, how very sad!
  When gentle spring rolled round again,
The eggs eventuated bad,
  And childless was the old red hen!
Yet patiently she bore her woe,
  And still she wore a cheerful air,
And said, "'Tis best these things are so,
  For babies are a dreadful care!"

I half-suspect that many men,
  And many,many women, too,
Could learn a lesson from the hen
  With foliage of vermillion hue.
She ne'er presumed to take offense,
  At any fate that might befall,
But meekly bowed to Providence.
  She was contented—that was all!

The Runaway Boy

Two figures stand in the starlight looking out over the dark water toward the lights of a large brig which is anchored in the harbor. One of them throws a bundle into a sail boat, which he then proceeds to unfasten.

Hark! they hear approaching footsteps.

The other jumps quickly into the boat and lies as motionless as the bundle of clothes by his side. His heart beats fast as he hears the watchman call:

"Who is there?"

"It is I," returns his friend; "I have business with the captain of yonder American ship and cannot wait till morning."

It was a Japanese boy who lay so still in the bottom of the boat; and in that day, not so very many years ago, any Japanese who ran away from his country was liable to be put to death. Therefore the boy felt much relieved when the watchman passed on without making any farther inquiry. His friend stepped into the boat, and rowed swiftly toward the brig, on board of which the runaway was kindly received by the captain, who locked him up safely in a storeroom of the ship's cabin. When he woke in the morning, he heard Japanese officers talking in the cabin with the captain, and scarcely dared to breathe for fear of discovery. After a while the officers went away in their boat, and the brig sailed out of the harbor, bound for China. When the shores of Japan were fast receding from view, and danger of pursuit was over, the friendly captain unlocked the door of the storeroom where the runaway lay concealed. He came out, to find himself among a strange people, whose language he could not understand.

Has this Japanese boy been cruelly treated by his parents, or is he a poor homeless fellow whom love of change and hope of golden fortunes have induced to make this perilous venture? Neither; he is leaving behind, with deep regret, kind parents and dear brothers and sisters. A few years before this, he read a history of the United States in the Chinese language; and the account of a strange country so unlike, and, as he thought, so superior to his own, had filled him with longing to learn more about it.

Sometimes he would go away from the house of the prince who employed him to do writing, in order that he might study with a foreign teacher. When the prince found it out, he was much displeased. One day the prince said:

"Why do you run out from here?"

"I wished to learn foreign knowledge," the boy replied. "My soul went to my teacher's house to learn, and my body was obliged to go, too."

Then the prince laughed and promised to give him more wages if he would stay with him. But it was knowledge, not money, that the boy wanted; so he gladly took the first opportunity to sail for a foreign port.

When they landed in China, the captain of the brig on which he had sailed took him to Captain Taylor of the Wild Rover, bound for the United States.

"What is your name?" asked the captain.

"Neesima Shimeta," was the reply.

Sailors do not like long names, and this one sounded odd to the Yankee captain; so he answered gruffly, but not unkindly, "I shall call you Joe." And Joe, or Joseph, he was always called thereafter."

While waiting for the Wild Rover to sail, Joe thought he would like to buy a copy of the New Testament in Chinese. He had seen one in Japan, and thought it a wonderful book. Not having money enough for the purchase, he sold his much prized Japanese sword, and bought the book which became the guide and comfort of his life.

He worked his passage as a cabin boy. Captain Taylor was kind to him, and taught him much useful knowledge. Knowing his great desire for an education, he told the owner of the ship about him as soon as they arrived in America. This gentleman was so much pleased with Joe that he sent him to school, and paid all his expenses for several years.

Meanwhile the people of Japan had found out that there were some things to learn outside of their own country, and they sent more young men to American schools. They also sent word to Joe that he could return to Japan, without fear of punishment, when he had completed his studies. This made him very happy; for he loved his own country and the friends he had left there.

After an absence of ten years, Joseph Neesima went back to his dear native land. How glad his old father was to see him! As glad, I think, as that other father of whom we read in the Bible, was to see his long-lost son, Joseph. And how glad Joseph was to bring to his friends the "foreign knowledge" which he had acquired, and especially the story of Jesus Christ, who died, not only for Americans, but for all the world.

Once again he visited the United States and on his return to Japan a second time, this same Neesima, who a few years before had stolen forth secretly by night, was met with a joyous welcome by five hundred people. They loved him because he lived a noble life, and tried to help his people. He died honored by all his countrymen, and today hundreds of young Japanese are studying at the great Christian college which he founded in Japan. —Emily Tolman in Sunday-school Times.

Schoolboy Answers

There seems to be no limit to the mistakes schoolboys may make in answering examination questions. These are from a prize competition, arranged by the English University Correspondent, for the best collection of twelve mistakes made by schoolboys:

Lord Raleigh was the first man to see the Invisible Armada.

Tennyson wrote "In Memorandum."

Thomas Becket used to wash the feet of leopards.

Henry I died of eating Palfreys.

Louis XVI was gelatined during the French Revolution.

Algebraical symbols are used when you don't know what you are talking about.

Gravitation is that which if there were none we should all fly away.

A renegade is a man who kills a king.

Etymology is a man who catches butterflies and stuffs them.—Jurior Herald.

Table Manners

In silence I must take my seat,
And give God thanks before I eat;
Must for my food in patience wait,
Till I am asked to hand my plate,
I must not scold nor whine nor pout,
Nor move my chair or plate about;
With knife or fork or napkin ring
I must not play, nor must I sing;
I must not speak a useless word,
For children must be seen, not heard.
I must not talk about my food,
Nor fret if I don't think it good,
My mouth with food I must not crowd,
Nor while I'm eating speak aloud.
Must turn my head to cough or sneeze,
And when I ask, say, "If you please."
The tablecloth I must not spoil,
Nor with my food my fingers soil;
Must keep my seat when I have done,
Nor round the table sport or run.
When told to rise, then I must put
My chair away with quiet foot,
And lift my heart to God above
In praise for all his wondrous love.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, JUNE 5.

Theme for the Day—The Eternal Word.

Scripture—In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. . . . And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us. John 1:1, 14.

Amid the eternal silences
God's endless Word was spoken;
None heard but He who always spake,
And the silence was unbroken.

O marvelous! O worshipful!
No song nor sound is heard,
But everywhere, and every hour,
In love, in wisdom, and in power,
The Father speaks his dear Eternal Word.

Prayer.—Our good Father, this day once more we are reminded of Thy saving grace, which has not left us in darkness, but has given us the light of life. We adore Thee for Christ, the Word of God incarnate, who has entered into the fulness of our life that we through him may know the way into the fulness of the divine life. May this day bring to us the joy of worship with Thy people, and of hearing the living Word proclaimed. Keep us this day without sin, we beseech Thee, and may the evening bring us the peace of Thy presence, and the assurance of the rest that remains for the people of God. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

MONDAY, JUNE 6.

Theme for the Day.—The Soul's Eternity.

Scripture.—For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive. . . . The last enemy that shall be abolished is death.—I. Cor. 15:22-26.

The stars shall fade away,
The sun himself grow dim with age
And nature sink in years.
But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth,
Unhurt amid the war of elements,
The wreck of matter, and the crush of worlds.
—Addison ("Cato.")

Prayer.—O God, our Father, we praise Thee for Thy image in us. Thou hast created us with the seeds of eternity in our natures, and with the vision of its wonders before our eyes. Save us, we beseech Thee, from the sin and disaster of missing so divine a destiny. May we not decline to the low levels of earthly satisfaction, but seek the things which are above, where alone immortal natures can be satisfied, and may we nourish the eternity that is in us, till in the image of Christ we find our true and holy life. For his sake. Amen.

TUESDAY, JUNE 7.

Theme for the Day.—In the country, with God.

Scripture.—And Isaac went out to meditate in the field at the eventide.—Gen. 24:63.

And there were shepherds in the same country abiding in the field, and keeping watch by night over their flock.—Luke 2:8.

Here in the country's heart
Where the grass is green,
Life is the same sweet life
As it e'er hath been.

God comes down in the rain,
And the crops grow tall—
This is the country faith,
And the best of all.
—Norman Gale ("The Country Faith.")

Prayer.—Holy Father, we bless Thee for the calm and restfulness of the open country, the shadow of trees, the music of running streams, and the sense of wholesome peace that nature imparts. May those of us who dwell in the country realize the blessing of our lot, and those of us who abide in town or city seek such renewal of soul from time to time as the broader life of nature yields, and may our faith in Thee be quickened by all experiences in the field, the forest and the wide and open world. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 8.

Theme for the Day.—A Steadfast Heart.

Scripture.—My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed.—Psa. 57:7.

He shall not be afraid of evil tidings; his heart is fixed, trusting in Jehovah.—Psa. 112:7.

One who brings
A mind not to be changed by place or time;
The mind is its own place, and in itself
Can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven.
What matter where, if I be still the same,
And what I should be?
—John Milton ("Paradise Lost." I.)

Prayer.—Our heavenly Father, we praise Thee that by Thy strength we are able to make our lives triumphant over time and place and evil fortune. In the life of our Lord Jesus Christ, Thou hast given us the supreme example of a human life divinely calm and serene in the midst of most disturbing scenes. We crave the mind that was his, the peace and confidence, the sense of infinite things, the assurance that all things work together for good to them that love God. Father, endue us with the spirit of our Lord, we ask for his sake. Amen.

THURSDAY, JUNE 9.

Theme for the Day.—As in a Mirror, Darkly.

Scripture.—For now we see in a mirror, darkly; but then face to face; now I know in part; but then shall I know fully, even as also I was fully known.—I. Cor. 13:12.

Here through the feeble twilight of this world
Groping, how many, until we pass and reach
That other where we see as we are seen.
—Tennyson ("Geraint and Enid.")

Prayer.—Our Father, we learn to know our limitations as we understand Thy greatness. We know but little, but Thou art all-wise. We are weak, but in Thy strength we can do all things. Lighten our eyes, we pray Thee, that we may see. Touch our lips with coals from off the altar, that we may testify of Thee. Strengthen our hands, that we may fulfill Thy will during the little day of our lives. And bring us in due season, to that better life where we shall see face to face and know as we have been known. We pray in Jesus' name. Amen.

FRIDAY, JUNE 10.

Theme for the Day.—The True Gifts.

Scripture.—Wise men from the east came to Jerusalem. . . . And they came into the house and saw the young child with Mary his mother; and they fell down and worshipped him; and opening their treasures they offered unto him gifts, gold and frankincense and myrrh.—Matt 2:1-11.

Who gives his life for beauty's need,
King Gaspar could no more;
Who serves the truth with single mind
Shall stand with Melchior:
And love is all that Balthasar
In crested censor bore.
—Bliss Carmen ("The Twelfth Night Star.")

Prayer.—Our Father, we have read the story of the wise men who came from the east to the holy city to bring their gifts to the infant king. We also would worship at his feet. But help us, we beseech Thee, to bring the nobler gifts of courage, faithfulness and love, which are beyond all price. We know that bearing such treasures, we shall always find welcome and approval of him. Hear and aid us for his sake. Amen.

SATURDAY, JUNE 11.

Theme for the Day.—Survival.

Scripture.—For as the new heavens and the new earth, which I will make, shall remain before me, saith Jehovah, so shall your seed and your name remain.—Isa. 66:22.

Nothing that is shall perish utterly,
But perish only to revive again
In other forms—as clouds restore in rain
The exhalations of the earth and sea.
Men build their houses from the masonry
Of ruined tombs; the passion and the pain
Of hearts that long have ceased to beat
Remain, and throb in hearts that are, or are to be.

Prayer.—Merciful God, we think of Thee amid the changing processes of life, and our hearts grow strong and confident that though all around us melts into new forms, nothing is lost, and that we ourselves and all that love counts dear cannot be lost. Comfort us with this assurance, till our lives become immortal in companionship with Thee. We thank Thee for the week gone by. Make all our days Thy care, and bring us to the never-ending day of eternity. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Preacher's Salary

I have only one suggestion to make: Let the minister make sure that he can really earn a larger salary. I do not mean to intimate that ministers are indolent, or that they do not expend a sufficient amount of energy upon their work. But it is not clear that the average minister of today is in any sense an expert at his occupation. Current theological training does not in most cases prepare one for pastoral work as law schools give legal advice, or as medical schools prepare men to diagnose disease, or as engineering schools fit men to plan and supervise construction work. Young men go into the minisry without ever having studied religion! They become pastors of the young without knowing what constitutes a good Sunday-school. They undertake to lead the conscience of the community when their own consciences are ignorant of the social issues of the time. It is a common remark that current preaching is, on the whole, below the intellectual level of the more intelligent members of the congregations. Let this not be understood as a sweeping accusation against the ministry of today, but only as a suggestion concerning a direction in which improvement is in many, many cases possible. The practical consequences of these conditions should be more of the right kind of study on the part of some ministers, and a demand from all ministers that ministerial education should be reformed.—Professor George Albert Coe, Ph. D.

AT THE CHURCH

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Heathen Mother*

The narrow strip of land between the Mediterranean Sea and the Lebanon mountains was called Phoenician in ancient times, and was counted a part of Syria in the days of Jesus. Its two important cities were Tyre and Sidon. They had a very ancient history. Hiram, the king of Tyre, was a friend of David and of Solomon, and furnished much of the material for the temple. Ethbaal, king of Sidon, was the father og Jezebel, the wife of Ahab, and the great opponent of Elijah. Alexander the Great besieged Tyre for three years, as Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon had done before him, and the prophets spoke often of Tyre and Sidon, naming them along with Ninevah, Babylon, Sodom and Gemorrah as symbols of heathen wickedness.

Into this region Jesus and the disciples came, on one of those journeys which they took with increasing frequency toward the close of the public ministry. They were journeys that permitted freedom and rest from the incessant pressure of public crowds and calls for the output of strength. They were means of evading the hostility of the ruling classes, of which Jesus had become aware through the efforts made to interrupt his teachings and to throw obstacles in his way. And they gave opportunity for closer converse with the Twelve than the busy days in the Jewish environment of Galilee or Jerusalem.

The Unhappy Woman.

But Jesus was not wholly unknown even in this heathen region. No doubt rumor hurried on before to arouse in the Syrian villages of this northern coast a curiosity that robbed his journey of much of that seclusion which he would have preferred. But it also, as in this instance, gave him the privilege of ministering to the needs of those who were beyond the pale of Jewish privilege. A Canaanitish woman living in one of the towns near the sea, hearing the report concerning the strangers who were passing through the place, determined to make trial of their pity and power. Her daughter was the victim of insanity, which was usually rated as possession by a demon. There was no other source to which she could hopefully apply. No doubt the magical rites and incantation to which the superstitious and ignorant practitioners of the time resorted had been tried, with the usual result of complete failure. The mother in her desperate anxiety and love was willing to try any method that gave the slightest promise of success.

She therefore threw herself before Jesus, and with insistent words begged him to heal her afflicted daughter. She had heard of the David of old, and the popular title with which Jesus was invested as "son of David" in the loving regard of the people had caught her attention, and she addressed him by this title. But he gave her no heed, walking on quietly as if she were not there. Not to be baffled by this first repulse, the woman followed him, and with piteous cries and beseechings she called upon him for mercy and help, until even the disciples, accustomed as they must have been to incidents of suffering, could bear it no longer, and begged Jesus to send her away. Her heart-broken pleas were too much for even their rough nature.

The Severity of Jesus.

In this attitude of Jesus there is significant answer to those representations of his nature that portray only the soft and considerate side. Truly he went about doing good. He was the friend of all. Paul could well adjure the Corinthians "by the meekness and gentleness of Christ." The nature of the Master was constantly exhibited in acts of compassion and good will. But this was by no means his only side. No human life was ever more complete in all the qualities that make perfection, and among these sternness, severity, indignation and refusal have a normal place. We need to be reminded of the manliness of Christ lest we should fall into the foolish error of supposing that he had no power of resistance to importunity. The men who cannot say "No," both to temptation and to pleading, lack something of the virility which Jesus revealed. Some may have yielded to the mistake that softness was the ruling quality in his life. Not so did Peter think in that day when Jesus turned upon him fiercely with the stinging words, "Get thee behind me, Satan, thou art an offence unto me." Not so did the multitudes think when Jesus turned with anger to rebuke the folly and impertinence of his questioners. Not so did the Scribes and Pharisees feel when our Lord let fall upon them those blistering words in which were contained the eight-fold denunciation of their insincerity and pride. And not so did either the disciples or this woman of Canaan think as they followel the silent figure of Jesus along the sands of the sea, while neither entreaty nor tears seemed to break the barrier of his silence and reserve.

The Limitations of Jesus' Work.

At last when the situation seemed unbearable to the disciples, Jesus stopped and said to them, "This is no part of my work. I did not come to minister to those outside my nation. I was sent only to the straying sheep of the fold of Israel." In this statement Jesus set forth the great principle to which he so sternly adhered during all his life. It seems almost incredible that the greatest character in history should have been shut up within the narrow confines of a country scarcely larger than the smallest of our states Yet Jesus knew that every departure from his own soil was at the expense of his work. His program was intensive rather than extensive. He confined his labors to the classroom of little Palestine, in order that his pupils, the twelve men whom he had chosen to represent him after his departure, might lack nothing of adequate instruction. It was not that he loved Israel more than he loved humanity. But he had to reach humanity through Israel, and indeed, through the very few men whom he was able to keep close to him and to instruct. It was to make this lesson clear that Jesus treated this Canaanite suppliant as he did, and spoke with such emphasis to the disciples.

The Importunate Mother.

Yet, as in so many instances, Jesus knew what he would do. There was no purpose on his part to disregard finally the anguished appeal of the heathen mother. Perhaps he would test her faith; perhaps he would compel the disciples to recognize the distinction between their own privilege and that of the rest of the world, a distinction which also marked the breadth of their responsibility; perhaps also he wanted to teach the lesson that success is the result of such unwearying persistence as knows no refusal.

Nothing in the gospel records is more admirable than the simple faith and undismayed optimism of the woman. She might have denied his statement, that he came to care for the children of Israel and that her race were entitled only to a menial place in his esteem. From the Sidonian point of view no doubt the Jews were as heartily despised as they were by other races. But instead of taking this tactless course, the mother accepted instantly the word of Jesus that the bread must be given to the children, but she pleaded the right of even dogs to the fragments of the feast. She had only the claim which human sympathy guarantees, but that claim was enough. Jesus had no mind to resist unduly her tearful appeal. She had been tried over-much by his silence and apparent disdain. He meant now to reward her with the fullness of his favor.

He therefore said, "Your faith is great. It shall be even as you desire." With these words he lifted the load of trouble from her heart. She was in no mood even to ask some pledge that the cure would be wrought, nor to insist that Jesus should come to her home to make certain that her daughter was healed. Like the centurian of Capernaum she accepted Jesus' word as final, and went away with perfect confidence that the cure was already wrought. This was precisely the atmosphere in which Jesus could most effectively work his deeds of power and helpfulness. The mother's faith was itself a remedial agent of the highest value. Convinced that the malady had departed, she went home rejoicing to find the child calm and apparently free from the distress which had befallen her. And thus the Master had again vindicated the definiteness of his task, the greatness of his love, and the efficacy of the faith that had in him its center and ideal.

Hymn of a Child

Loving Jesus meek and mild,
Look upon a little child.
Make me as gentle as Thou art,
Come and live within my heart.
Take my childish hand in Thine,
Guide these little feet of mine.
So shall all my happy days
Sing their pleasant song of praise,
And the world shall always see
Christ the Holy Child in me.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic June 12: God Knows. Psa. 103: Matt. 6:7, 8.

God knows and our consciousness that he knows is our salvation. We all shrink from public opinion. We hesitate to have the facts of our private life known to the public, largely because we fear an unfavorable judgment. Those who persist in sinful lives seek the cover of the night's darkness under which to commit their crime. The gambler, the denizen of the slums, and the burglar wait for the darkness in order that they work unrecognized. Not merely that they may escape punishment from the law, but that they may escape the condemnation of the public and the social ostracism which is sure to follow. To what extent the frown of the public has been the means of restraining those who would otherwise have yielded to temptation we have no means of knowing, except that from observation we know it is very great. All this is true and more of the man or the woman who lives in the fear of God. Since God not only knows but discerns the intents of the heart, he who seeks to be a child of God not only refrains from the overt act, but he seeks to banish from his mind evil and unrighteous thoughts, yea he would replace them with prayer and meditation for purity of heart, nobility of purpose, and willingness to serve. From God's knowledge there is no means of escape.

It is a great encouragement to remember that God knows. The idea of a righteous life is so beautiful and so glorious, and of the actual lives that we live so coarse, so vulgar, so far below, that there is great danger of discouragement and of giving up the struggle. But when we recall that God knows the longings of our hearts, the attraction that this great ideal has for us, our sincere efforts and great struggles to be true, and that He is a God of "loving kindness and tender mercies" we take courage. His justice is tempered with mercy.

"He hath not dealt with us after our sins,
Nor rewarded us after our iniquities."

Our efforts judged by the absolute standard of true righteousness are pathetic. Despair would overwhelm us. But,

"Like as a father pitieth his children,
So Jehovah pitieth them that fear him."

The child often, time even when his own sense of failure is keenest, nestles in the father's arms with a sense of satisfaction and protection not because he deserves but because the father loves him. It is not otherwise with those who serve Jehovah. He knows us, our longings, our struggles, our temptations, yes,

"He remembereth that we are dust."
"For He knoweth our frame; and it is our privilege to come to Him after faithful and honest effort, knowing that even though we have failed a blessing and benediction awaits his weak and faltering children. But God knows and if we should go so far astray as to attempt to use this unspeakable love as a license for the exercise of evil thought and action, we forfeit every claim even to his grace. God knows and we must be true at heart.

Prayer

BY B. W. RICE.

I have an idea that more of our prayers would be answered satisfactorily to us if we would cultivate them after they are made. We usually close with "amen" which we let mean "there we have done with it, let it go at that." According to the law of prayer there is nothing to be expected after we have dismissed the petition from our minds. That ends it with God, and thereafter, so far as any binding promise is concerned or related, it is as if no prayer had been made.

When we have, by our petition, given God to understand what we desire at the moment, we have done but little, for he well understood all that before. The prayer we think no more than to let drop out of our own hearts immediately after speaking it, or within a day or two, or even before we get the answer, is not calculated to sway God to any great extent, and this "swaying" is our inherent position. We must, in some way, present to God a reason for calling upon him to either change his mind toward the transaction or otherwise act in time to grant us the request. When one decides that he himself is through with the prayer he has just made, he may also set it down that God has ceased to act on it.

We plow and plant our seed with no more assurance than we have that prayer will bring its result. It is God's to do or undo it all.

It is up to us to influence God to give us a special dispensation, direct from God and specifically the act of God in any answer to any prayer we make. Anything less than this renders the prayer useless and out of place. Just how a man in all his insignificance has been delegated the power to speak to Jehovah and get him to turn aside impending dangers or bring about oncoming results, is not for us to explain, suffice it to state that such is God's own proposition, and to undertake to explain it means a failure.

Praying is a law complete within itself and mysterious. It is no greater, however, than the law of growth. St. Peter walked on the water. His body weighed just as much one moment as another, but presently he went down. There was a reason. He let loose of God. God quits the very moment we let go. We plant the prayers, we cultivate them and fence them off and protect them, and God applies that wonderful mysterious law of his to them and later we harvest the crop.

Some prayers are answered in a moment, others require half a life time or even the whole run of years from the cradle to the grave. We make a prayer whose answer is due in thirty days and unless God violates his law of prayer and gives us the answer before daylight, we weaken on the whole prayer proposition. More persons have killed their faith in this way than in any other way the Devil has put up to us. Men have learned that a radish seed comes up in a very few days, while the black walnut takes nearly all of two winters to make the germ come to life. A man will make a radish prayer and feel encouraged. The next week he makes a black walnut prayer and falls out with God because he does not violate his eternal law of prayer and make the walnut come up before the planter gets the dust off his trousers. In the realm of plant life we have more sense than concerning the spiritual sphere.

The farmer studies his needs and the condition of his soil and his work is only begun when he casts the seed to earth. The Christian, calculating from the wrong standpoint has placed his basis wrong. He blames God for failing to answer a long-range prayer on a short-range notice. God says that if he is going to do anything definitely for a man, he must have as much notice as possible about it, for there are others. Our great God is not sitting there on his throne waiting for our prayer time to come around, wondering what we will want next. He is busy. He enlarges the numbers of his worlds just as rapidly as his facilities for caring for all his sons and daughters will permit. He perhaps will not undertake to turn a grindstone both ways at the same time, just to give some lazy Christian an opportunity to boast that God gave him what he asked for. Get your prayers all on file just as early as possible, for there is a great and wondrous host of people filing them hourly. Yours will hardly be run in ahead of all others unless yours demand an immediate attention, and in that event you will have to leave it all with God and trust that he will make a special act to accomodate your necessity. Be careful about filing an old black walnut petition when it's a radish growth you want. Make no prayer that you do not intend to back up until the answer comes. It is on file only so long as you turn it over and over in your own mind. If you decide to change your petition or alter it in any way, make a clean-cut alteration of it and do not trust to luck, for there is no such thing as luck in the realm of prayer. It is governed by a law equal in austerity to any other law than has ever been discovered. The distracted mother kneels beside her dying child and feels within her own heart that there will not be time enough for God to get around. She makes her petition from the standpoint of her own ideas about such things, and dares to take the chances. The time element enters into this case, and the woman has but little on file to which she can refer God at this distressing moment and consequently she loses out. From the moment the child was born she should have refuged it behind as strong a petition as it was possible for her to file.

The time element has been the rock on which many a man has lost his faith. God takes more time to answer some petitions than to others, and only God's unlimited power permits him to take up one case ahead of another of seeming less importance so far as man can discern. Let us use the same hard sense in our prayers that we use in the ordinary affairs of human life, and we will be surprised at the results.

Caldwell, Idaho.

Last Words

By Helen Hunt.

Father, I scarcely dare to pray,
So clear I see now it is done,
That I have wasted half my day,
And left my work but just begun.

So clear I see that I have hurt
The souls I might have hoped to save;
That I have idle been, inert,
Deaf to the calls the Master gave.

So clear I see that things I thought
Were right or harmless were a sin;
So clear I see that I have sought,
Unconscious, selfish aims to win.

In outskirts of thy kingdom vast,
Father, the humblest place give me.
Set me the lowliest task thou hast;
Let me, repentant, work for thee!

Church Life

—Congratulations to the new alumni, and alumae.

—The summer vacation season draws near, but sweeten the pleasures of that season with the thought of work well completed.

—The Christian Century will come to you during your vacation, if you will notify the office of your change of address.

—During the summer The Christian Century will publish some special articles on the improvement of the work of the Sunday school.

—Preachers, tell us where you expect to spend your vacation. Others will be interested in knowing, and your plan may be suggestive to others.

—Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Morrison are off for their trip to Edinburgh, England, and the various countries of the continent. They will return early in August. Mr. Morrison will continue to contribute editorial material to the paper during his absence.

J. T. Ogle, Paris, Texas, has accepted a call to the church at Shawnee, Okla.

I. A. Wilson closed his work at Valley Falls, Kansas, and began at Marion, the same state, on the first day of May.

LeRoy M. Anderson is getting his work before the community by paid "ads." in the local paper.

The annual convention of the fourth district of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society will be held at Normal, June 7-9.

C. C. Smith, Cincinnati, Ohio, addressed the congregation of the church in Atlantic, Iowa, Sunday, May 22.

The Martin family are now in a meeting at Greenfield, Mo., with nearly one hundred accessions to the church.

Church at Rock Creek, Ohio, is in need of a pastor. Write J. A. Braden, Rock Creek, Ohio.

Ernest C. Mobley, Dixon Street Church, Gainesville, Texas, has been called to remain with the church indefinitely.

The annual meeting of the First District of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society will be held at Dixon, Ill., June 15, 16, 17.

C. C. Sinclair, pastor of the South Emporia Ave. Church, Wichita, Kansas, recently gave an address before the meeting of the Y. M. C. A.

The church at Fairbury, Ill., is now without a pastor. The city has a population of 2,500 and a good field. The salary offered is $900 a year.

R. H. Ingram closed his work at Perry, Iowa, the first of June. This is a good church and field of fine prospects for some ambitious young man. Write H. T. Munn.

May 18, Hugh Wayt gave the address before the G. A. R. and the high school at Zanesville, Ohio. It was a combination of memorial day and peace day service.

Cortland H. Livingston, who about seven months ago became pastor of the church at Freeport, Ill., has resigned to accept a call to the church at Newman, Ill.

J. N. Johnston, Geneva, Ohio, has accepted a call to the Church of Christ of Fostoria, Ohio, and will begin there after the state convention at Toledo.

The churches at Trumbull and East Thompson, Ohio, will be open for a pastor after June 1. Write Harmon Bower, Geneva, Ohio, R. F. D. 4.

Dr. J. H. Garrison spoke at the morning service of the Lenox Avenue Church, New York City, May 29. He was enroute to the World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh.

The "Catch-My-Pal" movement in Ireland has an interesting adaptation in the Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, where a "Catch-My-Friend" movement is building up the Sunday school.

H. S. Gilliam, J. M. Monroe, and O. N. Roth, Enid, have been appointed to arrange for a special train on which the Disciples of Oklahoma will travel to the national convention at Topeka, next fall.

W. A. Moore, pastor of the First Church, Tacoma, has been invited to deliver the baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class of Washington State Normal, at Ellensburg, June 12.

The church at Lindsay, Calif., is without a pastor, and it is the opinion of those who know the field that if a good man would go there a fine work could be done in a short time.

By unanimous vote of the church at Wellsville, Ohio, A. A. Honeywell of Indiana has been called to the pastorate of the church to succeed C. L. Morrison, who has just resigned.

Oliver W. Stewart made a temperance address in the Christian Church, Urichsville, Ohio, Thursday evening, June third. He would find many friends to himself and his cause in this Christian church stronghold.

Evangelist Sumner T. Martin recently held a meeting at Brawley, Calif., which resulted in the organization of a church with fifty-three members. About forty of these had been members of the church elsewhere.

The First Church, Rochester, N. Y., occupied its newly repaired building for the first time the twenty-second day of May. There were five confessions, and a generous offering to defray the balance of the expense of repairs.

J. G. Waggoner, Canton, Ill., is preaching a series of sermons to young people. His subjects are: "Prosperity," "Courtship, Marriage and Home," "Recreations and Amusements," "Spiritual Life," "Character and Its Triumphs."

H. T. Morrison, whose pastorate of a union church of Baptists and Disciples on Prince Edward Island closed some time ago, is recovering from an illness due to overwork. He may be addressed at Springfield, Ill., in care of his son, Dr. H. T. Morrison, Jr.

Mr. and Mrs. Guy W. Sarvis, now under appointment as missionaries to China, under the F. C. M. S., as living links of the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, both received degrees from the University of Chicago during the June convocation.

Dr. Errett Gates left Chicago this week for study abroad during the coming year. Dr. Gates will use this opportunity to pursue special studies in his chosen field of church history, being under leave of absence from the University of Chicago.

The Christian Church, Iowa City, Iowa, dedicated its new $3,500 pipe organ June 2-5. The chief sermons were given by T. J. Dow of Minneapolis, former pastor of the church. C. C. Rowlison is the successful pastor of the church.

Albert Buxton received nine additions into the church the closing Sunday of his work with the Central Church at Pueblo, Colo., and in his new pastorate at Broadway, Pueblo, Colo., there were five accessions the first Sunday.

The following telegram was received too late for publication last week: "South Folk, Va.—Second week; big union meeting; 171 additions; forty Sunday; continue another week. W. B. Hendershot, Martinsville, evangelist." C. B. Richards is the pastor.

There have been 125 additions to church at Danville, Ill., since January 1, about eighty of them being by primary obedience. Mines are shut down and times are hard, but in other regards all is well. Wm. E. Adams is pastor.

N. D. Webber, pastor at Morristown, Ind., has delivered an historical address before the Old Folks Singing Class, preached a special sermon to the G. A. R., delivered the Memorial Day address at Morristown, and the Red Men's Memorial address at Fountaintown during the last month.

Sumner T. Martin is preaching the following series of sermons at Holtville, Calif.: "Desecration of the Lord's Day," "Gambling and Cards," "Shall I Attend the Theater?" "What About the Dance?" "Lying, Gossip and Profanity," "The Danger of Drink," "Deceitfulness of Riches."

W. R. Jinnett and wife, Manilla, Ind., will sail for Europe, June 9, to be gone till about the first of October. Mr. Jinnett can be addressed care North German-Lloyd Steamship Co., Southampton, England, or care Cranston's Ivenhoe Hotel, Bloomsbury street, London, England.

Charles S. Medbury, pastor of the University Church, Des Moines, Iowa, was commencement speaker at the Southern Christian Institute at Edwards, Miss. During the same week the state negro convention met in the same place, and Mr. Medbury was given a place on their program.

We overreached our apportionment for the A. C. M. S. yesterday by a few dollars. Our treasurer will forward same soon as payments are in, and you may look for a neat remittance from Bible school also. Yours for Christ and America!—Chas. A. Sias, Dallas, Ore.

The Netz Sisters furnished music for those who attended the Texas State Convention, May 22-25. Other musical numbers of special interest were given by Miss Mable Una Bell, Ohio, and Mrs. Gussie Ward, German, Oklahoma Christian University, and the Todd Brothers of Eastern, Texas.

F. H. Bentley will close his work at Tulare, Calif., July first, and will return to the east on account of the illness of his father. During his ministry the church has made good growth, and will now be ready to pay an increased salary to the right man. Tulare is a city of 3,500 persons.

The San Joaquin ministers' meeting was held at the First Church, Fresno, Calif., May 9. The speaker of the afternoon session was J. J. Haley, who read a paper on "The Next Reformation," which he urged would be an ethical one. The paper provoked great discussion.

Ray O. Miller, pastor of the First Church, Fresno, Calif., reports frequent additions to the church. Old debts amounting to a total of thirteen hundred dollars have been paid, and now the members of the church are talking of a new building thoroughly equipped for the best modern work.

J. M. VanHorn has been secured as acting pastor of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, until a successor to J. E. Lynn is secured. Mr. Van Horn is a man of experience and marked ability, and the church is fortunate in securing his services during the interim while searching for a pastor.

J. F. Findley, who has just closed his work with the Fort Collins Church, Colorado, has just concluded a meeting at Kersey, Colo., which resulted in the organization of a church of seventeen members. A Sunday school and ladies' aid society were also organized.

Things are moving with encouraging life at the East Broadway Church, Sedalia, Mo., where E. H. Williams is the pastor. In the fifteen months of his ministry there have been 113 additions to the church. The painters and decorators are now at work upon the building, giving it a new dress without and within.

W. H. Zenor, who has been pastor of the East Lincoln, Neb., church, since April 1, 1909, has resigned and will close his work with this church the first of August. Mr. Zenor is a hard worker and since his coming to East Lincoln has interested himself especially in the cause of labor. He has not yet decided upon his future location.

William Price, pastor of the Howett St. Church, Peoria, Ill., last week returned to the vocation of his earlier days long enough to lay the brick of the foundation of the new Sunday school building, which is being erected by the men of the Central and the Howett St. Churches of Peoria. The superstructure is to be erected in one day.

The thirtieth annual convention of the Montana Christian Association will be held in Butte, June 1-17. The guests from abroad are: I. N. McCash, Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, J. H. Mohorter, and J. T. Nichols, editor of the Christian Union. This convention program is longer than most of those of the eastern and central states, and is filled with many good things

Dr. Paul Wakefield, living link missionary from the church at Liberty, Mo., is raising by private subscription a sum of $500 for the purchase of a boat to be taken with him for use in China. The Liberty Church, of which R. G. Frank is pastor, will in addition to the fine sum they have already given, contribute to this fund also.

The church at Clinton, Ill., gave a farewell reception to Albert Schwartz, their pastor, May 29, who left the following week for New York, where he set sail for a six months' tour of the world. Mr. Schwartz has a six months' leave of absence that he may make this trip, which he makes under the direction of a university extension department, and for the purpose of both travel and study.

Richard W. Gentry, associate pastor of the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, and fellow in Church History in the University of Chicago, will receive the degree of B. D. at the June convocation. Mr. Gentry has been extended the fellowship for another year and will continue his study, preparatory to taking the degree of Doctor of Philosophy.

The men's Brotherhood of the church at Wabash, Indiana, held its fourth annual fish fry a few days ago, when more than 100 men sat down to the dinner. The fish were (it is said) all caught by the members of the club. After the dinner, Pastor E. F. Daugherty introduced J. K. Shellenberger, field secretary of the Brotherhood, who gave the address of the evening.

This message from Secretary Corey will add zest to the children's day festival. "Children's Day promises to be a record-breaking missionary festival. So far, 500 more schools have ordered supplies than last year. Probably over 4,000 Sunday-schools will observe the day and we believe $100,000 will be the result. This will make more than one million dollars from Children's Day from the beginning. No doubt 2,000,000 people will attend the exercises on June 5.—S. J. Corey."

E. S. Farmer, of Rochester, Ind., is preaching a series of four Sunday-night sermons which are attracting much interest throughout the city. To high school students on "The Discovery of Hidden Talents and Their Proper Use"; to college people and the friends of education on "The Dynamics of Christian Education"; to lodge men on "Men, Their Purpose in Organization and Their Might"; to Rochester citizens on "The Essential Qualities of an Ideal Citizen."

W. B. Craig is pushing the cause of Christian union in the east, where it is both needed, and where the people are ready to receive it. By the arrangement of Mr. Craig, Robert E. Pretlow of the Society of The Friends, Brooklyn, spoke in the Lenox Ave. Church on a recent Sunday morning, Mr. Craig preaching in the Brooklyn pulpit of Mr. Pretlow, and in the evening at his own church, on "Christian Union: What and How?"

H. C. Holmes, for two years pastor of the church at Lawrenceville, Ill., has resigned, and closed his work the first of June. The resignation is brought about by the necessity of Mr. Holmes changing climate on account of his own and his daughter's health. He has accepted a call to Redlands, Calif. Mr. Holmes' work in Lawrenceville was very successful and the church was reluctant to let him go.

H. D. Williams, who has for the past eighteen months been pastor of the church at Kalamazoo, Mich., has resigned. The resignation will take effect the first of July. Since going to Kalamazoo, Mr. Williams has materially advanced the work of the church, and has made a large place for himself both within and without the church. The church universally regrets his departure. Several fields have opened to Mr. Williams but he has not yet announced his plans for the future.

The following report shows a fine work at Tipton, Ind., during the last year under the pastorate of Guy Israel Hoover: For all purposes there was raised $5,492, $2,166 of it going toward the outside indebtedness of the church, and $265 for missions. During the regular minister's labors there were added sixty-five persons, twenty-six by confession of faith and baptism, making a net gain of forty-eight in the membership, and giving a present roll of 508 names. The average attendance upon the Sunday school is 285, and the collection $10.46.

The Central Church, Des Moines, Iowa, has announced a change in the program of the Wednesday evening prayer meeting, to "meet the needs of a modern congregation." Each evening one who is especially prepared to speak upon the subject assigned him will have charge of the evening. The subjects are those which have especial interest to the modern Christian man. The first three evenings will be devoted to a study of the "world field," under the direction of the pastor, Finis Idelman, with the use of maps and charts. Later subjects are not yet announced.

Mrs. Lena Treloar, who has been pastoral helper for the South Broadway Church, Denver, for the past three and one-half years, has resigned, to enter upon other work. Mrs. Treloar's work is highly commended in the Colorado Christian Herald. She has been organizer and superintendent of the home department of the Sunday school, teacher of the young people's Bible class, teacher of teachers' training classes, vice president of the Interdenominational Missionary Union of Denver, and during the absence of Dr. Tyler last summer supplied the pulpit of the South Broadway Church.

The annual meeting of the Central Church of Christ, Syracuse, N. Y., Joseph A. Serena, minister, was held May 18. Reports from all departments showed life and vigor. There were 341 members in the church, a gain of twenty for the year. Total receipts of treasurer, $5,298.88, of which $412.73 was for missions. Bible school averaged 156 in attendance; raised $570, of which $210 went for missions. The C. W. B. M. reported forty-eight members, and $130 raised, while the C. E., with thirty-five members, raised $100, of which $30 went for missions. The ladies' guild raised $215.13 for local work. Total receipts, all departments, $6,250; total given for missions, $775. The property of the congregation is worth $40,000, and is entirely free from debt. A constitution and by-laws was adopted and ordered printed in manual form.

May 2 and 4 at Normal, one of the best institutes in the history of Oklahoma was held. The following ministers were in attendance: Clay T. Runyon, Kingfisher; G. Lyle Smith, El Reno; A. R. Spicer, Lawton; T. N. Noblitt, Guthrie; G. W. Surber, J. H. O. Smith, J M. Monroe, H. S. Gilliam, Oklahoma City; C. A. Musselman, Anadarko; R. E. Rosenstein, H. E. Reed, J. C. Powell, Norman; D. A. Wickizer, Tulsa; O. N. Roth, Enid; E. L. Kirtly, Marlow; A. J. Bradshaw, Stroud; T. F. Odenweller, Enid; J. A. Tabor, Snyder; A. E. Underwood, Holdenville; G. W. McQuiddy, Alva; F D. Macey, Bartlesville; Virtes Williams, Stillwater; W. S. Priest, Wichita, Kansas; J. H. Henderson, Pauls Valley, and J. W. Woodside, Kansas. W. S. Priest, of Wichita, Kansas, was the lecturer, and did his work to the satisfaction of all. It was conceded on all hands that his lectures were of an unusually high order. Not a note of discord was heard from the beginning to the end of the institute. The discussions were spirited and indulged in freely, but without acrimony or venom. Much credit is due D. A. Wickizer, the president, and R. E. Rosenstein, the secretary. The regrettable thing was that so few ministers were in attendance. The ladies of the church furnished most excellent meals for the sum of 25 cents and put all under obligation to them for their excellent service.

A Nation's Grief

"The King is dead!"

A disaster which involves a multitude, as from earthquake, famine, or flood, seems more terrible than that which concerns only an individual, and yet suffering is an individual matter, and to multiply the number does not really increase the pain. So a grief which involves a nation seems greater than the sorrow of a single individual. It is a case in which "a sorrow shared is not divided."

It has been my lot to see a nation four times in sorrow, and it is an experience not without value. I have been profoundly impressed by each in turn. The first was in my early boyhood at the death of Garfield; the second was the death of Queen Victoria, followed closely by that of McKinley, and the fourth is the present national, yes world-wide lamentation at the passing of King Edward VII.

Contrast with America's Grief.

Many of my readers will recall an earlier grief, that at the death of Lincoln. In the case of America the grief in the three cases mentioned was accentuated by the fact of death being due to dastardly assassination. In the other cases there has been nothing to assist the imagination or inflame the passions of the populace other than the deep feeling of regard for the departed. Any one viewing the expressions of grief from afar might imagine that much of it was formal and meaningless, but seeing and experiencing it at close hand it is different. No one would have imagined nine short years ago that if the son of his illustrious mother were taken in so short a time the grief would have been anything like that shown on the occasion of her death. The facts show not only the futility of attempting to prophesy concerning such things, but what is more significant, they indicate the admirable diplomacy with which the late king manipulated the situation and captured all hearts. It was not an easy thing to do but it has been done with consummate skill.

Wished to Follow His Mother.

The prayer of the late sovereign that he might walk in the footsteps of his illustrious mother, seemed to some, at the time, to border upon sacrilege, and to be next to impossible; but without exaggeration it may be said he has done so, and not only so but he has marked out new paths for himself,—paths the treading of which have made for the world's peace, and for the prosperity of the kingdom and empire over which he ruled. It is not necessarily contended that had he come to the throne at the same age as did his mother he would have made the impression on history that she did, but in the less than a decade of ripened years which he has given to the task of directing the affairs of a world empire he achieved a great success. History will connect the name of "Edward the Peacemaker" to that of "Albert the Good" and "Queen Victoria the Great" in other ways than that suggested by sonship and parenthood. The Bishop of London says of him: "A great king he must have been to have acquired the place he did in the councils of the civilized world, and in the respect of the nations." Many illustrations might be given as to what he has done. When he came to the throne, an Englishman was a hiss and a by-word in France. By a single visit he completely turned the tide of public opinion and inaugurated the entente cordiale which has grown with the advancing years, being helped at every opportunity in the most graceful and diplomatic manner possible. Among all the crowned heads of Europe there is not one that wields one-half the influence of that of the late king.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie was interviewed a few days after the death of the king and gave expression to sentiments of special interest to his countrymen and mine. He said: "Strange anomaly, this British constitution of yours. Your monarch in losing power to do anything, won the power to influence everything. Not the Lord's anointed, but in a very wonderful way the chosen of the people. Why man, he'd have got more votes in England than Roosevelt in the States!"

These words are specially significant, coming as they do from a man who some years ago returned to his native land after becoming enamored of Republican ideas in the land of his adoption and his successes, and bought up a number of daily papers in London and throughout the country, with the avowed purpose of disseminating Republican ideas. Perhaps the failure of the attempt had something to do with this changed attitude, but doubtless the results of the last two reigns have had something to do with it as well.

The King's Ambitions.

The late king had two ambitions, both of of them worthy ones, viz., the world's peace, and the amelioration of social conditions. True, he was anxious to win the Derby too as many times as possible, but there is no question about his sincerity in the other matters. Long strides were taken in the former during his reign and he showed the utmost sympathy with the efforts to better the conditions of the poor, especially in the matter of housing. There has been a political upheaval during his short reign, and although he was without doubt conservative in his sympathies he has with wonderful skill retained the loyalty of all classes. All classes have been deeply touched at his sudden death and messages of sympathy with the queen mother, as she is now to be called, have come from very diverse sources. On the Sunday following the king's death the Salvation Army sent a band to play in the quadrangle of Buckingham Palace, and by special request sang "Nearer My God to Thee" and "Abide With Me." A telegram was sent by "769 homeless men" in the Medland Hall Free Night Shelter, saying, "Even the humblest of our late kings subjects feel they have lost a friend." General Botha referred in his message to the gracious manner in which he and his fellow generals were received by the late king "when our hearts were still bleeding at the loss of our independence." In her message to the nation the queen mother expresses her thanks for "sympathy from all classes" and adds, "Give me a thought in your prayers" and "I confide my dear son to your care."

The New King.

King George V. is not now looked upon to be as strong a man as his father, but doubtless he will prove himself efficient in time. He is said to be of a retiring disposition and to hate pomp and ceremony. It has always been said that he regretted his elder brother's death, the Duke of Clarence, not simply from the sorrow naturally felt for the loss of a brother, but because of his shrinking from the responsibilities of the crown. It is said that he has two hobbies, stamp collecting and his children, and that

The Essential Significance of Graded Lessons

RULING PRINCIPLE

The new education puts the pupil at the center and requires the instruction to be adapted to his needs. The history of education shows that the pupil for a very long while was denied this central position. The question of interest belonged to the instructor, not to the instructed. But modern education entirely reverses this. The nature of the pupil, and the consequent needs of the pupil, receive first consideration. Modern psychology, particularly the study of the child-mind, has shifted the educational center from subjects to persons.

BEGINNERS

The series begins where the child's conscious thought always begins, with the parental idea, and presents God to the child-mind as the heavenly Father, and leads it to the conception of this divine fatherhood through the simple and familiar relations of the child to its earthly parents. The very reading of the topics which are the subjects of the lessons in the course for Beginners is like sweet and simple music, and to any heart capable of appreciating the simplicities of truth it will indicate how natural and simple religion is as belonging to the very nature of the soul, entering into its most germinal development and working itself out in all the processes of growth.

PRIMARY

In the Primary grade the same simple but great themes touched upon in the Beginners course are continued, but just sufficiently developed to correspond to the growing capabilities of the child's mind, including, but not going beyond the widening circle of the child's extending associations and experiences. Nothing is forced in upon the child that is unchildlike in character; truths which the child can comprehend and that have natural place in his life are presented and repeated with that reiteration which the child's mind requires, while the teacher is content to wait for the germination and silent growth of the simplest seeds of truth in the child's heart.

JUNIOR

In the Junior lessons the pulse of life begins to throb more strongly. The great subjects of religious thought begin to enter; the simple introduction to the great story of history begins; the wonderful stories of the Bible begin to exercise their fascination; duties growing out of natural relationships are recognized; the choice of good and evil, and the fateful results of such choices, are made to be seen and felt; and the thought of God's providence over individual life is given manifold illustration in the biblical stories. In the fourth year of the series a more careful study of the briefer of the four Gospels is entered upon, followed by a study of the most striking incidents described in the book of Acts, and closing with stories from that larger book of Acts, the lives of later Christian missionaries.

INTERMEDIATE

Here we find ourselves where adolescent life begins, when the child ceases and the man begins; when the stirrings of those ambitions which are to issue in great deeds begin to manifest themselves; when the sympathies and affections become more intense; when the great choices and decisions are made; when the heroic spirit becomes dominant and when ideals are set up; when the great temptations open their deadly assaults; when the reason begins to exercise itself: a period of strife, and tumult, and strain, of high resolving, of deadly peril, of glorious victory. To this fateful period our new series of lessons comes with definite and intelligent understanding. Christ forever knocks at the door of life in every stage, but more distinctly and strongly does he knock at the door of the heart of youth at this period than at any other time.

SENIOR

This is the period for constructive study. It is the altruistic period of life and its spirit is optimistic. The individual begins to define his relations to others and the duties growing out of those relations. The sense of obligation and responsibility grows, purpose becomes more definite and the formulation of a life program is undertaken. Consequently the steady aim of the study and instruction in this period is to help the pupil to find his place and work in the world.

NEW CONCEPTION

The new movement is the outgrowth of the larger conception of religious education. According to this new conception the factors entering into the process are much more varied than was formerly supposed. All truth belongs to religious education, from whatever source it may be derived. Moreover, the aim of all genuine education is the production of sound character, and all instruction must be directed to this purpose. Consequently into these new courses is to be introduced the study of great characters other than those included in the Scriptures. And the moral heroes of every generation will be summoned to illustrate and impress the great elements of noble character.

THE BIBLE

The Bible is used as the most valuable material in moral and religious instruction; and it is used with discrimination, with a clear understanding that we must select from it in the progressive education of the child such material as answers to the needs of the child at the various stages of his growth. The Bible is a great storehouse of spiritual food, but in its stores is food for the little child and the strong man. Henceforth we are to give to the child only that which belongs to the child and to the man only what belongs to the man.

he neither races nor gambles; that he is one of the best shots in Europe and that he is fond of the field. From my observation of him at a public meeting a few years ago, when I sat at close range to him for several hours, I would take him to be of a modest disposition, and mild in manner, not physically very strong nor specially keen in his intellectual qualities. He will have excellent support in Queen Mary who is every inch a woman and shows it in her bearing, in the rearing of her children and in her work in behalf of charity.

Gains for American Missions

During the first three weeks in May, the gain in church offerings and annuities is $2,185.02. One hundred and twenty churches have increased their gifts and 152 have made an offering this year which failed to do so last year. Offerings have been received from but few of our larger churches.

This first year of our second century gives promise of being the greatest year in our history. Let us rally to the cause of winning America for Christ by sending increased offerings from our churches thus enabling the home board to do more and better work for Jesus in our homeland.

Send all offerings to the News from the Niagara Frontier

The Christian Ministers' Club of the Niagara Frontier will have its annual picnic along with the families of the members at Erie Park, Canada, June 6. The day will be devoted to athletics and gastronomics.

Dr. Arthur Holmes and P. C. Macfarlane will be the principal speakers at a "Niagara Frontier Brotherhood Banquet" to be held at the Central Y. M. C. A., Buffalo, June 2.

E. F. Randall has concluded his pastorate with the First Church, Tonawanda, N. Y. His work has been of the highest order. The congregation asked him to reconsider his resignation and invited him to continue.

Milton B. Madden, the energetic, bigheatred and most effective "living link" of the Payne Ave. congregation, North Tonawanda, will visit the congregation the last of May. He will be accompanied by two of his boys, and they will have this heavy schedule on the Frontier: May 29, Bible school and morning worship, Payne Ave.; evening worship, and May 30, Niagara Falls; May 31, Forest Ave., Buffalo; June 1, Jefferson St., Buffalo; June 2, reception, Payne Ave.; June 3, Kensington Church, Buffalo; June 4 and June 5, Bible school and morning worship, Payne Ave.; evening worship, Richmond Ave., Buffalo.

V. W. Blair, Payne Ave. Church, North Tonawanda, will deliver the afternoon address at the Western New York District C W. B. M. convention at Williamsville, June 11, and also an address on "Christian Endeavor's Part in the Missionary Movement," at the Annual Niagara County Christian Endeavor Convention, Niagara Falls, May 27. On June 3, he will speak on "Music and Worship" at the Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, when the choir and officers of that congregation will entertain the Payne Ave. choir.

Mr. S. B. Lindsay, an elder of the Payne Ave. congregation, occupied the pulpit of the First Church, Tonawanda, both morning and evening, May 22.

There is such a happy fellowship enjoyed by the First Baptist Church and the Payne Ave. Church of Christ, North Tonawanda, N. Y., that each pastor will preach for both congregations during the vacation of the absent minister in July and August. These congregations had union evangelistic services last winter and have had occasional union meetings since.

Farewell to Pastoral Leaders

Mr. and Mrs. F. L. Bowen have been the leaders of the Jackson Ave. Church for the past thirteen years, but duty calls them back to the mission field. The feeling of the church at their departure was most beautifully expressed in the decorations at the reception given them the last week of their ministry, which closed May 1. The church was decorated in palms, white flowers and bleeding hearts—the palms for their future pathway, the white for the purity of life ever taught by them, and the bleeding hearts as an emblem of the feelings of the people. A fitting program was rendered, the last number before the serving of refreshments being, "A Token of Love," which proved to be a large heart-shaped receptacle containing ten $20 gold pieces, a gold medal for Mr. Bowen, on which was engraved a picture of the church, and a gold watch for Mr. Bowen. About one thousand people were present during the evening to assure them of their love and wish them success in their future work of city evangelization. The souvenirs of the evening were a fine photograph of Mr. and Mrs. Bowen.

Rev. and Mrs. F. L. Bowen.

News from the Foreign Society

Nicholas County, Kentucky, is assured of the living link rank by raising $600 for the work at Batang, border of Tibet, under the direction of J. C. Ogden. It will be remembered that Brother Ogden went out from that county. G. M. Brooks, a live "layman," led in this campaign.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first twenty-four days of May amounted to $23,102, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $7,880.

President A. McLean made an address at the World's Sunday School Convention at Washington, D. C., on "Missions in the Sunday School."

All the signs point to an exceptionally large Children's Day offering. It is hoped that every school will be in line with creditable gifts.

Dr. W. E. Macklin of China will attend the Toronto Convention.

Lloyd H. Miller of the Broad St. Sunday School, Akron, Ohio, feels sure that that school will reach the living link rank on Children's Day.

The Sunday school at Hopkinsville, Ky., has already observed Children's Day and has reached $450 in their offering and possibly more. Next!

Children's Day offerings should be sent to F. M. Rains, secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio. Please be careful to give the local name of the Sunday school when different from the postoffice. Also please state whether the offering is from the church as a church or from the Sunday school.

The mission at Matanzas, Cuba, is jubilant. Work on the new buildings begun. Getting ready for Children's Day. One man baptized. The church at Freeman St., Norfolk, Va., J. T. T. Hundley, minister, supports Melvin Menges, missionary, at this station.

Secretary Stephen J. Corey will speak at the Toronto convention and also at the Ohio convention.

The church at Frankfort, Ky., sends us $600 from the church as a church as usual. This congregation supports Dr. W. E. Macklin, Nankin, China.

The Foreign Society sold no less than 7,000 missionary books during the past year. This is a good record.

B. T. Wharton, pastor of the Marshall, Mo., church, says: "We expect the Marshall church to become a living link Children's Day. We collect our entire foreign missionary offering on that date, and I think most of it is now ready. Expect the biggest Children's Day we have ever had."

A thousand missionaries on the foreign field, two million dollars a year for foreign missions, and at least twenty-five million heathen people evangelized b your workers in this generation. This is the new watchword adopted by the delegates of our brotherhood at the National Missionary Congress at Chicago. This bold, worthy appeal ought to deeply stir the loyalty of our people to world conquest. The goal is entirely possible of attainment, and the Disciples of Christ should be satisfied with no less an aim.

Glorious news from the Congo mission. Thirty-six baptized at Bolenge, April 6; twenty-three baptized at Bolenge, October 3; thirty-six baptized at Bonyeka, November 21; sixty will be baptized at Bonyeka soon; ten were baptized at Lotumbi, January 3. The Christmas offering of the church at Bolenge was 11,629.

Disciples' Congress Plans

The committee appointed by the Congress of the Disciples of Christ to confer with a like committee from the Congress of the Baptists, has submitted the resolutions concerning the union of the Baptists and Disciples' Congress which was adopted at Bloomington, Ind., and the Baptists' reply accepting the conditions of union as proposed by the Disciples with the exception of having a tri-annual union congress instead of a bi-annual.

At the time that our committee conferred with the Baptist committee this spring, the Baptists had already formed their program for their congress to be held this fall at Augusta, Ga., and therefore it seemed inadvisable to hold a union congress with the Baptists this year. Consequently the Disciples will hold their congress in March or April of 1911.

At the congress this spring in Bloomington, the following officers were elected: President, C. H. Winders; secretary-treasurer, Joseph C. Todd; first vice president, R. H.

Crossfield; second vice president, E. E. Faris; third vice president, B. A. Abbott.

The officers constitute the executive and program committee and would be glad to receive through the secretary, investigations from churches desirous of entertaining the congress in 1911, and also would be glad to receive any suggestions concerning the policy and program of the Congress for next year. So far as the committee has been able to confer with the other officers, they have expressed a desire to make our next Congress thoroughly representative of the brotherhood as a whole.

JOSEPH C. TODD,
Secretary-Treasurer.

Bloomington, Ind.

H. O. Breeden at Fayetteville, Ark.

H. O. Breeden and W. F. Lintt began a nineteen-day meeting with the First Church, Fayetteville, Ark., the first Sunday in April. Throughout the meeting the attendance was the largest in the history of the church. Of this meeting, Pastor W. S. Lockhart writes:

"Dr. Breeden is an untiring worker. Nearly every day he spent the afternoon calling with me. He knows how to approach men and rarely makes a mistake in his estimate of people. Many men that 'never go to a revival meeting' were regular in their attendance. The usual comment was, 'He is not like an evangelist; there is no sensation about him.'

"All were greatly impressed with his reading of the Scriptures, reading as he does from memory. For the first time in my life I saw a great audience listening attentively to the reading of the Word. It had a good effect. He handles the great truths of Christianity in an easy and convincing way. His presence before an audience is helpful. At times he is truly eloquent, again he delights with some well chosen lines of poetry, at another time he thrills his auditors with an apt illustration from history, art, or his own varied experience. His presence among our business men called out such remarks as, 'I like that man because he is a real man as well as a great preacher.'

"I have waited three weeks to write these lines, so as to observe the after effects of the meeting. We have a balance in our treasury, we have not had to 'get over the meeting,' the converts (all mature people) are in the Sunday school, Aid, C. W. B. M., Brotherhood, C. E., and are present at the church services, all contributing their time, energy and money to the success of the work.

"We had a much larger ingathering than we anticipated—sixty-one, with forty-four confessions. In taking the census of our city we found only 100 that seemed to us available. You may readily see that the number reached was large considering the amount of available material. Our whole city and university life was made better, our business men were so well pleased that they have frequently expressed themselves as never again wanting any other type of an evangelist.

"Professor Lintt added much to the success of the meeting. He is the finest chorus director I have used. He is much beloved by his chorus. He is a princely man, thoroughly in earnest in his work."

New York City Mission Notes

The tri-annual convention of the C. W. B. M. of the New York City district was held at the 169th Street Church, Tuesday, May 19. A splendid program was given and a delightful social hour was spent with an excellent dinner, furnished by the ladies of the church. The evening was given to the Disciples' Missionary Union. A report of the city mission work was given by the superintendent of city missions. M. M. Amunson, pastor of the Sterling Place Church, delivered a thoughtful address on "The Woe of the City." The meeting was well attended by representatives from the churches.

The mission churches report progress during the past month.

The work among the Russians is doing splendidly. Four nights each week they meet in classes to study English. Sunday, Wednesday and Saturday they meet for their religious services. The following facts given by the Federation of Churches will help us to appreciate the task of evangelizing this people. In the Borough of Manhattan below Fourteenth street, we have 155,823 of Russian birth, or take the section on the east side of Bowery and south of Fourteenth street, we have 153,746 Russians. These facts should challenge our faith. It is a call to service. Truly, our answer cannot be the present effort we are putting forth. We need a well equipped Russian missionary devoting his whole time to this work.

A special meeting is being held at the Humboldt Street Church by Evangelists H. F. Lutz and William Leigh. The meeting has increased in interest from the start. Thirty have thus far responded to the call of Christ. A splendid work has been done to strengthen and build up the church.

JOSEPH KEEVIL,
Supt. of City Missions.

New Headquarters for Religious Education Association

The exhibit and the office work of the Religious Education Association have grown so rapidly that larger quarters have been made necessary. The association moves to the new McCormick building, Michigan Ave. and Van Buren St., Chicago, on May 1, where with fully twice the space and with splendid light and facilities for the library, exhibit and offices, all those who desire to consult the special collections of the association will be welcome and will find ample accommodations. The special library of the association now numbers two thousand books on moral and religious training, including a fine collection of modern text material, a large number of pamphlets and other documents and many photographs and displays illustrating methods of work in Sunday-schools, colleges, homes, etc. The exhibit is maintained for the free use of all persons, for teachers who would select texts, for parents, pastors and others working at the problems, or desiring to read the latest literature on the subject of religious education.

Missouri State Convention

The Jefferson City Church sends a hearty invitation to all the brethren and sisters in the state to come and visit them June 17-22. If you will send your name to J. L. Thompson he will take special delight in seeing that you are cared for in the best possible way at the very smallest expense.

Remember that the convention voted last year to hold this convention on the plan of the General Convention, that is that the attendants pay their own way. Bro. Thompson has secured a number of homes and rooms at boarding houses and hotels. He will do his best for you if you will but write him in time. Don't wait until the last day and then expect the very best accomodations.

This leads us to say that this makes it more necessary that the churches pay the expense of their delegates and ministers. It is altogether too much to ask that these shall give their time and pay their way, too, especially when you remember that they are engaged in your service.

Send your minister. Pay his way and demand that he go. He will appreciate it, he will be the better minister for it and the church will be blessed thereby. The churches of Missouri cannot afford to neglect the state convention, too many and too large things are at stake.

Remember that it is not "their convention," but "our convention." This is the people's gathering. They can make it what they will. It is the one time in the whole year when the people from all parts of the state come together to consider the great interests of the church. This is the people's one great opportunity and they ought to prize it above riches.

Finally let us get ready so that there may be nothing that shall bring a tinge of regret. We must not come reporting any deficit. We are hearing from some of the brethren about it, but it will take the last minister, the last church and the last dollar we can reach in order to come "all up in the clear."

Cor. Sec'y.

THE BETHANY GRADED SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

INTERNATIONAL COURSE

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR

Purpose—The purpose of the Graded Lessons is: To meet the spiritual needs of the pupil in each stage of his development. The spiritual needs broadly stated are these:

1. To know God as he has revealed himself to us in nature, in the heart of man, and in Christ..... 2. To exercise toward God, the Father, and his Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, trust, obedience, and worship..... 3. To know and to do our duty to others..... 4. To know and do our duty to ourselves.

PRIMARY		To lead the child to know the heavenly Father, and to inspire within him a desire to live as God's child: 1. To show forth God's power, love, and care, and to awaken within the child responsive love, trust, and obedience. 2. To build upon the teachings of the first year (1) by showing ways in which children may express their love, trust, and obedience; (2) by showing Jesus the Saviour, in his love and work for men; and (3) by showing how helpers of Jesus and others learn to do God's will. 3. To build upon the work of the first and second year by telling (1) about the people who chose to do God's will; (2) how Jesus, by his life and words, death and resurrection, revealed the Father's love and will for us; (3 such stories as will make a strong appeal to the child and arouse within him a desire to choose and to do that which God requires of him. The Curriculum Outlined Above Furnishes a Comprehensive Course of Religious Instruction

Comprising as it does not only the biographies, history, literature, and teachings of the Bible, but also lessons on the history and heroes of the Christian Church, of missionary enterprises, philanthropic movements, and moral reforms.

In order that the truths taught may be assimilated and the spirit and qualities of Christian character developed, various forms of self-expression are suggested, beginning with simple hand-work done by the little child, and culminating in important lines of Christian service possible to young men and women.

The series of lessons for each year begins in October, and the work that is essential to the completion of the aim and the integrity of the course as a whole, is found in the nine months corresponding to the public school year—October to June. The lessons for the remaining three months of each year are valuable in themselves, and either supplement the work of the preceding months, or prepare for that of the following year.

The courses for each grade or year are permanent and will be available for use in the same grade with successive classes each year.

The Lessons for the Summer Quarter beginning July 3, will prepare the school for the greatly enriched course beginning October 1. Send today for order blanks and samples.

FOR THE SUMMER QUARTER

Now is the time to send your order for the Bethany Graded Sunday School Lessons for the Summer Quarter, beginning July 1.

Many schools will install the Graded Lessons in the Summer so as to "get used" to them by the opening of the new season in October.

In October there will be four new courses added to the three that have been running the past year.

Next year will be a rich year for the Graded Schools. Get ready for it by introducing the Bethany Lessons July 1.

Samples Sent Free to Ministers, Superintendents or Teachers, upon application. Send today for our convenient order blank.

The New Education and Care of the Body

Is not Physical Well-being too Much Neglected?

This is the season of Commencement exercises. All the country is interested in the emergence from the school room of a host of children and young people, who for several weeks to come will betake themselves to nature, recreation and rest, in such degree as their circumstances shall permit. But particularly is the community interested in the gatherings that mark the graduation of boys and girls from the High Schools of numberless cities and towns throughout the land.

It is natural that an interest so wide-spread as that of education should engage for a little time at least, each year, the serious regard of all citizens as to the character of the instruction that is given in these institutions of public training. No generation has been more definitely engaged in the revisal of its standards of instruction than our own. The system of education that prevailed a half century ago is seen to be utterly inadequate. It was limited in its scope,pedantic in its method, and lacking in social interest in its content. Today education is particularly marked by emphasis on the elements of human interest and welfare to which attention has been drawn.

This shows itself in the larger place given to history and the social and economic sciences. The older disciplines of logic, the classics, and mathematics have either yielded to or have made room for the study of present conditions, the world in which we live as revealed by scientific observation, the character of the plant and animal environment in which man has his place, the nature of the social organism of which he is a part, and the structure and activities of his own mental life.

But further than this the desire for practical education has carried us. In most well-equipped High Schools considerable attention is being given to such practice studies as have a bearing on the daily work of men and women in domestic and industrial life. The girls are being trained in domestic science, and the boys in manual training to a degree that would have been undreamed of a generation ago.

This is not purely a utilitarian program. To be sure there are those in the community who believe that education should be limited to the disciplines which bear directly upon the bread-and-butter equipment of the individual. There are parents so misguided as to believe that the schools are only useful as they provide ability in money-making. This sordid and unsocial view needs rebuke and correction. There is no heresy more deadly and debasing than that which tends to commercialize the wholesome and inspiring work of education.

But one of the most interesting developments of public instruction in our generation is the attention given to the physical welfare of the pupils in the schools. This is a return to the classic past. The Greeks were perhaps the keenest lovers of mental skill, and in their day intellectual dexterity reached its highest point. But they gave constant and enthusiastic attention to the care and training of the body. Plato is said to have derived his popular name from the breadth of his chest. Socrates boxed daily in the gymnasium, Phidias and Aristophanes were both famed as wrestlers and hurlers of the discus. The symmetry and soundness of the body were considered as important as the training of the mind.

The mediæval ages changed all this under the spell of monasticism. The body was believed to be unworthy of any bestowment save that of the most necessary food and clothing. The saint and the scholar most esteemed in those ages were the men who mortified the flesh to the limit of austerity, and rigorously repressed the natural vigor of physical life under the impression that it was inconsistent with piety or learning.

We are returning happily to the earlier and better ideal. Physical exercise is now regarded as one of the essentials of a sound education. Athletics, restrained and supervised, are replacing the old barbarisms so often practiced by student groups as apparently the only method of relaxation from the duties of the class room. The healthy animal spirits which once found vent in the mutilation of school property and the playing of grotesque pranks upon inoffensive citizens, now finds expression in the skill of the ball field or the endurance of the race.

Nor must it be forgotten that even where these athletic exercises are limited, so far as their public interest is concerned, to students specially trained as members of the athletic teams, the influence of the system is widespread and wholesome throughout the student body. The self-denial, abstemiousness, regular hours, obedience, and clean living which are necessitated by any competent athletic program cannot fail to have a wholesome moral influence upon the entire group concerned in the results achieved, and in most institutions a fair amount of physical work is demanded of all the students.

But the public school is going much further than this in its insistence on a sound body as the right of every child. The home conditions in which many children live are unsanitary and unwholesome. Many families, particularly among the recently arrived foreign groups in our cities, seem entirely unaware of the values of various food products or of any competent methods of cooking and preparation. We have often commented upon the tendency to intemperance among men whose wives are ignorant of these essentials of household work, and whose marketing is as injudicious and wasteful as the cooking is inadequate. But we have not given sufficient attention to the effect of such household economics upon the physical life of the children.

Many of these are ill-nourished, not so much because of a lack in quantity as of improper qualities in the food. To this must be added those scarcely conceivable delinquincies of personal cleanliness which prevail in too many families whose children are attendant upon the public school. Few children take naturally to the bath without strong parental urging. And where this latter is lacking, the condition of the bodies of such children as make up no inconsiderable proportion of the school life in some sections of our cities, must be left to the imagination.

There is the still more crying evil of neglect regarding the physical infirmities of young children. Many of them are mouth-breathers, because of the obstruction of adenoids or other growths in the nasal passages. Such children can of course never be healthy, because they are constantly breathing through the unprotected passages of the mouth and throat the germs which produce numberless evils. Neglected teeth are another prolific cause of impaired vitality. The decaying process works ravages in the health of the child who constantly inhales impure air. Teachers and parents may well be aroused to the dangers which childhood encounters from the neglect of these elementary laws of life.

But what most seriously disturbs those who know the facts is the intimate relation between physical health and morals in the life of children. How much of the stupidity, nervousness, irritability, worry, impertinence, pugnacity, and incorrigibility of certain children who are the problems of the home and the school is really due to neglected physical conditions? Not infrequently the dullness or nervousness of children is the direct result of imperfect sight or hearing, or of some other easily remedied defect.

Our Christian civilization will never reach its best estate until we are as truly concerned for the physical welfare of all the children who are in any sense related to our communities as we are for their intellectual and moral improvement.

Winning Power Through Faith

"We have but Faith: we cannot know;
For knowledge is of things we see."

The spirit that denies gathers no strength. What is often called denial, however, may be a deeper affirmation. The first Christians in Rome were called atheists because they rejected the popular religion. Martin Luther had greater faith than his opponents, who thought he was casting aside the fundamental truths of Christianity. Abraham Lincoln was a truer believer than the preachers of his day, who thought slavery was a divine institution, and that he was disregarding the plain teachings of the Bible when he taught that the black man had a right to the fruits of his own toil. Jeremiah, whom ignorance has named the weeping prophet, had a faith that outweighed that of all his enemies. He knew that the religious and social order of Judah was breaking up and he believed that a new order would arise in which the superstitions of the old would be discarded. His enemies had no place for God outside their little system.

The growing man believes in himself. He is not conceited. He does not think that wisdom was born with him or that it will die with him. He is reverent and courteous. But he believes too much in himself to turn over his thinking to other men. What he does has the approval of his own judgment. He accepts the responsibility for his mistakes. The bad habit that tries to hold him in subjection meets the bold defiance of a man who asserts his right to be free. Men without faith weakly submit to the domination of bad habits. They do not believe they were made for any high destiny. The man of faith confesses his sin. He feels that he was not true to himself when he yielded to himself when he yielded to appetite or allowed the pressure of common opinion to influence his conduct contrary to his better judgment. His confession of sin is an announcement of his determination to live a strong, unselfish life. It is an indication of strength.

The strong man believes in other men. The child grows in strength of character when it believes in its good mother. The young man believes in other young men and in young women. If he does not, his usefulness ends before it begins. The cynical young woman probably thinks she is a superior being; in reality she counts for nothing. She may be able to cool the ardor of some who are trying to do honest work and she can cause distress to her acquaintances; in other directions she has no power. By the time a man reaches middle life his faith in men has been severely tested. If he has tried to be honest and fair in his dealings, he has found that others take advantage of his confidence in them to get possession of what they are not entitled to have. Men to whom he has spoken what none but friends should hear have given his secrets to the world. There comes to him the temptation to pronounce all men liars and thieves. But if he does lose faith in men, he becomes weak and contemptible. He will still believe that men prove truth and righteousness if he has insight. The faith that has been tested makes him a man of might.

The deepest faith is that which has God for its object. We cannot separate faith in ourselves and in other men from faith in God. What we are is fixed by the source from which we came. What is the source? Is it evil? Is it benevolent? Has the universe as a whole any meaning? Or have things tumbled together by chance? Is goodness an illusion or is it the supreme reality? Men cannot grow strong unless they feel that they are fighting for something that is real. They are willing to endure physical pain and mental anguish if thereby something of permanent value is gained. But they do not like the idea of suffering in a world that will at last mock their passion for truth and goodness. Abraham believed God, and he became the founder of a great race. The prophets believed in God, and they gave the world a conscience. Paul believed in God, and he laid the foundations of a universal church. Our barbarian ancestors were civilized by men of faith who went to them with the gospel of Christ. The political life of America needs men of faith in God, who will drive out of office and into the penitentiary bribe-givers and bribe-takers. The church needs men of faith. Its achievements are limited because its members do not believe. They have not the strength to force the truth upon the heart and conscience of the world. This strength comes from faith, and in turn increases faith.

Midweek Service, June 8.

The Disciples of Christ, in their efforts to answer as fully as possible the needs of the communities in which they are located, are wisely undertaking the erection and equipment of hospitals, asylums and orphan homes wherever they are able to accomplish this good plan. In Kansas City, for example, an effort is well under way to erect a hospital under the auspices of the Christian Church. This will help more than any other feature in our church life to interpret the spirit and ideals of our Brotherhood to a community keenly sensitive to social betterment. In Chicago the Disciples have never undertaken any work so ambitious as this. Their numbers are comparatively small and their wealth correspondingly limited. It has frequently been suggested that as the Baptists are planning to erect a new hospital, the Disciples might well join with them in a work which is the common task of our faith. Nothing would tend to unite these, or any other Christian bodies more rapidly or securely than such co-operation in such a common and needed enterprise. The Baptists are in great need of a new building to replace the old hospital which has become undesirable in these days of developing surgery and precise sanitary regulations. Why should not the Disciples assist in the building of the hospital, which is as much their own need as that of the Baptists, and which neither body can as competently provide as the two united?

The Church Extension Fund has enjoyed an unusually prosperous year. During May and June annuities have been received including $10,000 from a friend in the East, $1,300 from a friend in Florida, and $200 from a sister in Illinois. 279 gifts have now been made to the Board on the annuity plan, and the annuity fund now amounts to $279,316. Great numbers of churches have been built by the Disciples during the past year, and appeals have come to the Board at an average rate of 23 a month. The receipts are $59,000 for the first eight months. Especially interesting has been the gain of three new name loan funds. The first was given by the president of the Board, Fletcher Cowherd of Kansas City, in memory of his brother, Walter Cowherd; the second by R. A. Long in memory of his mother, Margaret A. Long, and the third by M. H. Shelton. These three funds of $5,000 each, make a total of 31 name funds devoted to the work of church extension. Such gifts are an incentive to greater liberality and more ambitious enterprises among our churches, and they are notable proof of the broadening influence of church extension as a business-like and successful missionary work.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Clayton Morrison sailed on the Dominion Steamer for England on Saturday last. They will be gone until about the middle of August, attending the World's Missionary Congress in Edinburgh, and the conference on Christian Union to be held in London under the auspices of the Disciples a little later, and visiting various parts of Great Britain and the continent. Mr. Morrison will send regular letters dealing with the important events which have taken him abroad. Our readers will watch for his messages with the keenest interest, for they have learned to regard him as one of our most incisive and inspiring writers. The weeks of journey abroad, in spite of the labors attendant upon them, will be in a measure a rest from the arduous and exacting duties required of him as editor of the Christian Century during the past year. The Century family will wish him and Mrs. Morrison a pleasant journey and a safe return.

The convocation exercises at the University of Chicago are made notable this year by the laying of the corner stone of the William Rainey Harper Memorial Library, which is to be the most commanding feature of the University Quadrangles. In connection with this gathering a memorial tablet to Alice Freeman Palmer will be unveiled at the Tower Building. Dr. F. W. Gunsaulus will deliver the Convocation address on Tuesday, June 14.

We have received from President E. V. Zollars of Oklahoma Christian University, the preliminary announcement of an educational congress of the Disciples to be called some time during the coming summer to discuss matters pertaining to our educational work. Such themes as ministerial supply, the securing of larger patronage for our schools, the matter of endowment, and other topics of interest will be discussed. It is thought that the gathering may be held in August. Such a meeting would be of value if a suitable attendance can be secured.

Social Survey

By Alva W. Taylor

The Sunday-School and Citizenship

The end of education has been asserted to be the development of an individual. But the development of an individual is mightily concerned with the development of a society. Religious education is especially concerned with the development of that society which Jesus termed the Kingdom of God.

Whatever religion may be subjectively, objectively it is a matter of relationship. Christianity is social, and the training for the christian life must be a social training or the life that is named christian may be a mockery of the true religion. The task is, therefore, to teach and train in relationship. The pupil grows up as one of many and his education is the growing of a citizen, not the mere preparation for citizenship. It is a growing of a citizen in the neighborhood, the nation, and in the Kingdom of God. Individual development without paramount social consideration breeds a selfishness that is social anarchy.

Socialization.

The process is social. It is the adaptation of one to the demands of his kind. It is to make individuals socially assimilable. The first step in morals is taken when the individual, with all his clamoring sense of self, gets a sense of his proportion in society. The main problems of our lives are social problems. They have to do with others, and are concrete realities. It will matter little about our theologies and philosophies if we do not get the sense of contact through them and find a better manner for adjusting ourselves to the whole of that society that is around us.

Education is a part of experience, not a mere fitting for experience. The child is not an abridged edition of the man, but the man in embryo. He is of smaller caliber, but is the same being. His religious education should begin with his problems as a social being, and form his motives and principles concretely. It should begin with his social contacts, fit him into his social environment, solve his immediate social problem and prepare him to meet the next thing that arises. Acquiring information is for the purpose of getting materials and direction for action. Character is the real end of acquirement, and his information should be usable information, or he learns to play fast and loose with facts and ideals that are not made real to him by actual use. True discipline does more than mold ideas—it gives direction to motives and fixes certain moral and mental habits as fundamental, and leaves the soul to work out its own salvation. The ethics of the social life have embryonic existence in the primary grades. The kindergarten is a socializing institution. The child's play interests are social, and give the line of least resistance for the development of the educational process. If we make his daily personal interests the touchstone for instruction, and he grows up as a member of society, he will be less liable to use his powers to prey upon society.

Jesus' Method.

Jesus used what has been termed the "case method" to impart religious and moral instruction, and it is the best pedagogy ever discovered for such purposes. He took the concrete problem as it arose, and solving it, fixed eternal principles, not as abstract theories or as ideals merely, but as matters of practice then and there. Nothing was out of relation to men and daily living with him. Even his exposition of kinship between himself and the Father was applied to his relation to men, and theirs to one another. There were no superimposed abstractions, but in all he taught there was concrete and correlated reality.

Great as is the need in the Sunday-school of teachers better informed in the Bible and the usual pedagogical methods, greater even is the need of teachers with a grasp of this simple, fundamental method of solving the problems of the child as they arise in the course of his development, and treating him as a growing member of society. First is the instilling of the sense of moral authority—the habit of thinking of things with God in them, the basis for all correct action, and the ultimate sanction of all morality. Then the conception of self as but one of many, and with no way of life but that of a coöperative being.

There is no escaping the utilitarian motive. Human experience demonstrates that it is better to do unto others as you would have them do unto you. Teaching in religion must be rooted in practice and receive the sanction of usability. Then there can be no divorcement of religion and morals in life. A child may be taught all about music until he can recognize all the masters and enjoy the finest compositions, but he never becomes a musician without a practice of music as he learns its theory and use. To become a musician he begins as a player, and his development is not to become a player, but as a player. There is no attainment without expression.

Religion and Life.

Religion is a life, not a straight and narrow way for a life, nor a preparation for a life that is to be. Jesus came to "give life and to give it more abundantly." Restriction is contrary to interest and nature. Applications that are forced, lose their catch and hold qualities. Applications that natural interests seek, grip the soul and give direction to life. Sunday-school sermonizing is generally an imposition upon the child of half-baked ideas, a sort of sacred scolding, and an irritation to the abounding life within. Appeal to the abounding life within and stimulate lagging faculties with something to do and prune abnormal growths. The evil in the child is but misdirected energy, vitality growing all blade and no ear. Help him to begin to work out his salvation. Teach him Christ as one eminently human and humanely sympathetic. Let the idea of his divinity grow up with the growing appreciation of his humanity at work on a superhuman task. Teach the Bible historically, and above all do not instill into his mind the double rule of morals that would permit an Old Testament patriarch to do with God's approval something that would be immoral in our own age. Teach the Bible, but teach it as the means to an end, not as the very end itself. Teach him the moral sequences of all Bibical truth, but make it real by bringing the things taught over into his own problems as a moral factor in the world in which he lives. The hands must give an account of the heart. Work is the golden means of adjustment to the realities of religion. Put the pupil to an enactment of the precept. Clubs for the protection of animal life will teach him the sacredness of life and make him a citizen of peace. A class may become a civic club for hygienic work and be the making of citizens with public spirit. With parental co-operation charity work can be done. Concrete personal, community, and social problems can always be a sort of class laboratory in which to find the resolvents of religious principle. Young people especially, should study the problems of the time in the light of Christ and the prophets. The adult class can be organized about a study of the problems of the day from the Bibical standpoint when nothing else will hold them together. If our children come to youth with a conscious and habitual recognition of the rights of their fellows built up within them, together with the moral supremacy of Christ, there will be little doubt of the issue. Doctrine is a formulation of experience as wrought out. Do not impose a ready-made system of it on the child, but give him a fair chance to formulate his own system, or at least have a choice in regard to those he will adopt. To teach it first is to reverse the logical processes, bias the mind to a conclusion, and set the ways of thinking into grooves. Do the will, that you may know the doctrine.

A Crowned Soul

Any one that sets out in this life for the purpose of being happy will have a pretty tough time of it. There is not enough happiness to go round, and the kind of which there is enough is not worth having. No one can ever be built up into a crowned soul by being favored with happiness. But when you go in for the best things, the fundamental things, and keep on doing so, somehow or other you will be likely to have a good deal of pain which will have something divine in it, and some thing you would not exchange for any so-called happiness under the sun.

We are going to be through with this life before very long. The longest life is short when it is over; any time is short when it is done. The gates of time will swing to behind you before long. They will swing to behind some of us soon, but behind all of us before long. And then the important thing will not be what appointments we had, or what rank in the Conference, or anything of that sort; not what men thought of us, but what He thought of us, and whether we were built into His kingdom. And if, at the end of it all, we emerge from life's work and discipline crowned souls, at home anywhere in God's universe, life will be a success.—The late Borden P. Bowne.

Good Fathers in the Making

Helping Neglected and Dependent Boys to Become Dependable Men

THE SCHOOL AT GLENWOOD. BY V. P. RANDALL.

AMONG the many social problems that confront us, there is none that is more interesting, and certainly none that is of greater importance, than the so-called "boy problem," for if it is true that the boy is father of the man, it is also true that the boy problem is father to many other social questions concerning men.

In order to help any boy, the first thing that we must do is to rightly understand him. We must know why he desires to do certain things before we can aid him to overcome his desires to do them.

A BOSS CARPENTER.

Environment plays a larger part in the development of a boy than anything else, and in many cases as we see and deal with him we realize that he reflects his mental and physical home surroundings. Every influence of his young life helps to shape and mold his character, the few hours spent in school in securing what we commonly call an education being but a detail of that education which he is daily receiving in the larger school of experience.

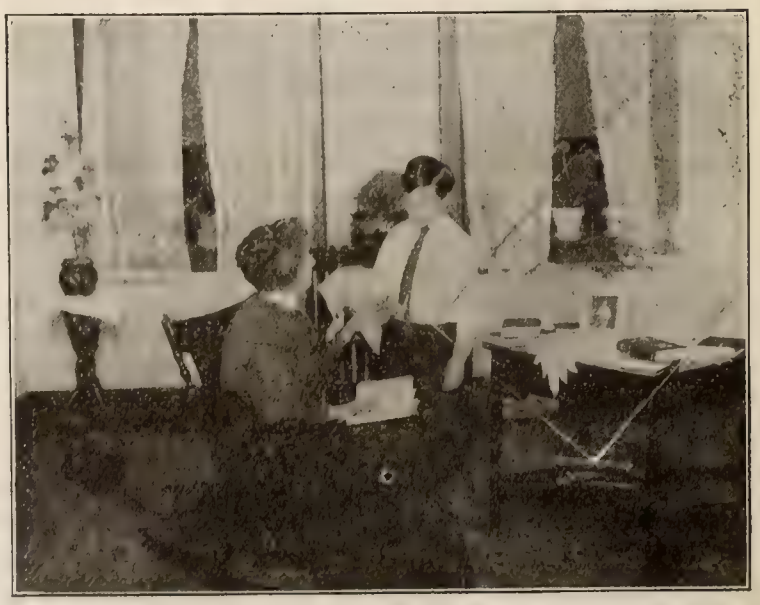
The regulation tenement, with its foul air and overcrowding, its poverty, filth and misery, and its entire lack of any inspiring or uplifting influences, may be looked upon as a class-room where boys are learning certain lessons that mean much to them as individuals and also to society as a whole. Parents often add to the problem, and desertion, divorce, immorality, crime, and especially drunkenness, create abnormal and unwholesome home surroundings, which in turn give the boy a false concept of life, its responsibilities and its vital facts. On the other hand there are those conditions which are caused by accident, sickness and misfortune. Neither parent nor boy is responsible for these, yet they have their effect.

The cheap theaters, with their reproduction of crime, their display of vulgarity and their exciting influence, are always open to the boy, and at a price within his reach, while on the other hand, clean, wholesome recreation and amusement are almost impossible to secure. The cigarette habit, with its vitiating and demoralizing influence, plays a part in destroying young manhood, and later on the saloon, if it has not already blighted the boy's home, reaches out its hand and endeavors to lay hold on him.

The Dependent Boy.

Now, these conditions, along with others equally well known, tend to produce a distinct class of boys known as the dependent, that is, he is dependent upon society for something which he requires in order that he may become the sort of a man our country needs. This is not a difficult thing to supply, either, for in the majority of cases what he most needs is simply to be removed from his unwholesome, unnatural home influences, placed in new surroundings, given a new view of life, and started on the right road. Neglect this boy and in the majority of cases he becomes either the delinquent or the juvenile criminal who horrifies us with his crimes, or else he joins the army of ignorant, unskilled, jobless, helpless, and often vicious men of our cities. Help him until home conditions change, until a foster home is provided for him, or until he becomes independent and able to make his own living or contribute to the support of his family, and society will have a valuable and profitable citizen.

The dependent boy constitutes a distinct phase of the boy problem, and in the Illinois Manual Training School Farm, commonly known as Glenwood, is found an answer that for twenty years has been proving its worth, not by attractive theories, but by positive results, and results are what the world of today demands.



This practical and resultful solution to the problem of the dependent boy is located on a 300-acre farm, twenty-four miles south of Chicago, and about one mile west of the village of Glenwood, from which place the school takes the name by which it is usually known.

Since its foundation, in 1887, Glenwood has trained, educated, encouraged and started toward better things, 6,000 boys, and today there are 350 boys here, this being the normal capacity of the school. Of this number 75 per cent has been committed by the courts of Cook and other counties. The remainder have been placed there by guardians or relatives who are unable properly to care and provide for them at home. None of these boys is delinquent, yet some of them, through their street training, have become what many people who lack patience and understanding call "bad boys," but Glenwood starts out with the assumption that the boy is in reality good, and that any evil which is apparent is but the reflection of unnatural influences which formerly surrounded him.

Where the Glenwood Boys Live.

Acting on this assumption the boy is first given clean, wholesome surroundings. The detached cottage plan is employed, the boys being housed in eleven two-story and basement brick cottages. Every effort is made to have them as homelike as possible, and they are equipped with steam heat, electric lights, hot and cold water and bathrooms. The institutional atmosphere, so common in places of this sort, is lacking. The cottages surrounded by trees, shrubbery, and flowers are not all of one type, but differ in architecture. Many of these are memorial buildings, named after those in whose memory they have been erected. In Glenwood the emphasis is placed, not on the military training, the shops or the school-house, but on the home, and this is always the first consideration.

Each cottage is presided over by a competent matron, or house mother, who is selected because of her especial fitness for the position, and that is more than one can say of many of the boys' own mothers, and a visit to these homes reveals much that is interesting. The individuality of the boy is never at any time lost sight of. Each boy has his own private towel. In the basement are the shoe-boxes, small lockers in which the boys keep shoes, toys, games, and a collection of strange and curious things which every youngster loves to gather. Going into the cottage the boys enter through the basement and stopping at their box, exchange their shoes for house-slippers before going upstairs.

On the first floor is the matron's apartment, the locker room where uniforms for dress parade and "Sunday clothes" are kept, and the large comfortable reading-room with its open fire-place, its shelves filled with library games and good boys' books, and its small tables accommodating from four to six boys each. Copies of good pictures adorn the walls. The dormitories are upstairs, and instead of there being one large room, there are several small ones, each one having in it from five to seven single beds (not cots) with white pillow cases and sheets and a white spread.

THE HUMAN QUESTION MARK—WHAT WILL BECOME OF THE BOYS?

Each cottage has its own flower garden. These help to beautify the grounds, and the boys take a great deal of pride in them. The cottages are not merely houses where a number of boys stay and sleep and read, but they are homes where a family of big and little brothers, with the help and counsel of a good woman, is learning to live clean and wholesome lives, and it is on this foundation that Glenwood builds.

Through religious teaching, instructive lectures, clean entertainments and wholesome recreation the boys are taught to appreciate better things. Although the boys are neither wicked nor bad characters their lack of proper training makes it necessary for many of them to come under some form of discipline which will, without being severe, teach them habits of promptness, obedience, and respect for authority. There is not more than an hour of military drill and "setting up" exercise during the day, but this is enough to accomplish the desired end and also be of great physical benefit.

The members of each cottage constitute a military company, and many a "gang" hero with a spirit of leadership, directed into right channels, here becomes a capable and efficient captain or lieutenant. These cottage companies take a great deal of pride in their drill, and all look forward to June 14, which is anniversary day, when competitive drills are held, the judge being an army officer from Fort Sheridan.

Each boy as he enters Glenwood leaves behind him any unpleasant experiences of the past, and starts life anew with a future before him that is filled with glorious possibilities. A careful record is kept of each boy and he receives monthly credit marks from his matron, teachers, and instructors in cottage behavior, grammar-school work, manual-training work, military drill and general deportment. This makes it possible to watch the boys' progress, detect weak spots, and give to each boy, at least some measure of special help. All boys securing a general average of 85 per cent are placed on the "honor list" and wear a much-coveted "honor badge."

Prevention, Correction and Uplift.

The preventive and corrective methods here employed are different from those most commonly used. In the first place, an effort is made to show the boy that it is easier in the long run to do right than it is to do wrong, and also that it really pays to do right. Punishment consists in loss of privileges. Insolence brings enforced silence. The quarrelsome boy who does not act in a gentlemanly manner in the cottage parlor stands in the hall and cannot play with, or speak to his mates, and the disobedient boy is deprived of his hour in the ball field, or is not allowed to attend entertainments. Corporal punishment is not permitted.

Each boy spends one-half of his school day in the grammar-school, and the other half in manual-training work of some sort, with the exception of a few of the smaller boys who spend the full day in grade work, and a few of the boys who have been graduated from the grammar-school and who spend the entire day in the shops.

In the grammar-school eight grades are taught by competent teachers holding county certificates. The work is especially adapted to the particular needs of the individual boy.

There is no prolonged summer vacation but occasional vacation days are scattered throughout the season, and this, together with the added zest given by regular manual-training work, enables the boy whose schooling has been neglected to make up for lack of early opportunities. Upon graduation from the eighth grade boys are eligible for admission to the Chicago high schools. Under manual-training there are several departments: machine, forge, cabinet and wood-working, printing, shoemaking, laundry, and bakery. Each department is well equipped with the best modern tools and machinery, and here all boys not detailed to the farm spend half of their school time. The instructors are not only skilled mechanics, and capable teachers, but are also men of good moral character.

The work is practical. Under direction of the instructors all repairs in machinery, iron work, carpentry, plumbing, and steam fitting are made by the boys, and so while they are getting an insight into useful trades, they are cutting down the running expenses of the school. All kitchen, dining-room, and cottage work is done by the boys, under direction of the chef, housekeepers and matrons. All laundry work and school printing is done by the boys. Boys are also trained to fill responsible positions by going to Chicago as city office boy, by acting as mail orderly, and performing clerical work.

Of the 300-acre farm, 100 acres are devoted principally to the raising of vegetables for the table and fodder for the horses and cattle. Under the direction of a trained farmer and a gardener, the farm is worked by a number of boys who do their half-day's work here. Many boys who have worked on the farm find good foster homes with farmers or go to agricultural college after leaving here.

In round numbers the annual cost, including salaries, repairs and clothing (exclusive of new buildings), is $70,000, or $200 per year for each one of the 350 boys. (In state and city institutions where boys are cared for, the per capita cost is from $260 to $350 per year.) The sources of income are as follows: Paid by Cook and other counties for boys committed by the courts, $28,000; paid by parents and guardians toward the support of their boys, $10,000; interest and endowments, $6,000; remainder to be raised by subscription, $26,000.

There is an old saying that if you give a dog a bad name he will live up to it. At Glenwood it reads differently "Give a boy a good name and he will live up to it." It sounds theoretical, but it is not, it is practical, and the results secured go to prove it. The aim of Glenwood is to make the dependent boy independent, and it accomplishes this both directly and indirectly in various ways. Some boys are cared for, disciplined and educated, until disturbed home conditions have been readjusted. Good foster homes are provided for some where they remain under the supervision of the school until they are eighteen years of age. Others receive a good grammar-school education and are instructed in some trade until they are old enough and sufficiently skilled to go out for themselves or to return to their families well equipped to help bear the home burden.

For over twenty years boys who would otherwise have grown to manhood poorly equipped, both mentally and physically, to fight life's battles, have been sent out into the world after from one to five years at Glenwood, clean in speech and habits, skilled and capable, possessing a knowledge of the value of right thinking and right living, a respect for law and order, and a determination to fight fair while making the most of every legitimate opportunity. The number thus saved to usefulness, the homes thus held together, and the contribution thus made to American citizenship cannot be expressed in mere figures.

The Freedom of Spiritual Religion

An Illuminating Sermon Preached Before the Northern Baptist Convention in Chicago

BY WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH.

EDITORS' NOTE: There was much of interest to the Disciples of Christ in the recent remarkable convention of Northern Baptists held in Chicago. The complete accomplishment of their plan for unifying their missionary and benevolent societies under the control of a representative convention of the Baptist churches of the North, opens the way for the Disciples, who face an almost identical problem, to solve it in much the same way. But more significant than any achievement in the improvement of ecclesiastical machinery were the great utterances of these representatives of the Baptist faith. The note sounded by Professor Rauschenbusch in the convention sermon, delivered at the Sunday morning session is typical. Professor Rauschenbusch, as our readers know, is the author of "Christianity and the Social Crisis," a book than which no more illuminating and influential has appeared in recent seasons. His interpretation of Baptists as a free people was responded to by the great congregation with fervent approval. Delivered to the representatives of the Baptist denomination who were enjoying the hospitality of the University of Chicago in Bartlett Gymnasium, it proved to be one of the many influences of that week which completely melted down the prejudice and suspicion through which many delegates had been previously regarding that institution. The careful reading of this sermon should strengthen the entente cordiale between the great Baptist brotherhood and the Disciples of Christ.

Text: "Now the Lord is the Spirit; and where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty."

"But we all, with unveiled face beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory, even as from the Lord, the Spirit." II Corinthians 3:17-18.

This chapter is an incisive comparison between Judaism and Christianity. Paul stood at the transition from the old to the new religion. That change was the great achievement in the progress of his own soul. The great practical task of his life was to free Christianity from the trammels of Judaism and to send it out on its world-wide mission in obedience to its own inherent spirit. Like Luther he had lived in the old and the new religion. From childhood his mind had been formed under the stern mastery of the Jewish law. Then he had passed out into the new atmosphere of Christianity, and the experience of that change had been photographed on his memory with all the concreteness and vividness of a great tragic catastrophe. In this chapter he condenses some of his fundamental judgment on the old and new religion in striking religious expressions.

The Limitations and Glories of Judaism.

First, in regard to Judaism. He recognized both its limitations and its glories. It was in its nature a transitory stage in the religious education of the race. The purpose of the law was chiefly condemnatory. It was to train the consciousness of sin and demonstrate human helplessness. Yet it had moral and religious power and splendor. The glory which shone from the face of Moses when he brought the law down from Sinai was to Paul typical of the glory which enveloped Judaism. He was more just to the religion from which he emerged than the leaders of the Reformation, who often viewed the Roman Church as an anti-Christian and diabolical power; more just, too, than we often are in our judgments on heathen religions. To use a modern formula, he regarded Judaism as a necessary step in the evolution of the religious consciousness of the race. The Jews stoned his body; his Jewish Christian brethren often stoned his soul; yet he held fast his love and veneration for the great history and nobility of the mother religion. This may be our first lesson. Our life, if it grows at all, has to outgrow many things. We have outgrown the moral maxims and the educational methods of our childhood, our youthful admirations in literature, and some of our theological theories, and even of our religious experiences. But we shall never part from anything wisely unless we love it in the parting, and unless we take with us into the new life whatever was vital and good in the old.

One of the fundamental defects of Jewish life as Paul knew it, was the lack of open vision. The veil with which Moses had to darken the radiance of his face seemed to Paul a permanent characteristic of the old religion. He saw that veil lying unlifted over the Old Testament whenever it was read and expounded in the countless synagogues on every Sabbath. He saw it lying across the minds of the men with whom he talked. Here is the pathetic judgment of one of the most brilliant disciples of Jewish theology on its methods and results. Jesus had passed similar judgments. The rabbis, he said, had the key of knowledge, but they used it not to unlock the door but to keep it locked. They were blind leaders of the blind. In their anxiety to enforce every jot of the law, they were frustrating its very spirit and essence.

What more terrible judgment can be leveled against any institution than this: that it undoes what it is set to do? If a system of national economy makes living dear instead of cheap and keeps ten million people underfed in the midst of wealth; if schools render pupils incapable of mental concentration and indifferent to intellectual ideals; if the state, instead of being the great protector of the weak, becomes an organ of oppression; if the law, instead of getting justice done, frustrates justice, and fortifies inherited injustice; and if religion, instead of revealing God, obscures his will and love and keeps men from a clear experience of their heavenly Father;—what greater condemnation is there? Yet that is the indictment brought by both Jesus and Paul against the religious system in which they were trained.

That, too, is the indictment brought by many of the noblest religious minds of all past centuries against systematized religion. It becomes the letter that kills. It does not merely lack the power to give life. It kills. It slays. It paralyzes religious insight. Has not the church for generation after generation assiduously bound the veil around the eyes of men? This should be our second lesson. It should be our heart-searching query if our theological and religious methods and institutions have to any degree slipped into this original sin of the great religious systems of the past, so that they veil the religious vision and become obscurers instead of revealers of God.

The Moral Obliquity of Some Teachers of Judaism.

In close connection with this, Paul finds that a further characteristic of contemporary Judaism was the frequent moral obliquity of its teachers. That fact had been brought home to him by his own controversies with them. This is really the starting point of this whole train of thought, and with Paul's usual severe logical consistency he returns to it at the end. (Chapter 4:1-2). The authority of the law hemmed men in at every step in their intellectual processes. This point and that point were fixed by the law or by Jewish theology and no man must trespass. Under such conditions no free stride was possible. Only a free mind can move in straight lines. A mind that is constantly "under the law" and bidden back by external authorities is in danger of becoming both timid and tortuous. It may still manage to get some exercise by subtlety of dialectics, but it must lack incisiveness of method. Paul never dreamed that Christianity would soon build up a new law by the creeds of councils, by papal definitions, by the authority of the church fathers, and by the scholastic doctors. He surely did not dream that he himself would be compelled to furnish the chief material for it and that his "sword of the spirit" would be beaten into chains and rivets for the spiritual life of later generations.

The moral results of such a system can best be studied today in the workings of Roman Catholic theology. The Jesuit order has had all the equipment for the most brilliant, intellectual work and it has done remarkable work within its limits, but no Jesuit has ever been a pathfinder for humanity in the higher realms of intellectual and religious progress. None but a free mind can be a pioneer. Whenever I study Roman Catholic theological works, I am impressed with the fact that their methods of reasoning, and even their literary style, bear the impress of that lifelong hesitation and fear of authority, and they often give a glimpse into the temptation to disingenuousness to which men are exposed under such a system.

The Great Emancipation.

When we turn to Paul's judgments on the new religion there is a striking contrast. Here is nothing transitory but a splendid consummation of God's eternal purposes. Here the aim is not condemnation, but redemption.

But the change that is foremost in his mind here is the great emancipation which he had experienced. The veil was gone for him and he knew that it disappeared whenever any man turned to the Lord. He had an overwhelming sensation of spiritual freedom.

"Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." Christianity was to him almost synonymous with liberty. Now he was no longer under the law and its restraints, but under the Lord and his impulses. That external authority which had hedged him in and had left him perplexed and limp with spiritual fatigue and powerlessness, was now changed into an internal authority, which was persuasive, sweet, joyous, uplifting and ennobling. The law stood over against him, saying, "Thou shalt" and "Thou shalt not"; the Spirit was within him, saying, "I ought" and "I can." The symbol of the law was a fence forbidding approach, and the rabbis boasted of having built a fence to guard the fence. The symbol of the Spirit was wings to fly across all fences.

Wherever the religious insight is set free from outgrown authorities, it always breathes the outdoor air of God's world of truth with a joyful sense of enlargement, and then leaps with an inspired swiftness of vision to larger and truer conceptions of life and God. This is ever one of the truest tests of real religion, whether men have this sense of enlargement in entering into it and in living within it. For God is great, and his truth is large, and the power of growth in it is endless. If, on the other hand, a man in entering religion has the feeling that he is entering a close and stuffy room, where the soul has to fold its pinions and walk circumspectly lest it knock the knick-knacks from the mantlepiece and the tidies from the upholstered furniture—well, religion may have lived there long ago, but she has probably moved on elsewhere.

But mark that Paul loved this new freedom not because it gave him a chance for rationalistic self-assertion and left him free to do and think as he pleased, but because he found that it made his mental processes moral. He speaks of the "confidence" and "boldness" which he is now able to use. He is not like others who "deal craftily" and "twist the word of God," but he can lay down a plain declaration of the truth and leave it to commend itself to the moral insight of every man. He had become free and thereby honest.

Roger Williams, that inspired apostle of liberty, feared all coercion as the poison of true religion. The deadliest influence in all the persecutions by both Catholicism and Protestantism, was not that it killed a few hundred men who remained loyal to their conviction, but that it created widespread disingenuousness among the millions who consciously or half-consciously suppressed or altered their conviction. The most pitiable sacrifices were not the men who went to the stake, but the men who dodged the stake. All creed subscriptions and doctrinal tests have had that effect.

The Baptist Protest Against Religious Coercion.

I rejoice in the brave championship of liberty by our denomination. We have dared to believe in the safety of liberty even though it always seems perilous. Our protest against the union of church and state was a protest against coercion in religion, and thereby a protest against dishonesty in religion. We have never had an authoritative creed, but have sent men to the large freedom and diversity of the Bible, and there, too, we have vindicated for him the right of private interpretation.

But Paul felt in this new life of Christianity even more than freedom and sincerity for the religious intellect. He found there the power of spiritual transfiguration. It was when he could gaze with unveiled face into the glory of the Lord and contemplate his truth freely that he experienced the transforming power of God and found himself being assimilated into the same image, from glory to glory.

This is really the test whether a truth is a religious truth to you. If it stirs and shakes you, if it unsettles you with divine dissatisfaction and impels you with a longing for holiness and God, if it lifts you beyond the fear of men and gives you a taste of the joy and peace of eternity, then the miraculous power of real religion is at work in you. Religious truth always has a direct sanctifying effect. If it has not, it may be truth, but it has not yet become religious truth to you.

But this golden, glorious sunlight of truth into which Paul was now looking with unveiled face, was no abstract body of ideas, but a living person. Nor was it a beautiful memory of a man who had once been the incarnate goodness and love. It was a divine personal power who was living in him and groaning within him in his deeper, inarticulate prayer experiences. He was so absorbing the Paul-life into the Christ-life that at least at times Paul felt that it was no longer Paul who lived, but Christ in him.

What was the greatest thing about Paul? It was not that he formulated a doctrine of redemption by which Christianity could shed the narrowing obligation of Judaism and become a world-wide religion. It was not that he was the great missionary pioneer and the model of missionary enthusiasm for all times. No, it was that Paul had experienced the living God through the living Christ, and was transfigured by the light and power of that inner life. Paul had become that great miracle in human life, a religious personality. Whenever he rapturously tells about that new life within him, his words throb and quiver and break down under the weight and power of his experiences. A man who has received that tongue of fire, can reach over centuries to lay his hands upon some other man and communicate the same divine fire to him.

Why have I chosen these thoughts for this morning, brethren? We are here, not as at other sessions, for the transaction of practical business, but as Christian men, to quiet and strengthen our souls by contact with God, and by contemplation of some truth which can nourish our hearts. We are here also as Baptists in order to confirm one another in the great principles and convictions which God revealed to our fathers, and which he has committed to us as a sacred trust. This text is a text for Baptists. This doctrine of the freedom of spiritual religion is a doctrine peculiarly dear to us.

The Widening Religious Life.

I have chosen these thoughts because we are today in a new age of religious enlargement. The experiences of one transition of religion are like those of every other. Whenever men have worked out into the larger freedom of new truth, I notice that they fall back on Paul and find in him a spiritual leader who has fought the same fight before them. Every emancipation of spiritual Christianity has been a revival of Paul's thoughts.

Today our religious life is widening out on every hand. The great crisis of the first century was the widening of religion from the national boundaries of Israel to the vaster sweep of the entire Roman world. A large portion of Paul's doctrine was worked out under the stress of that practical missionary necessity. The great missionary enterprise of our own day, at home and abroad, has already deeply affected and ennobled our modern religious life, and it is destined to affect our Christian thought more than we now know. Let no man imagine that when we have a great church in China and India and Japan, the physiognomy of our total religious world will still be the same.

By all the practical necessities of our social conditions, and by the imperious summons of the spirit of Jesus in our hearts, we are today facing the task of reshaping our social institutions, so that it will become possible for a Christian man to live a Christian life within them, and so that the institutions of our society will at least approximately be a social expression of the spirit of justice and brotherhood created in our country by Christ. That new social purpose has at one sweep enlarged and transformed our whole conception of the Christian redemption, and has superseded every previous partial formula by the all-inclusive and revolutionary aim of the kingdom of God on earth.

The new intellectual life of our age, which has proved its own rights by the amazing scientific results of the last 150 years, has changed the intellectual surroundings of our religious world too. We must necessarily overhaul all the work done by previous generations with the scientific methods and materials which were then at their command. This involves a simplification and purification of Christianity by returning to the spirit and thought of Jesus. The more scientific our religious life becomes, the closer somehow does it come to Jesus.

The Early Baptist Radicals.

Thus we are in the very act of a great religious transition. The organization of our denomination began in the last great transitional age, in the Protestant Reformation. In that transition we Baptists were far to the front on the skirmish line. We were the radicals of the radicals. Of the three great reformers, Luther, Calvin, and Zwingli, Zwingli was the most radical, so that Luther and Melancthon were anxious to disavow him and brush him from their skirts. But in precisely the same way Zwingli was anxious to disavow the Anabaptists. The first great creed of the Lutheran Church, the Augsburg Confession, point by point, makes it clear that the Lutheran party would have nothing to do with the Anabaptists. The epoch-making theology of Calvinism, Calvin's "Institutes of the Christian Religion," was first written to prove to the King of France that the Protestants were good people and had nothing to do with such extremists as the Anabaptists. When the Baptist movement was in its cradle, nobody ever expected that baby to sit on the brakes of the chariot of progress. We were for a "reformation without tarrying," even if we had to leave the old church and break it up. We were against clericalism and against all hierarchies. We were for democracy and for the religious emancipation of the laity. We went as far as the most radical Calvinist in purging religion of superstition, and when he stopped, we went on. The others reformed the Lord's Supper and cleared it of the abuses which had grown up about it, but they feared to attempt the reformation of baptism for they knew that that would shake the foundation of all church life. The abolition of infant baptism meant not simply the modification of one church rite, but a revolutionary reconstruction of the very conception of the church.

That is the kind of movement which our fathers initiated. They paid for their undertaking with their blood, but the God of history has vindicated their daring. In the long, slow sweep of four centuries, often by devious and pathetic ways, the course of religious development for the Protestant world has been in the direction marked out by the swift rush of the radical parties of the Reformation. That course has been fastest and most decided where Christianity has been allowed to follow its own genius with least hindrances from the conservatism of the past. Its triumph has been most complete in our own country. Physical coercion to compel religious uniformity is completely gone in our country. Moral coercion is swiftly disappearing. The right of private judgment in religious matters has become an axiom of American thought. Most of our denominations have accepted the principle of democracy for their church organization, and even those denominations which have imported from Europe a monarchical tradition, have been affected by democracy. Sacramentalism is almost gone; conscious spiritual experience is everywhere recognized as the great aim of religion. Thus the essential principles of Baptist life and thought are triumphant.

This victory is corroborated by the numerical progress of the various religious bodies in our country. The religions of authority, especially the Catholic, the Episcopalian, and the Lutheran, had entire European nations to draw upon for their personal resources and have spilled their immigrants on our shores by the million. But they have lost millions of those who came. Their numerical increase has been due to physical propagation and not to spiritual conquest. On the other hand, those religious bodies which originated in the Protestant revolution and which have based their life on the principle of freedom and spirituality, the Congregationalists, the Baptists, the Methodists, to some degree the Presbyterians, and the kindred denominations clustering around this group, had little immigration to draw upon in order to recruit their ranks, yet they have multiplied on the soil and the air of America. I can explain this fact only on the ground that they are more congenial in their spirit and conceptions to the modern and to the American conceptions of life, and that they have a greater inherent spiritual fitness and vitality.

This claim becomes still more striking if we measure the two groups of churches not by their numerical increase but by their spiritual influence on the total intellectual and moral life of America. The Catholic Church, for instance, has strong influence by its compact and powerful organization and institutions, but I fail to see that the general moral sentiment, the public opinion, or the literature of America are to any degree changed or formed by the spirit of Roman Catholicism. On the other hand, the Congregationalists, though comparatively few in number, have ever exercised a most potent influence on the religious and moral climate of America. All this is an historical confirmation of the principles of free and spiritual religion laid down by Paul.

Catching Up and Slowing Up.

We Baptists today are not relatively as much in the van as we were in our historical beginnings; partly because others have caught up; partly because we have slowed up. It is impossible in the nature of things to keep a great denomination at the fervor of its beginnings. It is unfair to expect that the great mass shall ever take the high views held by a few inspired leaders. We must not get the impression that all the Christians of the first century were such prophets of liberty and spirituality as Paul. Probably many thought him a dangerous man. He was a free-lance, the first great Protestant.

But I think that our denomination has, on the whole, been faithful to the principle of freedom. There have always been men among us who have incarnated anew the spirit of liberty and have thereby made marked contributions to the life of our peoples. I will not mention men whom I have in mind in our own country. But I am sure that John Clifford and David Lloyd-George in England could never have done for their nation what they have accomplished if they had not been nourished on Baptist principles and had not concentrated in their own life the religious passion awakened by them.

By all our past we have an historical call to be at the front in the missionary enlargement of the kingdom of God; in the Christian reconstruction of social institutions in order to achieve freedom and justice for the people; in the adaptation of Christian thought to modern knowledge; in the return to the simplicity and purity of Christ's own gospel; and in the attainment of a more immediate, a more radiant, and a more transforming contact with God.

Brethren, where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. But let us all, with unveiled face beholding the glory of the Lord, be transformed into the same image, from glory to glory.

Laymen's Movement Next Year

The Immense Gains of This Year to Be Conserved and New Ground Taken

BY J. CAMPBELL WHITE.

Next year's plans have been under most careful consideration by the leaders of the Laymen's Missionary Movement. They will include three main features,

1. Conservation of the interest already aroused.

2. Conventions in a limited number of large cities.

3. County conventions.

It is planned that each of the 75 cities where conventions were held this year, will be visited as early as practicable next fall, for a careful study with the local leaders of the best plans for deepening and extending the missionary spirit in all the churches. These will not be popular, public meetings, but in the nature of Leaders' Conferences. They will be open to all members of Men's Missionary Committees, including all pastors. Probably two afternoons and evenings will be spent at each center. At least one extra session will be held with the men at each center, who are qualified and willing to assist in holding County Conventions. It is easy to hold such conventions without accomplishing much permanent good through them, unless the men who conduct them have studied with a good deal of care the best methods of handling them. But by holding these special conferences for potential convention leaders, it is expected that the number of men competent to handle County Conventions successfully, will be increased very rapidly. A second method of conserving and extending the interest at the 75 main convention centers, will be an Anniversary Dinner, when the methods and results of the past year's work will be reviewed, and a policy of further work will be adopted. In addition to making a careful study of the amounts contributed by the various churches, next year's plans will include an equally careful study of the number of contributors.

Conventions in Cities.

The second main feature of next year's plans will be the holding of conventions in a limited number of large cities, which were not included in this year's schedule. But only so many of these will be undertaken as can be followed up thoroughly. The pace was so rapid this last year that it was impossible to give convention cities the help they really needed. While the whole plan of the National Campaign seemed to require crowding the conventions up against each other, without a day's intermission in most cases, this will not be necessary hereafter. Time will be taken to do a more complete work and render more absolutely certain, the permanent influence of the convention in all the organized church life of the city. Invitations have already been received from many cities for conventions next winter. These will all be given careful conisderation, and as many such invitations will be accepted as the Movement feels able to make thoroughly successful.

County Conventions.

The third feature of the policy next year is to hold County Conventions in just as many counties as leaders can be found or developed to take charge of. As it will take time to find and prepare these leaders for this important work, the most of these County Conventions will not be held until the season is somewhat advanced. Not many of them can be managed properly before November. And most of them cannot be held until after the Christmas holidays. It will be a distinct mistake for the leaders in any county to push ahead with their arrangements for a convention until they can be quite sure that it can be handled strongly. This will involve far more than several good missionary addresses. It is comparatively easy to secure these. But no convention should be attempted without the presence of at least one man who knows methods and is able to impart his knowledge to the convention. Inspiration is good, but without proper instruction in the methods of missionary education and finance, no great permanent work can be expected. This caution is vitally important.

These County Conventions will be held under the supervision of the secretaries of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, to be located at New York, Boston, Richmond, Va., Pittsburgh, Chicago, Kansas City and San Francisco, by the opening of the fall season. In the meantime all correspondence should be directed to the office, No. 1 Madison Ave., in New York. A special pamphlet dealing in detail with the County Co-operating Committee and its work has been prepared and may be secured, free of charge, by applying to headquarters.

The first monthly issue of Men and Missions will be the June number. It will be issued regularly hereafter except during July and August, the recognized vacation months. This periodical will be primarily a Correspondence School in Missionary Methods. It has a very distinct field and purpose. It is meant for men who have capacity for leadership. It will be indespensable to members of Co-operative Committees of the Laymen's Movement and invaluable to pastors and members of missionary committees in local churches. The subscription price is 50 cents a year, or in clubs of five or more, 40 cents each. This is to encourage all the members of Missionary committees to take advantage of this aid to missionary achievement.

The report of the National Missionary Congress is all in type, and will be off the press and ready for delivery, unless delayed, within thirty days of the close of the congress. Thousands of advance orders at $1.00 each.

Our Readers' Opinions

Do We Want Union?

Editors Christian Century:—It is a notable word that you have spoken in your recent editorials on Christian Union. Your proposal of three practical plans for promoting union, made last week, should command thoughtful attention. We have waited long for that word. Among us there has been no lack of preaching on the scripturalness and desirability of union; but our success at leadership in practical plans for bringing about union has not been notable. The world has not, therefore, understood that our chief purpose was to promote Christian Union; but has associated with our name the advocacy of things of far less significance. Has the world misunderstood? Has the promotion of Christian Union been our primary business?

That this was the first interest of the "fathers" a century ago, no informed man doubts. But has this high purpose always been the most striking characteristic of our movement? Have the intelligent people of the communities, where there are Churches of the Disciples, been impressed with the earnestness with which the Disciples are seeking to promote the union of Christians? There are not a few men of Christian faith, whose fairness we cannot doubt, who decline to take seriously our plea for union. Perhaps they have lived in some community where, when there were already more churches than any interest of the community called for, the Disciples came in with remarkable zeal, not to promote union, but to add another to the churches that encumbered and confused the community. Such an experience makes it hard to convince these men that we want Christian Union. Some of these men have seen evangelists of our body, with unblushing audacity strive to pursuade Presbyterians, and Methodists, and Episcopalians, not to be loyal to Christ and their religious convictions, but to become members of the church of the Disciples. This makes it hard to explain to them that our primary interest is in Christian Union. These men, too, are not unaware of our insistent demand that all persons coming into the fellowship of the churches of the Disciples must be immersed, howsoever exemplary may have been their Christian character, and however commendable may have been their work in other churches. This, too, makes it difficult to get men to see that Christian Union is our primary plea. Do we want union?

In view of this situation your word in the Christian Century is a notable one. You propose to attack the practical problem. Men will take you seriously. Let the whole body of the Disciples give themselves with their characteristic enthusiasm to the accomplishment of this practical task and men will take them seriously. Let our missionary societies take the money that has been going to establish churches in over-churched communities, where their presence tends only to confusion and strife, and with that money send forth men to voice in the community the call of God to union, and the movement will command the attention of thoughtful men. Let these men hold institutes, or congresses, or conferences, for the promotion of Christian Union. Let the men be big enough to see and get the communities to see the great social needs that might be met, and the religious interests that would be conserved by a union of the Christian forces of the community, and under the stress of these needs to waive small religious prejudices for the sake of effective work and they will find a hearty response by the best men of all communions. The need of such a work is beginning to be felt by leading men of many churches, as none can doubt who heard the many expressions on the subject at the recent Missionary Congress in Chicago. Shall the Disciples allow others to supplant them in practical leadership in this work which is their very reason for existence? We have come to the time when we must either undertake the practical task of union or cease to claim it as our plea. I hope that your words will meet an enthusiastic response from the great heart of the great brotherhood and that men will speedily be found who will consecrate time and talent to the accomplishment of the practical task of union in the thousands of over-churched communities. We have come to the time when we must not only plead for union, but we must bleed for it if we are to be accorded a place of leadership in this great movement toward the answer of the prayer of Our Lord.

A Misconception

Editors Christian Century: In my examination of the various views presented by your correspondents on the subject of baptism, I have been quite hopeful that each writer would encourage freedom of thought, and respect for the views of each other; for we cannot overlook the fact that the scriptures were written thousands of years ago, and their only true meanings are the ideas, their writers intended to convey by the use of their language.

Then, as no man's judgment is infallible, every man is liable to be mistaken in his construction of scripture language; and any man who becomes so infatuated with his own construction, as to imagine there can be no other, thereby qualifies himself to become a sectarian, and keep up divisions in the church.

Taking this view, I am led to believe that Bro. W. L. Hayden, honestly gives his construction of the scriptures in his article in the Christian Century of May 26, 1910. Yet it seems to me that his construction is, in some respects a misconception, in confounding the law with the gospel when he says: "The most spiritual religion conceivable is that which expresses itself in the complete submergence of the human will into the will of God in the obedience of faith to all forms given by him in whom we believe and in consistently following him by loving service in all the requirements of his kingdom." Now, I must think that Bro. H.'s misconception arises from overlooking what is implied in his use of the phrase, "expresses itself," for that which is expressed must exist before it can be expressed; and he makes no distinction between the expression and the thing expressed, and in this way confounds the provisions of the old covenant with that of the new, for the outward visible forms and ceremonies of the law, were only the shadows of things spiritual, and these visible shadows could not reach and purify the heart and conscience. Heb. 10:1-4. Then, if water baptism expresses spirituality the spirituality must exist in the baptism before it can be expressed; and we must not mistake and confound the means of expression with the thing expressed; and this shows that baptism was not instituted for the purpose of producing spirituality in those who were baptized, but to affect those who witnessed it. But this legal system of producing a moral life was faulty, on the ground that things seen could only produce temporal effects; and it required a constant belief in invisible moral principles to produce purity of heart and conscience. Then, I understand that the fault of the old legal system was the tendency of its outward and visible forms and ceremonies, to detract the mind from the contemplation of spiritual principles; for as the wise man said, "As a man thinks in his heart so is he." Then, it is not the mere thinking, but the things thought about that forms the character. Jesus and his apostles constantly taught this distinction; for it is not the fruit that imparts its quality to the tree, but the tree to its fruit, and it is not the act that constitutes murder, but the hatred of the heart; so it is not the outward observance of forms and ceremonies that creates spiritual life in the believer, but the spiritual principles on which he fixes his mind and heart.

Thus, instead of the Quakers' non-observance of forms, detracting from or preventing his character disproves the theory that water baptism has anything to do in producing such a character. The only union worth contending for is the Christ type of spiritual character in men. W. H. THOMAS.

Happily Surprised

Dear Brother Morrison: The prospectus and advance sheets of the new "Bethany Graded Series" I have looked over with an interest which grew as the investigation proceeded. I began without expecting much and ended with a sense of having found a good deal.

The plan, and the method of development seem to me admirable. While the beginners' lessons are well adapted to the small child, there is nothing cheap or "babyish" about it. The lesson has real vital interest, and a worthy object. The plan seems to me to follow true pedagogical principles.

Now, necessarily, it will take time to have such a course introduced and adopted. I shall take pleasure in bringing this material to the attention of the departments where it could be used, and recommend its favorable consideration. Very fraternally,

F. W. BURNHAM.

Unnecessary

A newly qualified judge in one of the small towns of the South was trying one of his first criminal cases. The accused was an old darky who was charged with robbing a hencoop. He had been in court before on a similar charge and was then acquitted.

"Well, Tom," began the judge, "I see you're in trouble again."

"Yes sah," replied the darky, "the last time, jedge, you was ma lawyer."

"Where is your lawyer this time?" asked the judge.

"I ain't got no lawyer this time," answered Tom. "I'm going to tell the truth."—Baltimore American.

"John," she exclaimed, jabbing her elbow into his ribs at 2:17 a. m., "did you lock the kitchen door?" And John, who is inner guard, and was just then dreaming over last evening's lodge meeting, sprang up in bed, made the proper sign, and responded, "Worthy Ruler, our portals are guarded." Oh, he hit the title right, even if he was asleep.—United Presbyterian.

CHAPTER FIVE

Revenge is Sweet.

John M'Ketridge, licensed grocer, stood in his own shop door at the close of the day. A long, new clay pipe in his mouth and clouds of tobacco smoke curling round his head, he would have looked the picture of contented prosperity, had it not been for a certain air of restlessness in his small steel-blue eyes. A figure above the average height, and beyond the average circumference, was not improved by having its huge hands thrust deeply into capacious trowsers pockets. He pretended to be watching his youngest apprentice as he awkwardly put up the shutters on the large shop window—the only one which the shop possessed. But a close observer might have noticed that those cunning eyes glanced frequently and uneasily along the main street, toward the corner of Motherwell road. Presently a cyclist shot around the corner and John M'Ketridge's florid, fat face lit up with a triumphant smile as Donald Graeme glided past. He nodded coolly as John took his pipe from his mouth and waved it gleefully towards him. When Donald had passed on John turned to the apprentice and said blandly:

"There, Sandy, I'll put the pin in the shutters mysel'. Get your bike, laddie and rin away oot tae yer mither wi' that parcel o' tea I forgot tae send wi' you last week." Sandy hung his head.

"Mither'll no' need the tea before Thursday. I'd rather wait for the half holiday."

Your a poor, cowardly gommeril, Sandy, that's what you are. Afeared o' your life o' witches an' warlocks an' lang nebbit things. Its no' above five miles tae Millburn. Ye'll be back afore ten o'clock. Did ye no see young Donald Graeme starting oot for a ride the noo, jist for the pleasure a't?"

"He'll be gawn somewheres maybe tae see his lass. He'll no' be thinkin' o' the darkness, awm thinkin'."

"You'll niver hae a lass tae see, onyway you shamblin' body. What lassie wad speak tae a lad wha trimmels in his claes for ivery peewheep he hears in the meadows—thinkin' its a warlock?"

"There's maur things than warlocks, Maister," answered Sandy, dryly.

"Lang tongued laddies maybe?" Sandy had stooped to pin his corduroy trousers tightly round his legs, with strong white safety pins. He glanced upward knowingly but did not reply. His master's red face grew purple, and he shut the shop door with a bang.

"Be aff home wi' ye," he said sternly. "An' stay a' nicht, but be in guid time tae tak' aff the shutters in the mornin'."

"That will I, sir," answered Sandy, as he turned towards the back kitchen for his bicycle.

"Ay," he muttered to himself as he vigorously pumped the machine, that he would have to pump again at least five times, before he covered the five miles which lay between him and home—"Lang-tongued laddies"—that's how there's dye and a paircel for my mither when there's folks in for supper. Donald Graeme, maybe, or some ithero' thae chiels wha spend, sae muckle o' their time wi' the maister in the back parlour o' nichts. "Lang-tongued laddies"—ma word—hiblins I'd know enough some day tae gar John M'Ketridge keep a ceevil tongue in his heid—whiles there's mair things tae fear than witches an' warlocks an' lang nebbit things."

Meantime, John M'Ketridge mounted the stair leading to the living rooms above the shop with a lighter step than one would expect who might happen to judge by appearances.

"Mattie, Mattie, where are you?" he called from the first landing.

"Come ben the room, John," quickly replied a pleasant voice from within.

He turned to the right and entered a long narrow dining room whose windows faced the street. Mrs. M'Ketridge sat near one of them, busily plying her knitting needles. Many a one wondered who wore all the socks she knitted, but that was her own affair. She looked up as her husband stepped into the room and smiled placidly. She was small and slight, and gentle looking. Her wavy brown hair parted in the middle was well brushed back from a white forehead, where lines of care or sorrow showed all too plainly. There was a pathetic light in her soft grey eyes which gave one the impression that she was always about to plead for something or some one.

"Well, John, you have closed up to time, for once, I see."

"Ay, guid wife, wonders must come sometime. I'll no spoil the supper the nicht—but maybe somebody else will," he said, and laughed.

"You didn't tell me who was coming, John, and I didn't like to ask you as I passed through the shop on my way to the fish stall. Mr. Sinclair was chatting with you then, you know."

"It was jist as weel ye had the sense to houd yer wheest, for I wad hae telt ye a lee—the meenister's ower ofter round the corner in Graeme's for me tae say that Donald was comin' here."

"So it's Donald this time," she said wistfully. She did not need to ask questions. For years she had known that when a fool got badly entangled in her husband's gambling net, there was sure to be a special supper for the victim.

"Ay, at last Mattie. Revenge is sweet, an' its drawin' near now." She did not pretend to hear him. But with her sweet, pleading eyes looking away towards the westering sun, she said softly:

"It is strange John, but I have been thinking of Donald most all the evening. Waes me, but he was a bonny bairn when his mother brought him to see our wee Johnny—just eighteen years ago this day."

"Ay, an' he was a bonny laddie, too, just seventeen years agone, when his faither turned me oot o' his employ, wi'out a character, for a maitter o' a wheen shillin's that he kenned fine I was goin' tae pay him back. He made great work that day aboot the gamin' table, as he ca'd it. Ma word, he'll hae reason tae think o' that day afore lang." Again, she did not answer him, but took up her own story, where she had left off—

"It was about eight o'clock of the evening when they came slipping up the stair softly. Wee Johnny lay in the cradle, white as wax; just breathing and no more. Donald, rosy cheekit, and curly headed, stood beside the cradle with wondering eyes and parted lips. Ah, but I mind weel how he turned and looked up into his mither's face, as he whispered:

"I see nae wings, mither."

"A baby has nae wings," she whispered back.

"Is't no' an angel?" he said. And then I fell down in a faint, John, and knew no more for hours. When I came to, the first thing I saw was you on your knees at the bedside, sobbing as if your heart would break. Then I knew all. And instead of crying out myself, John, I took to comforting you. And don't you mind, John, it was the words wee Donald said, that brought a gleam of comfort to your sore heart. It seems like yesterday since I saw you drying your tears and heard you saying softly, half to yourself:

"Oor Johnny's an angel noo, right enough. I'll never forget Donald——"

"I see fine what yer drivin' at, Mattie, an' I'm jist lettin' ye rin on. But ye may as weel save yer breath. I vowed tar bring David Graeme tae his knees seventeen years syne. An' I'll keep my vow." With a large blue silk handkerchief he wiped great drops of perspiration from his brow.

"If our baby had lived, John, he would be nigh nineteen now. Think of it, and if some man under the garb of friendship were to tempt him to ruin—what would we do, John?"

"Reap what we sowed, nae doot. David Graeme had nae compassion on me, nor on my young wife. When I sinned I had tae suffer wi'oot mercy. He thocht, nae doot, when I set up an opposition shop, which only a stroke o' luck enabled me to do, that I was takin' my revenge that wy. Ma word he'll find oot that John M'Ketridge knows how to be revenged afore lang."

"Don't be angry with me, John. Let me plead, not for Donald's sake, but for your own sake and for mine. You've been a kind husband to me, John, all along the years. And I have been praying for you ever since I have known your besetting sin, that you may be delivered from the evil power of betting and gaming. Think of what the end must be, John, and think of all the ruin wrought on home and character by this sin. What is money, compared with happiness? Can you and I ever know what the word means so long as you are the slave of this evil habit? Oh, be wise, John, for my sake, and for the sake of our angel baby. Show tonight that you have the wish in your heart to be an honest man, by refusing to touch young Donald Graeme's money." She laid her hands timidly on his folded arms. He looked at her scornfully—

"A woman is the most mean-spirited thing on earth," he said. "Have I waited for this day for seventeen long years an' must I set aside my victory for an auld wife's fears? Na, na, Mattie. Ye'll hae tae pray yet awhile—wheest, there's his tap at the back door. I'll gang down an' hae a whiles crack wi' him in the back parlour. We'll be up for supper directly." She stood still and gazed after him with ashen face.

"He that hideth hatred with lying lips is a fool," she said slowly, as she moved wearily towards the kitchen.

Donald Graeme had stolen into this house many a night by the back door, and had never thought enough about his conduct to make him feel ashamed of himself. Tonight he entered with bowed head and faltering step. He did not so much as touch the hand so blithely held out to him by John M'Ketridge. Walking past him into the back parlor which he knew too well, he turned round and gravely faced the man who had led him on to ruin.

"Mr. M'Ketridge, you know my business. Dou you still hold me accountable for a debt incurred when I was laboring under strong excitement—in fact when I was not capable of transacting any business, honest or otherwise?"

"Ye hae win sma' sums frae me mony a time, Donald. Did I ever refuse tae pay?"

"You never did, sir. But small sums are nothing. This means more than I care to tell you."

"Beeziness is beeziness, Donald. Mayhap ye'll win twa or three times as muckle frae poor me wi'in the montn."

"I'll never win from you again, Mr. M'Ketridge, nor lose by you, either."

"Hoots man, what's a hundher pun? Naething ava! I niver had ony luck mysel' till I had lost mair nor that."

"There is but one condition I would name, Mr. M'Ketridge, as I give you this money. You will kindly not boast of it to any one. I deserve to suffer myself. But my parents need not be dragged down by my folly. "

"I thought ye had mair pluck, Donald," said Mr. M'Ketridge as he looked closely at the two fifty pound notes handed him by his victim. "But I ken fine how it feels to hand ower the first big loss. A' the same cheer up, laddie, ye'll get over it in no time. Let's drink tae oor next meetin'. Ye ony tak' wine, poor laddie, nae use in a' tae drown care."

"Nothing tonight, Mr. M'Ketridge," said Donald, moving toward the door. A look in his eye, the elder man did not care to see.

"Havers, Donald, taste this sherry—it's o' the best.

"No, thanks."

"Weel, cam' awa' up the stair. The wife has supper waitin'."

"Some other time I will explain to Mrs. M'Ketridge why I cannot sup with her tonight." Without another word he stepped out into the gloaming and was gone.

"Ye'll no slip by yer faither sae high an' michty me chiel, ane o' these days—an' yet I'm sorry for you, Donald," he mused as he shut and bolted the door, "it's no you I'm wishin' tae hurt, but yer faither'll hae tae ca' tae mind what he said lang syne, aboot the gamin' table."

He slipped his ill-gotten gains into his pocketbook and pushed it into an inside pocket. He began slowly to ascend the stair. Somehow his feet seemed weighted compared with an hour ago. Was it the Dead Sea print against his heart, that seemed to chill his very soul, even in the moment of what he termed his triumph? As he reached the lobby Mattie's voice, clear and sweet, fell on his ears and arrested his steps—

"Dear Lord, he has been a good man to me, Thou knowest. Don't let us be separated in the Great Day. Heaven would be but a lonely place for me without my own John. Give him a sight of his angel baby, dear Lord, that it pleased Thee to take away. And I know that though it didn't please Thee to give us another son that I pleaded so long for. Yet as Thou didst take in love so Thou didst withhold in love. And better still, I know that, though John has wandered far from Thee, Thou dost love him still. Help him, good Lord, to bring his sins, and his troubles, ay, and David Graeme along with them, and lay them all at the feet of Jesus, who alone knows the true weight of our burdens." The voice ceased and he stole quietly away drawing his hand across his eyes and muttering brokenly to himself:

"If the man who said 'Revenge is sweet,' had had a wife like Mattie, he would have kenned better. Maybe after a' David Graeme'll no see me sae soon as I intended."

Bootlaces

BY M. A. FULTON.

There was not a neater turn-out of its kind in the City of Londonderry than the Burton's pony carriage. It had been a present from Mr. Burton to his only daughter, Eleanor, on her twenty-first birthday. Like most Irish girls, Eleanor dearly loved horses, and when she grasped the reins, and drove her delicate mother out into the suburbs on a fine day, it would be hard to find a happier girl than she. Though Mrs. Burton's health had not been good for years, her sympathetic heart often led her to the bedside of still greater sufferers, and her husband, a prosperous merchant in the city, supplied her liberally with means to help many who were in need.

On a lovely evening in summer, when Prahan woods were looking their best, Eleanor, radiant in the freshness of youth and beauty, turned her pony's head towards the open country. On the outskirts of the wood, at a small cottage with a pretty garden in front, she drew rein. One of her mother's old people lived there. She alighted and helped her mother from the carriage. Then she went to the pony's head, caressing the gentle creature's glossy neck, and speaking kindly to him in a low, sweet voice.

Before she was aware of his approach, a poor, worn-out, miserable-looking tramp accosted her in pleading tones—

"For God's sake, Miss, buy from me!"

Eleanor was startled by the sudden apparition. She felt the color leave her face. The man's dark eyes, burning like coals, were eagerly fixed on her. A sudden pity filled her heart. The thought was forced upon her that the emaciated, ragged form was that of a good man once in good circumstances. With an effort she spoke calmly—

"What have you to sell?"

"Bootlaces," he answered, and held out his store. There were not more than a dozen in all. She could not tell why she did it, but she took them from his trembling hand. He looked at the shilling she gave him for half a minute in silence, a curious, wistful smile playing over his wasted features. Then he raised his old brown felt hat, and held it for a moment, as he said—

"There are angels in the world yet, lady, though I do not deserve to meet one."

While he was speaking Mrs. Burton came out of the cottage. She looked anxiously at her daughter, fearing the man had been insolent. Eleanor's calm demeanor, however, reassured her. Turning to the poor tramp, she was about to speak to him, when he started back a step in deep agitation. Dropping his battered hat on his head, he groaned hoarsely—

"God help me—it's Elizabeth."

"Robert Inwood," exclaimed Mrs. Burton, in her turn as excited as he was. "Can it be possible that it has come to this? Oh! Robert, Robert!"

"Yes, Elizabeth, to this long ago. But, thank God, I was not given the power to drag you down. It is long years since you told me that I must either give you up or give up strong drink. I chose my own way, and this is where it has led me. I mocked when I heard that you were married to plain James Burton—a man great in Temperance halls, but very little in the business world at that time. Now I learn that he is one of the most successful and honored men in the city. His wife and daughter can ride in their carriage, while I am an outcast, ready to fill a pauper's grave, or worse, the result of my own folly."

"Can nothing be done for you Robert? I'll speak to James," said Mrs. Burton, almost choking with emotion.

"It is too late—too late," he said bitterly. "I have been a wretched dweller in the slums of Belfast for years. As I have sown, so must I reap. The wasted years will soon be all over."

She was going to speak, but he waved a skeleton-looking hand, and said—

"Let me speak, please. I have felt for some time that the battle will soon be over; a great longing took hold of me to see the old places once again, where my happy childhood, youth, and early manhood were passed. I could not die without seeing the old Cathedral spire once more, and the ivy-covered walls of the college where such things were expected from me. For a week past I have wandered round the city at night gazing at all the old familiar places. And I have stood beside the river, too, every night this week, and my heart has been wrung when I realized the terrible wreck I had made of life. When I was a man, before the drink-fiend got hold of me, I used to be stroke oar, many a time in the winning boat, at the Foyle races. Now the old river seems to be calling me to run a race from which I shall not return."

"No, Robert, don't, don't—you have friends yet," pleaded Mrs. Burton earnestly. Eleanor remained silent, but tears were falling slowly down her pale checks.

"You need not be afraid of that, Mrs. Burton—there is hardly enough of the man left in me to do anything requiring so much courage. If I could I would—there, that's the truth. The life that might have been a blessing to myself and others is only a curse now—a continual nightmare—the sooner it is over the better."

Eleanor, deeply moved, said tenderly, "Do not say that. We will tell father about you. He could get you into a home. You may be saved from drink yet, and be happy again."

"It is more than I deserve, that any pure-minded girl should even speak to me, or take an interest in me. But you are your mother's daughter, Miss Burton; and, may I say to you, a nobler, truer-hearted woman never lived. I little thought, when, like a wounded hare, I limped back to the old cover, that I should be honored by an interview with her, or with you. I am not worthy of it. Yet your sweet face and tearful eyes bid me hope that you will grant me one request. For your mother's sake, whom I once loved, shake hands, this once, with a poor, drink-destroyed man."

Without a moment's hesitation, Eleanor gave him her hand, and he, once more uncovering, raised her gloved hand an instant to his lips and turned away, his face set toward the open country.

"Stay, Robert, wait a moment, please," said Mrs. Burton, opening her purse. He turned back, but signed to Mrs. Burton that he did not want her money. Drawing his wasted figure to its full height, he addressed Eleanor, while a gleam of something like reverence shone on his worn face:

"Miss Burton, you have just purchased the last of my stock-in-trade. May I request that you will put it away in some hidden corner, where only you shall know. Then, if a testing time should ever come into your life such as came into your mother's long ago, take out the parcel, and let it tell my history. I venture to say, you will have no friend who can speak to you more forcibly than will those 'bootlaces' of the utter ruin which overwhelms the man who yields to the craving for strong drink."

WITH DUE ALLOWANCE.

It was at a little northwestern town in New South Wales. A traveling Englishman stood on the veranda of the public house watching the sun go down across the Black Soil Plains in a splendor of purple and gold.

"By Jove!" he exclaimed to an impassive bushman who was lounging against a post. "That's gorgeous, isn't it?"

The bushman slanted his head a little and looked critically at the glowing west. "Not bad," he drawled; "not bad—fer a little place like Boggabri."—Cosmopolitan.

A Warning

The Clothes-pin family dwelt in a bag
That hung by the laundry door;
They'd never been known to fret or to nag
Though chances there were galore,
For a bag is as crowded for clothes-pin folks
As a flat for the human kind:
And people and pins must consider as jokes
Many things that are not to their mind.

But a change has come over the Clothes-pin clan;
Discontented and restless are they
And happy no more. The trouble began
When a message came down one day
From the nursery, saying its ruler and king
Had tired of every toy,
And required that his subjects the clothes-pins bring
To restore him to peace and joy.

The Right Kind of Help

BY HILDA RICHMOND.

Perhaps it would startle a great many ladies who consider themselves tender-hearted and very charitable to tell them that they are real enemies of society, but that is the plain truth of the matter. It may sound cold-blooded and unsympathetic to say that much of the haphazard giving indulged in by ladies all over the country, especially in small cities and large towns does infinitely more harm than good, and yet it is all true. It is so easy to hand out a dollar or some old garments or some food to a beggar and dismiss the case from our minds, that we are glad to have the job over and pride ourselves that we are quick to relieve distress. As a matter of fact nothing but food to supply immediate wants, and that eaten in the presence of the giver, should ever be given to beggars without an investigation. Of course to this occasionally might be added a night's lodging or garments, but as a general rule it should have few exceptions.

The woman in the large city, like New York or Chicago, can not, in the very nature of things investigate her calls for aid, but the women in the little places and even fair sized cities may protect themselves, and help deserving people if they will only take the trouble to do so. It isn't that food and clothes and money should never be given, but only that they go to deserving people. And once you get the reputation of an investigator the frauds will fight shy of you, so you are really doing yourself a service when you dig under the surface of every tale of woe that reaches your ears.

Last winter a woman accidentally happened to mention that she had been supplying a poor family with food and clothing, and she was amazed to hear her friend, a local charity worker, lecture her roundly. "It isn't a bit of wonder that we never can reform John Smith!" she exclaimed. "If soft people like you will support him in idleness, what can we do?" It happened that this man was a drinker and idle, but when he applied to the organized charities for aid they speedily found work for him, and threatened him with the strong arm of the law, if he did not support his family. They had been trying to discover who was interfering with their plans to reform Mr. Smith, and when the secret was out the "tender-hearted" woman received a short sketch of the man's life that forever discouraged promiscuous giving for her. Within a week the Relief Board of the city had supplied Mr. Smith with a shining new axe, and he was working for dear life to keep out of the poorhouse by supporting his family. Different states have different laws, and this being an Ohio case the Relief Board knew that any able bodied man who could get work and would not support his family might be sentenced to hard labor for a certain length of time. That man has been at work ever since and his wife and children have had enough to eat and to wear. And the tender-hearted woman found plenty of worthy cases to help where there was no lazy man in the family.

To Excite Sympathy.

Another woman was shocked beyond expression to discover that a family she had assisted secretly for years, purposely kept their children ignorant and pinched looking to excite sympathy. Of course this is an old city trick, but not so common in country towns, and she could scarcely believe her eyes and ears. Instead of declaring that she would wash her hands of all charitable work from henceforth and forever, as other ladies have done on discovering frauds, she went into the work of an investigation with might and main, and before a month had passed she had those unfortunate children in a good home for girls, and the parents almost frightened to death. For years they had fattened on the easy-going people, always carefully avoiding organized charities, but when one determined woman took up the case in earnest she helped them more in one week, than ever before in a year with all her so-called charity.

It takes time and effort to do real charitable work, but it pays. There are dozens of ways in which it may be done, and perhaps the most effective is the personal visit to the home. A bright woman can see and hear more in five minutes of poverty and real distress, than a whining beggar could tell in a week. It may shake her faith in human nature to some extent to see fat, lazy women sitting in the midst of dirt and rags waiting until the children come home with articles collected at back doors, but the shock will do her good. Frauds are never willing to be investigated, and the beggar who shrinks from a personal visit rarely is in dire need of assistance. Very often conditions are such in the squalid home that the law should be employed to correct them at once, and rid the community of real dangers. If ladies could only realize how much of civic reform they could accomplish by a few calls among their pensioners, they surely would never put off these important duties.

And if any lady is too busy to go and personally investigate the call for aid, it is always possible to refer the case to one of the organized charities of the town. A sympathetic lady driving through a town one winter day saw two children out barefoot, and the instant she reached her destination she telephoned a friend to go at once and buy those children shoes, and she would pay for them. She explained that it would be impossible for her to attend to the matter, and begged that her friend should not delay a single minute to relieve the poor little ones. The friend truly answered that she would attend to the case, but she bought no shoes. Instead she had the authorities on the trail of the father of the children before an hour had gone by, and the youngsters were in new shoes and stockings before night. Any charity worker who does the right kind of work will say at once that helping any father to shirk his duty is the worst thing that can happen to any family. That man was so fearful all winter, that his family had all the comforts of life. And, best of all, one more woman was converted to the right way of doing charity work, and has since investigated the cases that have come to her.

Must be Helped to Help Themselves.

And once this habit is fixed many other ways of helping the needy present themselves. The thing to do is to get the idea firmly grounded in your mind that in every instance where it is at all possible, the poor must be helped to help themslves.

So, if you really want to do your country, your town, the poor and yourself a service, take up the right kind of charitable work. Do not be discouraged at the "bigness" of the task, but plunge right in. There is no telling how much one woman may accomplish in a year without going to very much trouble, for the effects of putting even one man to work to decently care for his family and keep them from being beggars, are so far reaching that only eternity can measure them. And who can tell what it means to rescue even one unfortunate being from a life of crime, and start him anew before it is everlastingly too late. This has been done time and again when parents have been forced to give up the unfortunate little ones in their wretched homes who were their sole means of support. Over and over children have been placed in comfortable homes and educated who would otherwise have turned out to be nothing but professional beggars. It isn't necessary to go into the wholesale business of breaking up homes because poverty abounds, but if, after every other plan to get the parents to look after the little ones has failed, then the law must do its work. Instead of snipping off a little poverty here and a little there, relieving want in a temporary manner where you can, dig down into the root of the trouble and then apply the remedy. Whether it be money or the law or sympathy that is needed, be sure you know exactly what will do the most good, and then have the courage of your convictions. Just a few determined women in every town would revolutionize things in a short time, and bring happiness and permanent comfort to hundreds of sad hearts, and one of these days all charitably disposed persons will know the truth of this statement.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, JUNE 12.

Theme for the Day.—The Coming of the Kingdom.

Scripture.—Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth.—Matt. 6:10.

The kingdom of the world is become the kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever.—Rev. 11:15.

The urgent need, the holy hymn,
With these all time is filled,
The altar light is never dim,
The prayer is never stilled.

Thy kingdom come! Thy will be done!
The watchmen keep their tryst;
Not one, but all hours, Thou hast won
The world to Thee, O Christ!
—Marianne Farningham ("Without Ceasing.")

Prayer.—Holy Father, we praise Thee for the prayer which our Saviour left us, in whose wide embrace are gathered all the needs of our common humanity. How many thousands daily repeat the prayer, not in meaningless and formal phrase, but with hearts fully set upon the answer. And in that faith that Thou wilt make good the response we ever pray. And the knowledge that we are part of a mighty host lends strength to our effort and confidence to our hope. Give us to see of the travail of our souls, and to be satisfied. Amen.

MONDAY, JUNE 13.

Theme for the Day.—The Triumph of Truth.

Scripture.—And in thy majesty ride on prosperously, because of truth.—Psa. 45

God will send forth his loving-kindness and his truth.—Psa. 57:3.

Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again;
The eternal years of God are hers;
But Error, wounded, writhes in pain,
And dies among his worshippers.
—Bryant ("The Battlefield.")

Prayer.—Our Father, we are glad that the universe is Thine own, and that its forces are set for the triumph of the right and the overthrow of wrong. We wish this same triumph in our own lives. Save us, we beseech Thee, from the sin and folly of world-wide hopes which we do not first attempt to realize in our own lives. Help us to love the truth, to speak the truth, and to make truth the commanding force in our lives. And may we make Him our daily Companion and Friend who is for us and for all men the living Truth. In his name we ask. Amen.

TUESDAY, JUNE 14 (FLAG DAY)

Theme for the Day.—The Colors.

Scripture.—Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee, that it may be displayed because of the truth.—Psa 60:4.

We will triumph in thy salvation, and in the name of our God we will set up our banners.—Psa. 20:5.

Flag of the free heart's hope and home!
By angel hands to valor given;
Thy stars have lit the welkin dome,
And all thy hues were born in heaven.
Forever float that standard sheet!
Where breathes the foe but falls before us,
With freedom's soil beneath our feet,
And freedom's banner floating o'er us?
—Drake ("The American Flag.")

Prayer.—God of our fathers, we adore Thee for Thy providential guidance of our nation through all the exigencies of its history. We thank Thee for our flag, that in so many scenes of war and peace has stood evermore for liberty, courage, patriotism and the love of our land. May that banner grow dearer to us through the years. May the colors call us constantly to patriotic service and sacrifice. And may the love of the flag lead us to sincerer reverence for that older and more enduring standard, the banner of the Cross. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 15.

Theme for the Day.—The Imperishable Word.

Scripture.—All flesh is as grass, and all the glory thereof as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower falleth, but the word of the Lord abideth forever.—I. Peter 1:24.

The word unto the prophet spoken
Was writ on tables yet unbroken;
The word by seers or sybils told,
In groves of oak, or fanes of gold,
Still floats upon the morning wind,
Still whispers to the willing mind.
One accent of the Holy Ghost
The heedless world hath never lost.
—Emerson ("The Problem.')

Prayer.—We praise Thee, O Lord, for the word of testimony borne by Thy servants through all the years. Prophets and teachers, saints and martyrs, have lifted up their voices to speak for Thee, and never hast Thou left Thyself without witness among any people, but Thy far-flung word has wakened the world to the power of the truth. Give us larger faith in Thy word, in its divine message, its transforming power, and its imperishable vitality. Then shall we be ourselves filled with its holy passion, and permitted to share its glory. Amen.

THURSDAY, JUNE 16.

Theme for the Day.—The True Victors.

Scripture.—For whatsoever is begotten of God overcometh the world; and this is the victory that hath overcome the world, even our faith.—I. John 5:4.

Speak, history! who are life's victors? Unroll thy long annals, and say
Are they those whom the world called the victors, who won the success of a day?
The martyrs, or Nero? The Spartans, who fell at Thermopylae's tryst,
Or the Persians and Xerxes? His judges or Socrates? Pilate or Christ?
—William Wetmore Story ("Io Victis.")

Prayer.—Our Heavenly Father, never would we forget the lesson Thou hast taught us in the life of our Saviour, that Thou hast chosen the weak instruments of the world to confound the mighty. Save us, we pray Thee, from the mistake of taking outward appearances for reality. Give us clearer vision, to see that one with God is always more than a match for all adversaries, and that two in Thy strength shall put ten thousand to flight. And we may strive for victory, not in our own might, but in the power of Him who loved us and gave himself for us. In whose name we ever pray. Amen.

FRIDAY, JUNE 17.

Theme for the Day.—The Charm of Poetry.

Scripture.—My heart overfloweth with a goodly matter; I speak the things which I have made touching the king; my tongue is the pen of a ready writer.—Psa 45:1.

For in him we live and move and have our being, as certain of your own poets have said.—Acts 17:28.

Read from some humbler poet,
Whose songs gushed from his heart,
As showers from the clouds of summer,
Or tears from the eyelids start.

Such songs have power to quiet
The restless pulse of care,
And come like the benediction
That follows after prayer.
—Longfellow ("The Day is Done.")

Prayer.—Our Father, we thank Thee for the gift of song, and for all who have lightened the burdens of mankind by the charm and inspiration of noble words. It is Thy gift to mankind, and by it Thou hast made easier and more beautiful the life of our race. Help us to cherish in our hearts the utterances of those who have given us the music of great poetry, to fill our minds with its messages, and to adore Thee, the great Poet and Artist, whose crowning work is the soul redeemed through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

SATURDAY, JUNE 18.

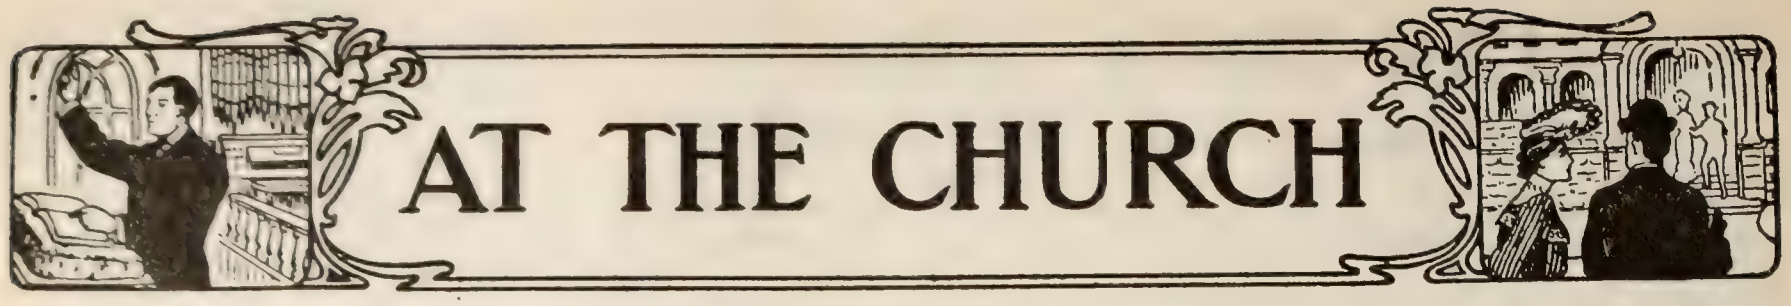
Theme for the Day.—Growth.

Scripture.—But grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To him be the glory both now and forever. Amen.—II. Peter 3:18.

But speaking truth in love, may grow in all things into him, who is the head, even Christ.—Eph. 4:15.

Year after year beheld the silent toil
That spread his lustrous coil;
Still, as the spiral grew,
He left the past year's dwelling for the new,
Stole with soft step its shining archway through,
Built up its idle door,
Stretched in his last-found home, and knew the old no more.
—Holmes ("The Chambered Nautilus.")

Prayer.—Eternal Father, Thou art ever the same, and Thy years fail not. But Thou hast set us the task and the joy of constant growth toward likeness to Thyself. Every day we would attain some part of that divine ambition. Every day we would leave behind us something of our imperfect life. And may the passing weeks bring us assurance that our efforts are not in vain, but that we are making progress towards the goal of all our striving, the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. We ask for his sake. Amen.



The Change He Needed

Mr. Lloyd George is famous, of course, for his brilliant repartee and biting sarcasm. "I am here ———" he remarked once at a political meeting, but before he had time to finish the sentence, a noisy interrupter had chimed in, "And so am I."

But the retort was as quick as it was overwhelming. "Yes—but you are not all there!"

"What do your opponents really want?" he inquired in a recent speech. In the momentary pause that followed the question there came a voice husky from the effects of alcohol, "What I want is a change of government."

"No no," was the ready reply, "what you really want is a change of drink."—M. A. P.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Seeds and the Soils*

After a long series of studies in the activities of Jesus we are to conclude the quarter's work with some of his representative teachings, especially those which took the form of parables. For this purpose we go back to the 13th chapter, where this type of instruction is given its clearest illustration in the Gospel of Matthew.

Probably every careful reader of the Gospels has noticed that Jesus' use of parables did not begin until the Galilean ministry was well advanced. Apparently he resorted to this manner of teaching only after the days of his greatest popularity were over, and he began to find himself surrounded by suspicious and critical listeners, either scribes and Pharisees or those who joined with them in their opposition to him. When Jesus discovered this new attitude toward himself on the part of so many of his audience, he deliberately changed the method of his teaching, and from the plain and simple statements concerning himself, the kingdom and the Father, he resorted to the use of figures of speech, stories and parables in his instruction.

The Use of Parables.

The parable was generally an illustration taken from the familiar activities of the people to whom it was spoken. It differed from a fable in being true to life, though not necessarily an actual event. The fable was a piece of fiction, manifestly impossible of occurrence, as in the case of Jotham's fable of the trees (Jud. 9:7f) or Joash's fable of the thistle and the wild beast (2 Kings 14:9f). The parable was an event which was likely to happen at any time, and may have happened many times in the experience of the people. It was chosen because of its familiarity and simplicity. It had a single truth to enforce, and it remains to the end of time easily translatable into the conditions of any other age and people. This quality renders the parable so easy of comprehension by all who study them. It is only those who attempted with labored pedantry to apply every feature of the parable to some religious truth who are likely to miss entirely the central idea which the parable contains.

The reason why Jesus took up the use of parables when he began to find himself the subject of suspicion and criticism was that this form of teaching lent itself so easily to the obscuring as well as the illumination of truth. To us the meaning of the parables of Jesus seems reasonably clear, because we have heard them so often explained. But no one hears them for the first time, and certainly to those who first heard them, explanation seems necessary. On their surface they are merely stories of common experience without special significance. Even the disciples did not know what they meant. How much less were the outside groups of listeners able to get at their meaning. It was useless therefore, for the Jews to attempt any accusation against Jesus based on such simple and obvious stories as these. Surely, if he wished to pass his time in entertaining the crowds with commonplaces of this sort there could be no harm done.

Master and Disciples.

But when the Master had dismissed the crowd and was alone with the disciples, he asked them if they knew what he meant by the stories he had told. And when they assured him that they did not, he told them that it was his intention to teach the multitude in terms which they could not understand, even as Isaiah was warned of God that his words would only seem to harden the hearts of the people (Isaiah 6:9). Jesus said to the disciples, "To you, however, is given the right to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God." So he interpreted to them day by day the meaning of the narratives with which he entertained the crowd. And these stories thus told by Jesus in the course of the day's work, were explained by him in the privacy of the evening talk.

It must not be supposed that Jesus told these stories in succession, as they are set down in this chapter. It is the manner of the first Gospel to group the different teachings of Jesus into bodies of material set at definite places in the record of his life. For this reason a group of seven parables is gathered in this one chapter, to illustrate this method of instruction, which was probably used more or less continuously through the remainder of our Savior's ministry. The number of parables that appear in the four Gospels makes clear to us the impression these stories made, for they gripped the minds of their hearers as did almost no other part of the teachings of Jesus.

The Soils.

We usually speak of this first parable, which in some ways is the most familiar of all, as the parable of the Sower; and that indeed is the title of the present study. And yet more accurately might it be called the parable of the soils, for the emphasis is placed not on the sower, and only in a secondary degree upon the seed, but upon the four kinds of soil, which are the important feature of the story. It hardly seems to us that Jesus needed to explain to the disciples that he himself was the divine Sower, scattering everywhere among men the good seed of the kingdom of God, nor that his word of the gospel, the message of the cross, was the seed so sown. Yet no doubt this seemingly obvious part of the parable the disciples needed to have impressed upon their minds. Certain it is that through the centuries the figure of the Son of Man as the Sower of divine seed on human soil has become almost as familiar as the figure of the Good Shepherd.

Nor must it be forgotten that this seemingly slow and unromantic manner of bringing results best of all describes the quiet and persistent ways in which the divine work in the world is always accomplished. Men are always impatient for results. They do not like the slow process of sowing seed and waiting for harvests. They want what they call quick returns, whether in agriculture, commerce or reform. To depend upon the simple and unshowy process of education to bring results to pass seems an unnecessary waste of time. Yet God always works in this slower and more effective way. He is patient where we chafe at delay; he sows the seed and is content to wait for the harvest. And so do those who best understand the divine plan and the divine spirit.

Four Pictures.

The four kinds of soil were explained by Jesus as representing four types of human nature. These give different responses to the work of the divine seed sowing. There are those who, like the soil of the pathway, have natures packed down and hardened by the frequent passage of all kinds of traffic. The heavy wagons of commerce, the light carriages of pleasure, the hurrying feet of ambition and the slow tread of grief have packed down the soil until the seed merely lies upon the surface ready for any passing bird to devour. We know these people in daily life. They are quite unconcerned with religious matters. They have no time for the work of God in the world. Yet their quality is of the best. If that same pathway soil, so hard and packed, could be broken up by the plowshare of sorrow, adversity, conviction or love, what splendid crops might be gathered from it.

Then there are the shallow natures, like the thin covering of soil upon the rocky ground. There is no depth, and the sunshine warms that thin soil earlier than the better ground about it. The seed soon germinates and is hurried into a premature and unenduring life. It cannot abide the storm or the heat, and soon withers away. We know that sort of people. Like the soil, we say they are shallow; they are swept away by emotion and may easily be influenced to join the church. But left to themselves their interest soon subsides; they have no root in themselves, and their goodness is like a morning cloud that passes early away. Yet such characters may sometimes be deepened. Shocks of sorrow may break the stone beneath them and give them deeper natures. Or fresh soil may be swept upon them by some rushing freshet of the spring.

Thorns.

The third soil is that already occupied by noxious seeds. Thorns and thistles have preempted the place. Is there any chance for the good grain to grow here? Only as the thorns are pulled out and the grain is given fuller chance for rooting. Natures of this character have a harder fight by far than those which produce abundant crops of good: and on him who has sowed the evil seeds, whether the man himself by evil habits, or his parents by their sinful life, there falls a heavy burden of responsibility.

At last there is the good soil, deep and rich and free from invading weeds. This soil is not the chance of nature, it is the result of cultivation by the plowshares of discipline, the enrichment of experience and the careful tending of thrift and carefulness. From such a soil the harvest cannot fail to be abundant, for in the kingdom of God there are no mischances of rain and sun, but seed time and harvest come without fail.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

The Yoke of Christ. Matt. 11: 25-30.
Topic June 19.

The "yoke" in its literal and original meaning applies to an instrument put upon draught-cattle. Metaphorically it is used of any burden or bondage: as that of slavery; or of troublesome laws imposed on one. The laws of Moses were frequently thus referred to by the early Christian writers and others who felt that as these laws were being interpreted by. Jewish Rabbi were extremely burdensome. Dropping in with the common usage of the word Jesus applies it to his own teaching and says, "my yoke is easy and my burden is light." The man then who accepts the teachings of Jesus and tries to live in conformity with them takes upon himself the yoke of Jesus.

Although Jesus says that his yoke is easy and his burden is light, we must not expect a life of idleness and freedom from care. Rather he demands that we shall assume responsibility and service. There is no royal road to acceptable discipleship. We must abandon self and go all the way or we are none of his. It is easy in the sense that it gives us a true life-ideal. An ideal that is sure to bring happiness, one that is valuable for all time, that will last through eternity, and one any one can realize in his own life. It is, to use Jesus' own words, "to be "meek and lowly in heart," or as he says in another place the weightier matters "justice, mercy and faith."

Generally speaking in so far as we realize our ideals, i. e. succeed, we are at ease. But our general notion of success is the attainment of personal distinction in a chosen field of activity. But this dooms ninety-nine-one-hundredths of the whole human race to failure. How many of the countless multitudes of the race ever have, or can ever hope to attain to a personal distinction as a financier, an artist, a scientist, a statesman, or a minister? This ideal then must be wrong. It cannot be that in God's world he would doom the many for the sake of glorifying a few. Jesus gave us the proper perspective of life in the ideal to which he calls us, justice, mercy and faith.

Let us not conclude that God would make weaklings of us, or that he would rob us of energy and ambition. To be humble does not deny greatness to us. The humble man does not do his deeds for the world's praise. He asks, "Is it right?" He does not seek to do the little thing in a big way; but he is content to do a big thing in a little way (unobserved) way. He rejoices in it because it is right whether the world knows or cares.

All people, whatever their station in life, can follow this ideal with the hope of success. The poor widow who drudges at the wash tub all week long, through months and years for the sake of feeding, clothing and educating her children, can in that humble and honorable way be as just and kind and God-fearing as the queen on the throne. The man of the shop can go to his daily task with the consciousness that in the very process of his life he is assured of a true and a lasting success. A prince can do no more. Verily his yoke is easy and his burden is light.

Foot-Binding in China

BY EDNA P. DALE.

One of the most common stories as to the origin of this custom is the following: About 1150 B. C. there lived in the king's palace a most beautiful woman by the name of Dan Gi. But her feet were deformed, and, in order to conceal their deformity, she bound them with a piece of white linen and put on beautifully embroidered satin shoes. This greatly pleased the foolish emperor, who doted much on her because of her dainty little feet. Very gradually the practice spread and the custom became established.

Along the Mongolian border the women bind so tightly that they can not stand upon their feet to do their field work, but do it on their knees on which they wear pads to protect them from the damp. When not bound so tightly the women are less helpless than those with very small feet, and sometimes walk for quite long distances, though, to be sure, it is not without suffering. It is not unusual to see one after a walk sitting holding the bound foot in her hands trying to ease the pain by pressure.

The little girl usually has her feet bound at from five to eight years of age, in some places as early as three. All except the large toe are bent under the foot, the bones gradually yielding to the pressure of the bandages. Sometimes the bones of the foot are broken in order to bring the toes under properly. The heel is forced forward in order to shorten the foot. The suffering is intense during the years of the child's growth, as the tightening bandages prevent the natural growth of the foot. The poor child is sometimes beaten and pinched or has needles thrust into her to force her to walk to induce circulation. For there is danger of their becoming diseased because of poor circulation, cold or uncleanliness. Then if not properly cared for the little girl may lose her feet entirely. Such cruelty, harshness and suffering often impairs the child's health, and is truly most demoralizing.

Cruel, harsh unkind—it is all of that, and yet I believe that it is not meant to be so. Let us try to see it from the Chinese mother's standpoint. If ever a people were enslaved to custom it is this nation. "It is custom" is an all-sufficient excuse or assurance for the proper course in any action. For a woman to have her feet bound is custom, therefore it is the thing to do. Then, too, its bearing upon the marriage question is almost an unanswerable argument in favor of its practice, for in China "it is not the face, but the feet' which a man considers in looking for a beautiful wife. This fact accounts for the willingness with which the little girls resign themselves to this torture. If a little girl loses her parents her sympathizing neighbors might be heard to say, "Poor child, she has no one to bind her feer for her."

"It is because we love our little girl that we can not unbind her feet. We want her to marry a respectable man and must bind her feet." a grandmother explained to a lady missionary who was pleading for the child's feet to be unbound.

Abolition of footbinding in China is slowly but surely coming. The wonderful progress of this reform within the last few years has inspired some one to prophesy that in another fifty years a bound foot will be a curiosity. God grant that it may be so. It will be largely due to the influence of Christian missions. Christian schools have become little centers of reform and are doing much to create a sentiment against binding. Contact with Christian civilization, the enlightenment of education, the religion of Jesus Christ is doing for China what laws and commands of emperors and officials proved powerless to do.—Our Young Folks.

A Little Nonsense

THE RETORT COURTEOUS.

The Lady of the House—"I hope you are habitually truthful, Bridget?"

The New Maid—"Yis, mum, I am on me own account. I only tells lies to th' callers, f'r th' missus."—Cleveland Leader.

SUITED NORAH.

Norah had been guilty of what was considered an indiscretion, so the mistress of the house called her to "step the carpet." "If such a thing occurs again, Norah," said the mistress, "I shall have to get another servant!" And Norah said: "I wish yer would—there's easily enough work for two of us!"—New Zealand Free Lance.

PLENTY OF THE REAL DUST.

Western editors delight in publishing little paragraphs like the following: "Nearly seventy states the size of Rhode Island out of Texas." If this sort of thing is kept up much longer, Rhode Island will draw its money from the savings bank, go down there and buy some of those states.—Boston Transcript.

THE STRAWS THAT SHOWED.

DIVINE PROMPTING.

In the early days of Methodism in Scotland a certain congregation, where there was but one rich man, desired to build a new chapel. A church meeting was held. The rich old Scotchman rose and said:

"Brethren, we dinna need a new chapel; I'll give five pounds for repairs."

Just then a bit of plaster falling from the ceiling hit him on the head. Looking up and seeing how bad it was, he said:

"Brethren, it's worse than I thought, I'll make it fifty pun."

"O Lord!" exclaimed a devoted brother on a back seat, "hit 'im again!"—The Interior.

HITTING IT UP.

A guest in a Cincinnati hotel was shot and killed. The negro porter who heard the shooting was a witness at the trial.

"How many shots did you hear?" asked the lawyer.

"Two shots, sah," he replied.

"How far apart were they?"

"'Bout like dis way," explained the negro, clapping his hands with an interval of about a second between them.

"Where were you when the first shot was fired?"

"Shinin' a gemman's shoe in de basement of de hotel."

"Where were you when the second shot was fired?"

"Ah was a passin' de Big Fo' depot."—The Herald and Presbyter.

T. F. Rawlins has been called to remain another year with the church at Phoenix, Ariz.

The Loyal Sons of Fortuna, Cal., have organized a military band of twenty pieces, and expect by autumn to be of great service to the church.

The East Washington convention will be held June 27-30, at Dayton. Plans have been made for the best convention in the history of the state.

F. A. Ross has closed his pastorate with the church at Elkton, Ore., and will again give his time to evangelistic work. He was with this church eighteen months.

The South Idaho convention meets at Payette June 16-20. The churches of the state are releasing their pastors from service on Sunday that they may attend the convention.

Ralph Calloway, who recently offered his resignation as pastor of the church at Atlanta, Ill., has been asked by the board to remain another three months and will do so.

Charles S. Medbury will preach the baccalaureate sermon for the graduates of the North High School, Des Moines, in the University Church, Sunday morning, June 12.

"The Problem of Reconstruction in Christianity" was the theme of a recent evening sermon by Dr. Herbert L. Willett, pastor of the Memorial Church, Chicago.

A "Book Social"—this a social where every one was expected to dress to represent a book—was given a few evenings since by the young people of the Memorial Church, Chicago.

The churches of Tacoma, Wash., have decided to organize a missionary board to consist of the pastors and one member from each church. This constitutes a distinct step in advance.

The Sunday-school of the First Christian Church, Bowie, Texas, gave a fine program Children's Day and was expecting to do its full part for missions. E. A. Hayes, president of Bowie Commercial College is superintendent.

Gov. Harmon made an address to the Berean class of the Nelsonville, Ohio, Sunday-school May 29. There were 447 men present in the class meeting. For the five Sundays of May the class averaged an attendance of 381, and the average attendance at the Sunday-school was 871.

Commencement exercises at Cotner University were from June 3 to June 9. Baccalaureate sermon was by Chancellor W. P. Aylesworth. Commencement day address was delivered by Rev. A. D. Harmon.

The church at Enid, Okla., has extended W. J. Wright a unanimous call to become the permanent pastor of the church, where he has been serving as acting pastor for several weeks. Mr. Wright has not announced his decision.

W. B. Hendershot, evangelist, has just closed a union meeting at Berkeley, Va., in which there were fifty-four additions at the last service, and a total of 284. He says that the membership of the church of the Disciples was doubled by the meeting. He is now at Martinsville, Va.

J. E. Sturgis has been assisting Pastor S. B. Braden in a short meeting at Edon, Ohio. Fourteen grown people united with the church during the two weeks of the services. Mr. Sturgis is commended as a good leader of song and soloist and is now prepared to conduct a Bible-school compaign in connection with meetings.

H. B. Robison is pushing the work at Mobile, Ala., with vigor. Since the first of the year there have been twenty-seven additions to the church. Five hundred dollars have been paid on old debts and as much more is subscribed for the same purpose. Current expenses have been met promptly, and all missionary offerings taken.

F. W. Emerson, pastor of the church at Redlands, Cal., has been chosen as missionary secretary for Southern California, and has closed his work at Redlands. This church has extended a call to H. C. Holmes of Illinois and he has, we understand, accepted.

The church at Pomona, Cal., dedicated a splendid new building the first Sunday in June.

A new church basement has been dedicated by the congregation at Indiana Harbor. The present structure is 81x45 feet, and adequate to the present needs of the congregation. It is expected that the upper part of the building may be added in about two years, and then they will have an auditorium which will seat about seven hundred people.

The Men's Club of the church at Sioux City, Iowa, where J. N. Crutcher is pastor conducts services each Sunday for the little church at Holly Springs, about twenty miles from Sioux City, where the church has not had a regular services for about a year. The men go out in pairs and one of the two speaks at the morning service, the other in the evening.

Commencement day at Hiram College is Thursday, June 16. E. L. Powell of Louisville, will be the speaker of the day. The graduating class includes twenty-eight young people who will receive the bachelor's degree; and three the master's degree. Two young women are to be graduated from the department of music. Hiram invites all her friends everywhere to be present.

The Christian Church of Peoria has had its name in the papers during the last week on account of its building in a day an edifice for the service of a new Sunday-school which is to be organized in another part of the city. The work was done by the men of the church without expense to the organization. Dinner was served by the Ladies' Aid Society of the church and a general good time was had.

The Ohio State Convention met with the Central Church, Toledo, Ohio, last week. Among the interesting items on the program were: The singing of the Netz Sisters, addresses by Prof. G. B. Coler, Ann Arbor, Mich., H. Newton Miller, I. J. Cahill and Prof. Bosworth of Oberlin Seminary. Also I. N. McCash, L. G. Batman, Youngstown, S. J. Corey, President Bates, Peter Ainslie, and others made addresses of interest.

A large company of the ladies of the church at Steubenville, Ohio, recently made a visit to Bethany, Va., to see the old Campbell Homestead. Persons who have lived so far away from these historic scenes as do many of the readers of The Christian Century will wonder why these good people living so near have not gone to these interesting places long ago.

The last Sunday in May was made by the Central Church, Des Moines, a sort of completion of their work for the year. During the remainder of the summer the Sunday-school and morning service will be combined. The chorus choir of the church, concluded its work with the last evening service in May. The evening service was patriotic in nature and the church was appropriately decorated by the ladies of the church.

The First Church, Mobile, Ala., with Harry B. Robinson as pastor, has been engaged in paying off some old debts. In one week they were able to liquidate debt of thirty dollars for preaching, incurred last year; $200 for paving bill, with $41.70, for four years interest on the same making a total of $271.70. They are resolutely setting themselves to the task of clearing up the last of the indebtedness against the church.

The Central Church, Los Angeles, held a reopening service June 5. The morning sermon was by the pastor, E. H. Kellar. In the afternoon there was a union meeting of Christian churches, with three minute addresses by about a dozen pastors and prominent laymen of the local churches. All these addresses were classed under the general heading, "City Evangelism." At the evening service J. N. Smith of the East Side Church was the preacher.

Eureka College commencement will be held June 5 to June 10. The baccalaureate sermon is to be given by Russell F. Thrapp, pastor of the church at Jacksonville, Ill., whose subject is "The Greatest Conquest." Dr. Herbert Martin of New York City will give the commencement address. He has announced as his subject, "Attitudes." Dr. Martin is one of the most thoroughly equipped educators in the brotherhood, and Eureka is to be complimented in securing him for this address. He should be seen more often in the central states.

A. N. Glover, minister of the church at Fullerton, Cal., writes of the successful meeting that has just been held in that church. There were fifty-five additions. John T. Stivers did the preaching, "and his work is of the best and abides." At the close of the meeting a call was made for money for a new church. Pledges to the amount of $6,000 were made at once. Half the amount was given by Mr. C. C. Chapman. A $10,000 house of worship will be built at once. The future of this work is promising.

The commencement exercises of the Christian Temple Seminary, Baltimore, will be held June 12 to 18, at the Christian Temple, Fulton avenue, Baltimore. Peter Ainslie, Dean of the seminary, will preach the baccalaureate sermon Sunday evening, June 12. The commencement address will be given by Rev. George R. Grose, minister of the Grace Methodist Episcopal Church. There are few enterprises in any fellowship more worthy of note than this work of the president of our national convention in the city of Baltimore.

J. N. Johnston has been called to the pastorate of the church at Fostoria, Ohio.

At a cost of $30,000 the University Church, Champaign, Ill., will rebuild, adding 2,000 to its seating capacity.

Melvin Putnam, pastor of the church at Muskogee, Okla., preached the memorial sermon for the local G. A. R.

Three of our leading workers on the Christian Century—Morrison, Taylor and Gates—are enroute to Europe at this writing.

The First Church, Wellsville, Ohio, has extended a unanimous invitation to A. A. Honeywell to become their pastor.

Charles A. Young, Oakland, Calif., will devote a part of his time to holding evangelistic meetings during the coming year.

Austin Hunter, pastor of the Jackson Boul. Church, delivered the commencement address for the College of Medicine and Surgery, Chicago.

Rolla G. Sears, Professor of History in East Central State Normal at Ada, Okla., has started upon an extended travel and study tour through Europe.

S. G. Rothermel, who graduates from Hiram College in June, will take up the work at Muir, Mich., the first of July. The church there will do good work this year. It is ready for business.

O. L. Smith, who has lately accepted a call to the First Church, Emporia, Kansas, was recently called back to his former pastorate at Burr Oak to dedicate their new church building.

Harry G. Rowe has been pastor of the First Christian Church, Danville, Ill., for nearly a year, and so successful has been his work that he is asked to remain at a substantial increase in salary.

The Euclid Ave. Church, Cleveland, Ohio, recently tendered A. F. Hensey and wife a farewell reception on their departure for Africa, and gave them a number of valuable presents to aid them in their work.

Dr. W. T. Moore is already at "Inglenook," Pentwater, Mich. He says, "It is a little cold here, but otherwise it's lovely." Dr. Moore has just been in a three weeks' meeting in Kentucky, preaching twice a day to crowded house—and he is seventy-eight.

The church at Iowa City has spent about $600 in improving its building, and installed a $3,500 pipe organ. All indebtedness is paid and there was a reopening service the first Sunday in June. C. C. Rowlinson is pastor.

Before the fifty-one members of the graduating class of the Joplin, Mo., high school, F. F. Walters preached the baccalaureate sermon, May 22. The house was crowded and many were turned away for lack of room.

Among those who made up the company sailing on Saturday to attend the Edinburgh Missionary Conference were Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Taylor. Mrs. Taylor's home was in Chester, England, where some time will be spent after the convention.

In the First Church, Los Angeles, Calif., A. C. Smither is preaching the following series of sermons: "Man in His Home"; "Man in His Business"; "Man in His Church"; "Man in His Politics"; "The Ideal Man." The services are under the direction of the men's brotherhood of the church.

A young man of more than ordinary singing ability, with competent musical training and some experience in evangelistic singing, would like to arrange with some evangelist for team work in protracted meetings. He can furnish excellent references, and is ready to begin work at any time. Address Singer, Christian Century, Chicago.

G. W. Brown, who has been in Johns Hopkins University doing special work while at home on furlough, has passed his final examination for the degree of doctor of philosophy. This degree will add immensely to his influence with the scholars and with the people of India. Dr. Brown is to be congratulated.

The annual meeting of the Pasadena Christian Church showed all departments in an encouraging condition. There were sixty-one additions to the membership during the year, and $14,300 raised, including $6,000 for general expenses; $4,500 for new pipe organ; $2,000 on the debt, and $1,300 for missions. There are four good Endeavor societies. Plans have been laid for a meeting in the autumn, with H. O. Breeden as evangelist. William C. Hull is minister.

Dr. J. H. Garrison, editor of the Christian Evangelist, was the preacher at the morning service of the Lenox Ave. Church, New York, May 28. This church has just by unanimous vote asked the acting pastor, W. B. Craig, to accept a call to the church for life, and to devote the remaining years of his fruitful ministry to the building up of the cause in the eastern "village." This looks like preparation for a larger day for the work in New York.

It is with regret that we notice in the papers of last week the announcement of the death of A. B. Elliott, pastor of the church at Grand Junction, Colo., for nearly two years past. Mr. Elliott was formerly a student in Drake University, and then for five years held a successful pastorate with the church at Vinton, Iowa. He was a devoted, efficient and faithful pastor. Our sympathies are extended to Mrs. Elliott and their one son in this hour of bereavement.

The men of the First Church, Akron, Ohio, held a banquet a week or two since, at which they had a great quartet of speakers. The speakers and subjects were: L. G. Batman, Youngstown, Ohio, whose subject was "A Man's Man in Religious Work"; R. A. Doan, Nelsonville, "The Berean Bible Class"; W. B. Taylor, Bethany College, "Some Modern Miracles"; and William Spanton, of the local church, who spoken on "Christian Men." George Darsie is the pastor of this live and aggressive church.

Under the attractive title, "Strange, Yet Beautiful Ministries," Rev. George Darsie, pastor of the First Church, Akron, Ohio, is preaching the following series of sermons: "The Ministry of Temptation"; "The Ministry of Tears"; "The Ministry of Want"; "The Ministry of Affliction." On a recent Sunday morning Mr. Darsie asked all the boys of the Sunday school to occupy reserved seats in the center of the church and gave them a special sermon, using as his subject "All That Is Within Me."

Miss Mary A. Johnson, a graduate of Indiana State University and of the school of pastoral helpers, Cincinnati, has been called to the position of pastoral helper in the First Church, Akron, Ohio. Miss Johnson was for five years helper in the First Church, Warren, Ohio, and later served in the same capacity for the Hamilton Ave. Church, St. Louis, Mo. Last year Miss Johnson taught in the high school at Lagoda, Ind., and was elected to the same position for the coming year at an increased salary, but prefers the work with the church. For such assistance there should be an increasing demand among our churches.

At the Lenox Ave. Union Church of Disciples, New York City, W. Bayard Craig preached Sunday morning, June 5, on "The Value of the Small Church." Mr. Courtney Casler, baritone, sang. In the evening the annual children's day exercises were held. The church has requested Dr. Craig to continue his pastorate indefinitely. The congregation has prospered greatly under his leadership in the short time that he has been in New York. Dr. Craig will deliver a series of six addresses at New York state convention of Disciples of Christ, to be held June 28-July 1, at Rochester, N. Y.

The following from the South Denver Tribune indicates the temper of the pastor of the Broadway Church of Christ: Dr. B. B. Tyler presided over a large meeting in the Christian Science Church, Fourteenth an. Logan, and introduced Frank H. Leonard, one of the National Lecturers of the Christian Science Church. Dr. Tyler propounded a series of questions which Mr. Leonard answered. In his introductory remarks the chairman announced that he would have something to say to the public, at an early date, about Christian Science. The first address will be given in the South Broadway Church, Sunday evening, May 29th. The subject will be: "The Christian Science Church." The following topics will be discussed on successive Sunday evenings: June 5: "Sin, Sickness, and Death." June 12: "How to Understand the Bible without the Use of the Christian Science Text Book." June 10: "Christian Science and the Christianity of the Christ."

Dr. and Mrs. Errett Gates were members of the party that sailed on Saturday from Montreal for Europe. Dr. Gates goes on a special mission, to study the beginnings of the movement which eventuated in the work of the Disciples of Christ. He will spend a year in his researches in Scotland, Ireland, England, Holland and Germany. Some weeks ago we called attention to this important mission, for which Dr. Gates is so well fitted by temper and training, and announced that a special fund was being gathered to be used by Dr. Gates in the purchase of important documents for the Disciples' Divinity House Library at the University of Chicago. The responses to this announcement have been gratifying. Dr. Gates hopes to secure some important works which will have great value in the studies of our graduates at the university, as bearing on the history and ideals of the Disciples.

One of the best church buildings in southern Indiana has just been dedicated at Linton, where Mr. Miller, then evangelist of the twelfth district, came a year ago last December to hold a meeting. There were 150 members, about one half of them active. In the meeting there were seventy-eight additions to the church. The current expense budget of the church was raised from $700 per year to $2,000, and plans for a new building were begun. During the year the building was completed and last September Mr. Miller returned for a second meeting. Just before this meeting began, E. O. Tilburn, who was pastor of the church, absconded with several hundred dollars of other people's money. But the church went on with the meeting, and Mr. Miller has remained with the church till the present. At the dedicatory service the last Sunday in May, J. V. Coombs in charge, pledges were taken to cover the entire amount of the indebtedness. There are no wealthy people in the church, but every one gave what he could. In all 250 pledges were made.

Ira C. Smith, recently pastor of the church at Miller, S. D., has accepted a call from the Central Church, Sioux Falls.

Secretary F. M. Rains will dedicate the churches as follows: Atlanta, Indiana, June 26; Robinson, Ky., July 3; Dodge City, Kan., July 10; and Lebanon, Kan., July 17.

Last week a friend in Kentucky gave the Foreign Society $2,500 on the annuity plan. This makes nine gifts from Kentucky this year on this plan, aggregating $11,100.

The total receipts for the Foreign Society from the state of Missouri from June 1, 1909 to June 1, 1910 amouted to $35,289.20. Of this amount the churches as churches, gave $14,845.12, the Sunday-schools $7,468.51, the Endeavor Societies $927.71, and the individual and miscellaneous gifts amounted to $12,-847.86.

The annuity gifts of the Foreign Society for the current missionary year to June 1 amounted to $41,150, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $22,215. It is hoped that these gifts will reach $50,000 at least by September 30, 1910. The total amount received for the Annuity Fund from the first is $367,838. No doubt this fund will soon reach $400,000.

M. Y. Cooper has resigned as treasurer of the Foreign Society, and C. W. Plopper has been elected to succeed him. Mr. Cooper has been one of the most faithful and helpful treasurers that the Society has ever had. His large business experience and good judgment make him a valuable member of the Executive Committe and the Society is fortunate in being able to continue him in its service as vice president. He found it impracticable, if not almost impossible, to look after the numerous and various details of the duties of treasurer. Mr. Plopper has been connected with the Society for almost a decade and has a wide and accurate knowledge of its work. He is a first-class accountant, a man of the highest integrity, and withal has a vital interest in the work.

Miss Edna P. Dale, missionary of the Foreign Society at Wuhu, China, writing under date of April 28, says: "Never in the history of our work in Wuhu has the outlook been so promising. There is a new interest and a spirit of inquiry. For three months we have been holding nightly meetings at our church. Mr. Paul says that he has never seen such meetings in China. The house is nearly always full and these men will sit for two or three hours listening attentively, sometimes interrupting to ask questions. After the audience is dismissed thirty or forty remain to inquire further. The same ones come night after night, an intelligent class of men, many of them from the largest shops in the city." It will be remembered that the Christian Temple, Baltimore, Md., Peter Ainslie, minister, supports Miss Edna P. Dale at Wuhu, and the Broadway Church, Lexington, Ky., contributes $600 annually for the support of the work in Wuhu. This church supported T. J. Arnold as their missionary until his death. It has loyally continued its help for the expansion of the work since he was called to higher service.

According to the publisher of the Chicago city directory, there has been a greater exodus of people from the city into the suburbs during the last year than ever before in the history of the city. He says: "The advantages and attractions of the suburban residence, especially for the man with small children, draws him out to where there is sunshine and air, and no danger of accidents. The improved transportation facilities have had a great deal to do with this. A man can live in the suburbs and get to the city with as much ease and comfort as he could when living in the city. Living is just as cheap outside the city limits as in town."

The Standard Oil Company has increased the wages of its workmen from 6 to 10 per cent. The order is retroactive, and became effective May 1. It is estimated that the company will add from $6,000,000 to $10,000,000 to its annual pay roll expense. The new scale affects employes engaged in the company's works and factories, but the office men will not be benefited by this increase. Most of the employes who will get the increase are laborers, and the advance applies to all the subsidiary companies in the United States. The company has approximately 70,000 employes.

We have received from President E. V. Zollars of Oklahoma Christian University, the preliminary announcement of an educational congress of the Disciples to be called some time during the coming summer to discuss matters pertaining to our educational work. Such themes as ministerial supply, the securing of larger patronage for our schools, the matter of endowment, and other topics of interest will be discussed. It is thought that the gathering may be held in August. Such a meeting would be of value if a suitable attendance can be secured. The summer is an excellent time, so far as the calendar of educational work is concerned, but unless a meeting of this character is called sufficiently far in advance to fall in with the vacation plans of the college men, it is likely to be limited in attendance.

The following note from the Messenger of the Memorial Church, Chicago, indicates a significant movement among our better churches: "For some time past it has been felt that the services of an educational expert would be of great advantage in all departments of our church work, and especially in the Bible school. We have now secured Rev. Arthur J. Hall, recently pastor of the First Baptist Church of Pottsville, Pa., and now connected with the department of Religious Education at the University of Chicago. Mr. Hall will give particular attention to teaching training, Sunday school management, the educational features of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, the Men's League, the Whatsoever Circle, the Olympic Club and other departments of the church. He will also supply the pulpit during the vacation season. At present the class for instruction in teacher-training and religious education will meet on Wednesday evening at 7:15 and on Sunday evening at 6 o'clock. All teachers and officers of the Sunday school will wish to be in regular attendance upon this class, and an earnest invitation is extended to parents and others, whether members of the church or not, to attend these interesting an dinstructive meetings."

Edgar DeWitt Jones, pastor of the First Christian Church of Bloomington, Ill., has spent a few days in Idlewild, Ky., prior to a trip abroad. He is one of a party of six Bloomington people, who left New York via S. S. "Caledonia," Saturday, June 4, arriving at Londonderry on June 11. On the 14th Mr. Jones parts with the company for one week, during which time he will attend the World's Missionary Conference at Edinburgh, being one of the fourteen delegates selected from the Disciples in America. Following the conference, a number of weeks will be spent by his party, which he rejoins, in visiting points of historic and literary interest in portions of England and Continental Europe. From Paris, they go direct into the German empire, passing through the picturesque Rhine and Swiss regions enroute to Rome and Naples, from which last place the return voyage will be begun July 29, arriving in New York August 10. A Bible school rally was planned for May 22 which partook of the nature of a farewell to the pastor until his return in the fall. This proved to be the great Bible school rally the church has ever held. The total number present was nearly eight hundred. Seven hundred and fifty was the mark aimed at, but the interest and enthusiasm in the occasion carried the attendance to nearly eight hundred. Words expressive of the congregation's appreciation of Mr. Jones were spoken by Dr. Sitherwood, president of the brotherhood class. To these, Mr. Jones responded briefly and feelingly. The church will be in charge of the assistant pastor, George R. Southgate, during his absence.

A large banquet was given by the 1,850 members of Chicago Methodist Social Union in honor of the eighteen bishops of the church who were in the city to attend their annual conference. Former Vice President Fairbanks was one of the speakers. The general theme of the bishops and Mr. Fairbanks was "Missions and the Missionary Movement," and all made a strong plea for free support by church and laity for missions.

A Year's Work in One Quarter

The University High School of the University of Chicago in its work of the Summer Quarter is unique, in that the work of an entire year is accomplished during the Summer Quarter in each subject with full credit. This is made possible by holding meetings of each class twice daily. Opportunity is thus offered to students who need to complete one or two units for admission to college or for promotion to another class in high school. There are also in attendance a considerable number of teachers who desire to review high-school subjects which they are teaching or to secure credit for university standing. Courses are offered in Latin, English, History, Mathematics, Physics, Physiography, and Manual Training.

May a Great Month

The receipts of the Foreign Society are still climbing up. The friends will be glad to have this good word.

At the beginning of May we asked the churches to help us reach $25,000 for the month, a gain of about $7,000 over May, 1909. The friends did even better! The receipts for the month amounted to $28,242.-02, a gain of $10,389.60. It is also most gratifying to be able to report that the receipts from the churches as churches, amount to $14,803, a gain over May last year of $3,445.

Ada, Ohio

Many of our brethren and friends throughout the United States will be glad to hear of the fine success which the Church of Christ in this university center is enjoying under the ministry of Clarence Mitchell.

For many years the school was owned by a stock company of Disciples during which period our people were in the ascendency. Ten years ago the school was purchased by the Methodists and as a result about 80 per cent of the students who come here are from the Methodist families. Notwithstanding these great odds Brother Mitchell by his scholarly preaching has built up audiences second to none in the town, and has reecived as many new members as the Methodists.

Another of the converts was a successful newspaper man before entering the university where he is taking advanced work. He expects to enter the ministry. Another of the young men in the school who is fitting himself for the ministry last week won the first prize in the oratorical contest. It has been my happy privilege for many years to teach every Sunday morning a large class of young men and women from the university.

President Taft will be here on June the third to deliver the class address at the college. We are expecting several thousand visitors on that day.

We have a splendid brick building that seats about 1,500. There are representatives in the church from half a dozen members of the faculty. Dr. Lehr, the founder of the school lives here and is a member of the church.—J. G. PARK, Ohio Northern University.

Mrs. Harper to Lay Cornerstone

It has been decided that at the laying of the cornerstone of the Harper Memorial Library at the University of Chicago on June 14, Mrs. Harper, the widow of the late president, will handle the trowel as the stone is swung into place. A brief address will be delivered by Dr. Ernest DeWitt Burton, emphasizing the individual and personal side of President Harper's life, to be followed by one from Clement Andrews, Librarian of the Crerar Library, who has already been announced as the speaker on the subject of the library itself.

Wisconsin

Both the First and Second Churches of Milwaukee are in search of capable men. They each have the "right" one on the string. We are feeling bigger in Milwaukee than we ever did,—judging by the expressions of a determination to do bigger things.

Evangelists Nay and Davis have been compelled to postpone their meetings at Waupun and Ladysmith on account of sickness.

The work at Richland Center is in fine condition.

The work at Readstown was greatly strengthened by the meeting recently held by J. Sig Stone. The brethren there speak in the highest terms of his work.

Claire L. Waite and wife are assisting at Rib Lake in a most promising meeting. One confession at last report.

The work at Viroqua, where P. C. McCallum, ministers, is on a continual upgrade.

We are planning for quite an extensive evangelistic campaign in the southwest part of the state in August. We will probably hold meetings at West Lima, Bloom City, Sabin, Werley, Lynxville. We may establish the work at other points. We have the opportunity of being the leading people in all that country.

The writer will be with the church at Waupun, June 5.

Immediately following our visit to Waupun, we will begin a meeting with Brother Goodnight and the brethren at Hickory.

FRANK L. VAN VOORHIS, Cor. Sec.

Doings in the Alamo City

Disciples of San Antonio are waking up to the best work in their history. A few months ago we had but one church in the Alamo city, a place of 120,000. Since the first of the year, two new plants have been established. The two properties are worth over $6,000, most of which has already been paid. They are located in two of the choicest residence sections of the city. Their buildings, already complete, are substantial and adequate to their present needs. Both of them give promise of splendid development into great plants in the near future. The writer and wife have given their services in behalf of their establishment since the first of the year, and have just turned the pastorate over to L. H. Harbord. He is on the ground now, and at work.

San Antonio is the metropolis of a section larger than any state in the union, and our work there is the key to our work in Southwest Texas. We ought to soon have several other churches in the city. Rev. Hugh McLallan, lately from Kentucky, the new pastor of the Central Church, is getting hold of the hearts of the people nicely. He, with his congregation, are planning large things. Their response has been excellent in behalf of the new work in the city, which is established on a harmonious, co-operative, uniform mission basis. They are determined that the extreme absolutely independent idea, emphasized in some citizens, shall not retard the work there. Hence, larger things may be expected from this splendid field of possibilities.

W. A. BOGGESS,
Sta. A., Dallas. State Evangelist.

Victory in Brooklyn

Sunday, May 29, closed a profitable meeting for the Humboldt St. Church. Thirty-four answered the call of Christ. Twenty came by baptism and ten by statement and four came but have not yet been baptized because of outside influences. These we hope to lead into full obedience later.

Brother H. F. Lutz, evangelist for the American Christian Missionary Society, conducted the meeting. Brother Lutz believes "the gospel is the power of God unto salvation." He preaches it as the only power to save man. His clear scriptural preaching each night was of great value to the church, and gave to the community a better understanding of our position and work.

Brother Wm. Leigh of Akron, Ohio, had charge of the singing. Brother Leigh is well qualified in mind, heart and voice for his chosen work. His splendid service added greatly to the success of the meeting.

During the meeting both Jews and Gentiles were reached by the gospel. The meeting demonstrates the possibility to strengthen and build up the church in this congested foreign section of our city. It was a joy and privilege to have fellowship in the work. The multitudes listened to the gospel message as it was preached on the street corners and at the church, with interest. Truly the "old, old story" has lost none of its attractiveness to the masses in our cities.

The results of the meeting are not only seen in the thirty-four desisions for Christ, but in the help, inspiration and encouragement given to the church to go forward in the work of winning this section of the city for Christ. We face the work before us with greater faith in Christ and in the power of the truth. No work is of greater importance today than the redemption of the cities of our land. Here the church must be strengthened, here the power of the gospel proven and the church tested. May the Disciples of Christ rise to the splendid opportunity now before them and make their influence for righteousness felt in the great centers of our nation's life.

Follow the International Lesson Committee

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine month or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

Illinois Third District Convention

The Third District Convention held at Rock Island, May 24-26 was a great success in every way. Pastor McFarland and his good people surely know how to entertain and they did it most loyally.

The program was a feast of good things in both C. W. B. M. and District sessions. Everybody on the program "made good." The music under the direction of the Camp Point Ladies' Quartette was a great feature and a delight to all who were present.

The reports in general were very encouraging. Our District Worker, J. D. Williams is doing a splendid work among our weaker churches, and is organizing our forces for greater things.

The following officers were chosen: President, H. J. Reynolds, Camp Point; Vice-President, I. G. Huff, La Harpe; Secretary, A. I. Zeller, Cuba. Advisors, J. A. Barnett, Galesburg; A. M. Hale, Macomb.

After a very refreshing and delightful "Joy Ride" seeing things of interest in Rock Island, Moline, and Davenport, Ia., under direction of our genial "conductor" McFarland, who donned the conductor's cap and collected the fare on the special car the convention adjourned to meet in Macomb, 1911.

A. I. ZELLER.

Commencement of Campbell-Hagerman College

The closing exercises of this vigorous and prosperous institution for the higher education of girls and young women, covered the week from May 19, to May 26, inclusive, beginning with recitals given by the pupils of the Schools of Music and Expression.

The baccalaureate services were held Sunday evening, May 22, in the Central Christian Church in the presence of an audience which filled the handsome and spacious auditorium to its utmost capacity. The pastor, Rev. I. J. Spencer preached the sermon for the graduating class using as a text the first clause of the first verse of the twenty-third Psalm, "The Lord is my shepherd," and emphasizing these three thoughts, the character of the shepherd, the personality of the revelation indicated by the word "my," and the obligation of serving as a faithful under shepherd, growing out of this relationship, as indicated by the charge given by Christ to Peter in that mystic interview by the sea, "Feed my sheep."

The sermon was a heart-to-heart talk, rather than a formal address and was full of affectionate admonition, of instruction on the deeper things of the spiritual life, and of revelation and interpretation of the very heart of the Gospel, a class of preaching in which Mr. Spencer excels, which suggests to the hearer always in its spiritual tone and quality, the "beloved disciple," and places Mr. Spencer in the front rank as a pulpit power and a leader in the onward movement of the Kingdom of God.

On Tuesday morning, May 24, occurred the exercises of Class Day, which, running through all the chords of sentiment from gay to grave and back again, proved to be wonderfully brilliant and interesting, radiant with the charm of youthful humor and fragrant with the sweetness and joy of innocent, maidenly hearts.

The commencement exercises proper were held in the opera house, Wednesday morning, May 25, in the presence of an appreciative audience of the refined, highly cultured citizens of the Blue Grass capital and the surrounding region, supplemented by many visitors from other sections of the state and from other states, patrons and friends of the college.

The address to the graduating class was delivered by Rev. George H. Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Church of Christ, Kansas City, Mo. Mr. Combs is what may be called a "practical idealist," and to say that his address was rich in deepest thought, sweet and tender in sentiment, beautiful and graceful in diction, ful to the brim of helpful, practical instruction, evincing a wide range of learning in the fields of literature and philosophy, and was delivered in the speaker's superbly effective style, would be to tell a twice-told tale to such as have ever heard this prince among poet-preachers, this master of the art of pulpit oratory.

At the close of this masterful address, Pres. George P. Simmons, after a few parting words of counsel and farewell to the graduates, announced the honor students in the senior class, Miss Lemmie Hester and Miss Emma Mountjoy sharing the first honor, Miss Florence Harney and Miss Mary West the second honor, and Misses Bella Withers, Henrietta Irby and Nelle Shaw receiving honorable mention. This was followed by the presentation of medals for superior work done in the various departments, of certificates to such pupils as had completed the work in any special school, and of diplomas to the fifteen members of the graduating class.

Thus was brought to a close the seventh annual session of Campbell-Hagerman College, which, though the youngest of our schools for the higher education of young women, has from the very first ranked among the oldest and best in the completeness of its equipment, in the size and character of its student body, and in the quality and range of the work accomplished.

May the Best Month

The total receipts for eight monthhs of the current missionary year, that is, from October 1, 1909 to June 1, 1910, amount to $160,076, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $23,327.

We are encouraged by these generous gains to hope that we will even surpass last year's receipts, which were exceptionally large, as the result of the great contennial enthusiasm.

We must remember constantly the growing work and that some of the missionaries and their friends are actually suffering for the simplest comforts of life.

Now for a great record for June. Last year the receipts for this month were $53,590. It is perfectly reasonable to expect not less than $60.000 during June this year. To this end we ask the aid of every friend who is interested in the spread of the gospel over the earth.

F. M. Rains, Sec'y.,

Eureka Endowment

The month of May was one of the best months we have had in this campaign for the endowment of Eureka College. We raised $5,050 during this month, and found a number of poeple who are considering the matter quite favorably.

Our fund has now reached $50,000. While we are trying to pull this proposition through by September 1, 1910, it is ffuite generally understood that we have a year's extension of time. In other words, we have fifteen months before we are out of court. An average of $5,000 a month will bring us over the line, and this is the mark we have set for ourselves. Each month we do not have that amount will be written down as a disappointment and as a partial failure.

Eureka, Ill. H. H. Peters.

Anglo-American Conference

The arrangements are practically complete for the Conference which is to be held in Caxton Hall, London, England, July 4 and 5. The four sessions are to be devoted wholly to Christian Union and the speakers have been drawn from various denominations. Rev. C. Sylvester Horne, M. P., will represent the Congregationalists, Prebendary Webb-Peploe the Established Church, Dr. W. L. Watkinson the Wesleyans, and Rev. T. E. Ruth the Baptists. These are all strong speakers. One will speak at each session and one of our own people from the United States will speak at each session. These brethren are J. H. Garrison, Errett Gates, A. McLean and C. C. Morrison. These brethren can be trusted to sound a clear note, not marred by any manifestation of narrow sectarianism, nor yet muffled by any disloyalty to the truth.

"Stereopticon views and illustrated songs! A tour of the Dark Continent tonight at 8 o'clock in the open air! Corner Lawrence Ave. and Leavitt St. FOLLOW THE CROWD!!"

THE above and similar other calls thrilled the air for many blocks as two men marched up and down the streets announcing, through a large red megaphone, the open-air meetings that were held every night, except Saturday, for three successive weeks in a quiet neighborhood of West Ravenswood, Chicago.

The effect upon the little community was magical, and from the very first the people gathered in such large crowds from all directions, that it was not difficult to "follow the crowd." All were filled with speculation as to just what the character of the "Picture Show" would be, but most people suspected that another "medicine company" had come to town. So it was, but instead of passing out "roots and herbs," a little company of Christian workers literally led the masses to the Great Physician who not only "healeth all our diseases," but who taketh away the underlying cause, "the sin of the world."

Whole families attended the services night after night, and hundreds were reached who had never before attended real gospel meetings. One woman was heard to say in a surprised tone of voice: "Why, I thought these people were against God." Souls were born into the Kingdom and some were filled with the Holy Spirit and labored earnestly for the salvation of others.

Through these services the whole community came to know the ministers and Christian workers in a manner that opened their hearts and homes to them, and to an extent that could not have been effected by many years of earnest toil in the ordinary method. It is really the Lord's own way of reaching the masses.

Jesus says: "Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men." Will you follow Him into the open air this Summer?

Laymen's Missionary Movement.

Coöperative Missionary Committees should write at once for plans for Educational Missionary Campaigns. We have one of the most effective means of Missionary Education. We not only reach the masses, but we reach the men and reach the heart. The watchword of the times is—"I want to know"——"I'm from Missouri—I want to be shown." That is Our business.

Illinois Notes

The LeRoy Church, R. D. Brown, pastor, has let the contract for a new and commodious building.

The third district convention was held with the Rock Island church. J. D. Williams, district evangelist, reported that he had visited nineteen churches, preached 168 sermons, made 531 calls, held twelve meetings, and had brought into the body thirty-six additions. He also delivered a very practical convention address. H. J. Reynolds was elected president and A. I. Zeller was re-elected secretary.

The new building at Macomb, A. M. Hale, is coming on well and it is a good one.

The Moline mission has called W. B. Slater and he has begun work.

A preacher should not earn his living in one state while he lives in another; that is, when he moves from one state to another he should take his affections with him. Also, he should transfer his loyalty when he removes, and get in with the brethren and the organized interests of the state to which he goes. This is asking only a square deal.

The Peoria brethren will no doubt tell the story of a church built in a day. It is a good story, and true.

J. FRED JONES, Secretary.

Missouri Men, Attention!

The Missouri state convention will be held at Jefferson City, June 17-22. The brotherhood session begins Wednesday, the 22nd. at 1 o'clock, and lasts through the evening. A splendid program has been provided, in which every phase of brotherhood work will be discussed. There will be inspiring talks, rousing songs and great speeches. At 4:30 a reception will be given by the Jefferson City brotherhood, and at 5 o'clock a banquet, presided over by an active business man. The closing session will be addressed by men of national reputation. Every church in Missouri ought to be represented at this great gathering. Texas had five hundred at its recent convention and Ohio is planning to have a thousand at Toledo. Missouri should not be behind her sister states in brotherhood work and enthusiasm. Let every church prepare to send at least one delegate, and churches adjacent to Jefferson City send their whole brotherhoods, and let us make this the greatest session of the convention, and "show them" that we realize the worth of this youngest and most vigorous child of the church.

Bethany College Commencement

The Sixty-ninth Annual Commencement of Bethany College will be held June 5 to 9. The session just closing has been, in many respects, the most prosperous the college has ever known. The enrollment is the largest in the history of the institution. During the year subscriptions to the endowment fund were secured amounting to $160,000. Extensive improvements are being made upon the college campus, and $6,000 has been donated by Mr. Earl W. Oglebay and others for this purpose. In addition to the orations which will be delivered by the chosen members of the graduating class on Thursday, June 9, commencement day proper, Governor William E. Glasscock, of West Virginia, and Senator George T. Oliver, of Pittsburg, will deliver addresses. Music for commencement week will be furnished by Meister's band, of Wheeling. The commencement season will open Sunday morning, June 5, at 11 a. m., when the baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class of fifty-two young men and women will be preached in the Bethany Church by President Thomas E. Cramblet. At 7:30 in the evening the annual sermon will be delivered by J. A. Lord, editor of the Christian Standard, Cincinnati, Ohio.

The last chapel services of the session will be held at 3:30 p. m., Monday, June 6. At this service farewells will be spoken by the president and members of the faculty. In the evening at 8 p. m., the annual contest of the American and Neotrophian literary societies will be held.

Tuesday, June 7, at 9:30 a. m., field day exercises will be held on the athletic field. At 3 p. m., the trustees of the college will hold their annual meeting. At 8 p. m., the Earl Wilfly Oratorical contest, in which eight young men from the Junior and Senior classes will contest for gold prizes offered by Mr. Earl Wilfly. T. E. CRAMBLETT.

Encouraging Reports from the Field

(To the F. C. M. S.)

Last evening we took the offering for home missions, and I am sending you the amount received, which was 18.10. This offering comes from the Christian church at Drain, Ore., and is nearly three times as large as that of last year.—Roy L. Dunn, Pastor, Eugene, Ore.

Find enclosed draft for 20, the amount of the home mission collection in the First Church, Central City, Neb. This is nearly four times the offering of last year.—Wm. Hoagland, Treas.

Herein find check for the sum of 14 for home missions from the scattered few brethren at this place. Hoping it may do much good for the cause of Christ in our home land where it is much needed.—Mrs. M. E. Brown, Madison Sta., Miss.

We have about 60 pledged for home missions and some of it collected. Just as soon as I get it in will forward same. Thought you would like to know.—J. P. Duthie, Pullman, Wash.

Please find enclosed postoffice money order for 3, first offering for home missions by the South Side Christian Church, just established as a mission. They want to be in line for every good work.—W. A. Boggess, State Evangelist, San Antonio, Texas.

I am enclosing draft for $57.87, the offering of the First Church at Abilene, Kan., to American work. This is the largest we have ever sent and the easiest secured. We had 115 contributors.—Clifford A. Cole, Minister.

Enclosed find remittance of $18.65 as the offering of the church at this place. To the best of my knowledge, this is the largest offering ever made by our congregation to home missions. The giving was general, and I think that a large proportion of our people had fellowship in this act of service.—Chas. W. Perry, Pastor, Quaker City, Ohio.

I enclose herewith $13 in part payment of the amount subscribed last Sunday for the work the A. C. M. S. is doing. Our people are generally poor and we have recently built a new church building, and the amount we send you represents a sacrifice upon the part of those who gave to this work. We shall always appreciate the work of the society, on account of the help we have received from it. Now that we have become self-supporting, we shall endeavor to increase our offering from year to year and hope sometime in the near future to be able to be a Living Link church.—J. W. Ingram, Treasurer, Altus, Ark.

A Storekeeper Says:

"A lady came into my store lately and said:

"'I have been using a New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove all winter in my apartment. I want one now for my summer home. I think these oil stoves are wonderful. If only women knew what a comfort they are, they would all have one. I spoke about my stove to a lot of my friends, and they were astonished. They thought that there was smell and smoke from an oil stove, and that it heated a room just like any other stove. I told them of my experience, and one after another they got one, and now, not one of them would give hers up for five times its cost.'"

The lady who said this had thought an oil stove was all right for quickly heating milk for a baby, or boiling a kettle of water, or to make coffee quickly in the morning, but she never dreamed of using it for difficult or heavy cooking. Now—she knows.

Do you really appreciate what a New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove means to you? No more coal to carry, no more coming to the dinner table so tired out that you can't eat. Just light a Perfection Stove and immediately the heat from an intense blue flame shoots up to the bottom of pot, kettle or oven. But the room isn't heated. There is no smoke, no smell, no outside heat, no drudgery in the kitchen where one of these stoves is used.

Cautionary Note: Be sure you get this stove—see that the name-plate reads "New Perfection."

THE BETHANY GRADED SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

INTERNATIONAL COURSE

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR

Purpose—The purpose of the Graded Lessons is: To meet the spiritual needs of the pupil in each stage of his development. The spiritual needs broadly stated are these:

1. To know God as he has revealed himself to us in nature, in the heart of man, and in Christ..... 2. To exercise toward God, the Father, and his Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, trust, obedience, and worship..... 3. To know and to do our duty to others..... 4. To know and do our duty to ourselves.

COURSES	Age of Pupils	AIM	PUBLICATIONS
BEGINNERS		To lead the little child to the Father by helping him: 1. To know God, the heavenly Father, who loves him, provides for, and protects him. 2. To know Jesus the Son of God, who became a little Child, who went about doing good, and who is the Friend and Saviour of little children. 3. To know about the heavenly home. 4. To distinguish between right and wrong. 5. To know his love for God by working with him and for others.	Lessons prepared by FRANCES W. DANIELSON

The Curriculum Outlined Above Furnishes a Comprehensive Course of Religious Instruction

Comprising as it does not only the biographies, history, literature, and teachings of the Bible, but also lessons on the history and heroes of the Christian Church, of missionary enterprises, philanthropic movements, and moral reforms.

In order that the truths taught may be assimilated and the spirit and qualities of Christian character developed, various forms of self-expression are suggested, beginning with simple hand-work done by the little child, and culminating in important lines of Christian service possible to young men and women.

The series of lessons for each year begins in October, and the work that is essential to the completion of the aim and the integrity of the course as a whole, is found in the nine months corresponding to the public school year—October to June. The lessons for the remaining three months of each year are valuable in themselves, and either supplement the work of the preceding months, or prepare for that of the following year.

The courses for each grade or year are permanent and will be available for use in the same grade with successive classes each year.

The Lessons for the Summer Quarter beginning July 3, will prepare the school for the greatly enriched course beginning October 1. Send today for order blanks and samples.

Strange as it may appear at first glance, the value of the rubbish collected in New York City last year was $234,000, according to the figures of the state department of health. Of this sum $16,000 was received from bottles and $25,000 for grease. One million cubic yards of asphalt were used in building operations in New York City last year. The average city must dispose of ashes to the amount of two pounds a day for every individual in the city, or two tons a year for a family of five, the report shows.

Canada is becoming one of the best customers of the United States. Exports of domestic merchandise from this country to Canada during the first ten months of the current fiscal year were greater by $45,000,000 than in the same period of the previous year, while the total increase in exports to all parts during the same period was only $55,000,000. The value of the exports to Canada during the first ten months of the present fiscal year was $174,500,000. The increase was largely in manufactured articles.

The Mystery of Mind

What Shall We Expert from Mental Healing?

We have more than once of late adverted to the astonishing interest which as been manifest in the cure of diseases by mental means. It is one of the interesting phenomena of our generation.

It has awakened a considerable interest, sometimes friendly and sometimes hostile, on the part of the medical fraternity. It has attracted some slight measure of attention from the authorities on psychology.

It has organized several different cults, undertaking with more or less success to cure diseases by means of suggestion. It has even awakened the interest of some sections of the church with the result that many ministers are studying the subject with the feeling that it is one of the imbportant problems of the time, and a few have even gone the length of declaring it to be the legitimate work of the church to undertake the cure of disease.

Some of these last, notably those connected with the Emanuel movement, have actually organized clinics for the practice of psycho-therapeutics.

At such a time it seems almost necessary that those who wish to be inteligent Christians should have some fair knowledge of a subject that has awakened so much interest in our generation.

The causes of this interest we need hardly mention again. They lie, of course, almost wholly in the two fields of our increasing sensitiveness to pain in modern times, and the concern awakened in the attempt to banish disease as an actual triumph of the modern world of science and adventure over one of the ills which have long afflicted the world.

Either one of these motives would be sufficient to produce such manifestation of interest as we have seen of late. Men, and particularly women, have just become aware that human life is afflicted in painful and demoralizing ways by disease. They are resenting its presence as an intrusion into the domain of ordered and enjoyable living.

No earlier generation took this view. It is the resentment which follows such a discovery that has made many people eager to test whatever values may lie in the field of mental control as a solvent of pain.

Then too, as before remarked, the mere love of exploration and adventure has led many in our time into this romantic and unexplored field. It is not surprising that the reports that come back from these adventurous spirits are sometimes fascinating, sometimes measurably convincing, and sometimes quite unbelievable. It was ever so in the field of pioneering. The first travelers who venture into an uncharted land rarely bring back authentic and trustworthy accounts.

The explorers are more concerned to make an impression by the daring character of their recitals than to recount the explicit facts; or they are so much under the spell of the new experiences upon which they come, that they rarely have the judicial temper to relate the facts without bias.

The advocates of mental healing, under whatever one of a variety of names they may choose to be known, are coming to be a considerable body. As Christian Scientists, Divine Healers, believers in the healing powers of hypnotism, as mesmerists, theosophists, spiritualists and students of the occult generally, they have long proclaimed the possibility of achieving victory over physical infirmities by means which were neither physical, medical nor surgical.

The fact that so considerable a number of people are the convinced adherents of one or another of these cults, which in so far as they practice the arts of healing all make use of the same basic principle, makes the subject one of interest to all informed persons. And furthermore, the fact that so much of this work of mental healing is related by its devotees to some form of religious experiences makes it all the more reasonable that the informed Christian should try to come into possession of such facts at least as are accessible to one who does not aspire to become a specialist.

But just at the threshold of this interesting inquiry one is met by two significant facts, the attitude of the physicians and the psychologists respectively.

These men, it would be supposed, should know the truth or falsity of the claims so freely made by the different groups of mental healers. If any body of expert opinion is to be trusted, surely it would be that representing these two schools of supposedly competent and unprejudiced specialists.

The surprise of the bystander is therefore great when he discovers that the voice of the medical profession upon this great theme is so confused as to be wholly untrustworthy, and that the psychologists with the rarest exceptions have avoided, as if in affright, the entire region of psycho-therapeutics.

To be sure, the doctors represent various schools and points of view with reference to the art of healing. Yet there seems to be no clear line drawn between the various schools of medical practice on this question of psychic cure. It appears to be a matter wholly of personal bias on the part of the individual physician.

Some there are who have become converts to the view that mind and not medicine is the real healing agent. Such men have at least to a small extent gone over to the ranks of psycho-therapy, and are substituting suggestion for serums and surgery.

Others are hospitable to the principle of mental healing, and make such use of it as seems wise in their regular practice of medicine. Probably consciously or unconsciously most physicians use this expedient. There are few who are so blind to the values of mental stimulation as not to employ the arts of encouragement and optimism to assist in the work of healing.

But there are some physicians, and probably their total number is very large, who are pronounced, insistent and incorrigible foes of the entire system of psychic healing.

Some of them are skeptics as to the value of any such means in the treatment of the sick. Others have a class prejudice against any who follow the healing art by another path than their own. Others still have seen the evil results of some ill-directed and foolish attempts at mental cure, and believe that harm is the usual outcome of such efforts. One must be willing to grant that the attitude of many physicians seems thoroughly prejudiced and inconsistent with the claim to be servants of truth, and willing to look at all the facts.

Still more significant is the attitude of the experts on mental phenomena. Every authority on psychology is of course compelled to deal in some manner with experiences which are the basis of most of the claims of the psychic healers. The power of the mind to influence the body, the effect of suggestion, the results of morbid states of mentality, the phenomena of hypnotism and trance, all fail to be considered and diagnosed by the psychologists.

Yet it is surprising with what shyness this frontier of the mind's life is approached. It would seem as if there had been formed an unwritten covenant among these scholars to say nothing upon one of the phases of the subject most in the public mind today. Is there a feeling on their part that the extent to which charlatanism has flourished in that region is a sufficient excuse for the reserve which they maintain in relation to it?

Do they feel that it is not quite a dignified procedure to abandon the familiar fields of investigation, such as the structure of the nervous system, the revelation of mental activities to the physical organism, and the various states and activities of the mind in its normal workings, for so mysterious and unknown a domain as that of psycho-therapeutics?

In the meantime it is clear that few people have any adequate conception of what an ally the mind may become in the search for calmness, quietness, serenity and health. One may be unwilling to go to what seems the fantastic length of the enthusiasts on the subject of mental healing, and still be aware that new truth is breaking out from the experience of our generation and that in no small degree the sufferings from nervousness, fear and even more serious disorders may be greatly reduced, if not entirely removed by the proper use of the mind through practice.

Those who have attempted the work of self-control in this field, and have so disciplined their minds as to co-operate with the laws of nature in building up health and combatting disease, are astonished and encouraged by the results they obtain.

To say that such control is impossible to the average person, because the effort has been made without results on some specific occasion, is like saying that an unpracticed student has tried to play the piano with the most satisfactory outcome. Practice here, as everywhere else, is the key to success.

To absolutely decide upon a mental attitude of quietness, fearlessness, trust in God, and good will towards all men, is the first step towards the attainment of health of mind and of body. Other steps will follow this, but for most of the people of our generation even this small gain is like an awakening to new life.

The state of Illinois is at present passing through a period of humiliation unequalled in her history, and but rarely approached by any of her sister states. William Lorimer, a man who has been a persistent office-seeker during all his public life, and who is never known to have worked at any business save that of office-getting and office-holding, and yet has amassed by some means or other a fortune of considerable proportions, was elected a year ago to the United States senate. The election was so manifestly the result of bribery and trickery that great suspicions were aroused at that time. Gov. Deneen was importuned to take the senatorship, which manifestly lies in the direct and legitimate pathway of his ambitions, but the conditions to which he would have been compelled to submit in accepting it were such that not for a moment would he consider the step. In spite of this fact, Lorimer seems to have deliberately set about the purchase of the position for himself, although his identification with disreputable political methods in the state has been notorious. He was elected by a combination of republican and democratic votes that was on its very face eloquent of corruption. Recently under the inquisition of States Attorney Burke, one after another of the legislators implicated in the plot has confessed the crimes and named the sums paid for the votes, In the face of this over-whelming evidence Mr. Lorimer has had the affrontery to add to his burden of public scorn by an attempt to throw the blame of his scandalous election upon his friends and his enemies alike, in which latter class Gov. Deneen has the good fortune to be placed. A man of less density of moral perception would rid the state and nation of the incubus of his official crimes by instant resignation. Failing in this, the senate ought to take the most summary measures to rid itself of so unspeakable a plague spot upon its garment. Meantime the state and the nation suffer, and politics is still further blackened by an offense against common civic decency.

Mr. Roosevelt is on his way to America after a career of unprecedented attention in Europe. He will arrive in this country at a moment when the entire nation is keenly curious to know what his attitude will be toward Mr. Taft, whom he placed in the presidential chair. Even the records of polar exploration and the scandals of party politics have not diverted attention from the remarkable journey Mr. Roosevelt has made. The public press has been full of his doings and his sayings, and most of the leading dailies have had personal representatives with him at every stage of the trip. It would be interesting to know how much of the unpopularity which Mr. Taft has aroused is the result of his own mistakes, some of which have been very obvious, and how much is the result of Mr. Roosevelt's high place in the public regard. No one doubts that the statesman from Oyster Bay is the most conspicuous man alive. Neither does any one doubt that his place in the future counsels of the nations is to be notable. A nation has use for a man of Mr. Roosevelt's temper, and it will not allow him to remain long unemployed.

Winning Power Through Service

The hesitancy of Moses shows that he did not underestimate the difficulties involved in the divine call. He questioned whether he was equal to the task. At the time of his call he probably was not able to meet and overcome such difficulties as he forsaw would confront him. He had to grow to his work. A distinguished teacher of a former generation used to say to his students: "Do not confine your reading to books that you can understand without effort. Read books that you have to grow to." A popular evangelist said near the close of his career that if he had known at the beginning the hardships connected with the life of an evangelist, he doubtless would have chosen for himself another career. He was glad, however, that he became an evangelist, for he gained strength by the things he did.

The wise man takes account of his resources before he commits himself to any enterprise. Among the resources of youth are the possibilities of growth. Many a man who seems to his acquaintances to be reckless succeeds because he takes account of the element of growth and dares to attempt all that his future strength can bear. The overcautious man remains undeveloped, for he undertakes nothing for which his present strength is not sufficient. It is fortunate for us all that we have heavy tasks imposed upon us, for we are tempted to choose what is easy and thus to live below our possibilities. What is true of individuals is true of organizations. There is a venture of faith in all enterprises.

The first service required of every one is that of getting an honest living. Theives and gamblers do not render this service, neither do idlers, whether rich or poor. The occupation we select must contribute toward the general welfare. Then we must do our work well. Dishonesty in work is as bad as any other form of dishonesty. The problem of dealing with the big thieves in this country would be greatly simplified if there were no little thieves. The man who steals a little by shirking helps to create the feeling that he may take who can. The crooked grocer in the village is partly responsible for the rascality of the sugar trust.

The home as a place of service needs to be better appreciated by many men and women. A mother who looks carefully to the physical and moral culture of her children is sometimes heard to say that her home duties do not permit her to do any Christian work! The minister, if he is worthy of his calling, will tell her that she is doing the highest form of Christian service in bringing up young persons to do a part of the world's work as it ought to be done. Speeches and ecclesiastical and state laws are less effective in curing the evils of divorce than homes in which humanity is seen at its best. Ignorance and brutality war against the family. Law courts cannot cure these. The examples of husbands and wives who live together in the fear of the Lord is the only sufficient answer to the critic of the family. The woman who neglects her children for the purpose of fighting the enemies of the home has no influence over her neighbors. She gains that inufluence by what she does at home. The man who thinks of his home as a convenience, and not as a moral opportunity, need not start out to set the world right, for the world will not accept him as a moral hero.

The services prompted by neighborly feeling enable us to grow in intelligence and moral power. If we have sympathy for the parents whose children annoy us, we shall not only help them, we shall also increase our worth as moral beings. If, on the contrary, we never notice children except when they annoy us and then only to say something ugly to them or about them, we stand a good chance of becoming common nuisances. The man in the next house may be disagreeable, but if we treat him as a man we shall have our reward in genuine culture. The assistance we give to the sick opens the door into a world of rich experience to which we should be strangers if we paid no attention to the sick. We become human by accepting our share of responsibility in state and church. The weakness of men who shun their political duties is pitiable. If nothing else will arouse us to the obligation of preaching the gospel to all the world, we ought to consider ourselves and the loss we suffer by neglecting this service. The size of the task determines the size of the man. The little task creates little men. The big task gives us men of great power.

What Is Success?

BY A. W. TAYLOR

How many in the modern business world would say Jesus missed his opportunity when he said, "Get thee behind me Satan" to the third temptation? It was a vision of the success of a Napoleon or an Alexander and modern opportunism would have said "take it." How many would say that Zaccheus was a fool to restore fourfold to those he had extorted from, instead of giving a handsome sum to charity and retaining the rest to be respectable on? There is a style of success that would commend the rich young man and the rich old fool.

There is a heavenly success in the art of getting riches where moth and rust corrupt and thieves break through and steal, or at least of getting plenty. The Lord, in His bountiful nature, provided plenty for all and gave man the instinct for accumulation and called it all good, and in the Kingdom of Heaven there will be neither poverty nor pletnora.

Money's Hold on the Multitude.

Money becomes the god of the multitude because it gets bread and butter and ease and escape of penury and drudgery. The bread and butter problem is the first consideration in both economics and morals, and plenty is the very incense on the altar of honest toil, and one of the first means of worship. The sympathy of even the poor is for the ways of gain often, for while they may envy, they count fortunate those who have an abundance. It is difficult to be good and poverty-stricken, and Jesus warned men that it was impossible to be saints and live in luxury. Luxury is a sin against civilization and all good conscience.

The physician who cures most quickly and thoroughly and with the least expense to his patient is the most successful. The lawyer that aids justice is the true success in law. The preacher that speaks the truth with prophetic conscience is the pulpit success. Yet there are physicians who prey upon the ignorance of their patients, lawyers who defeat justice, and preachers who salve consciences, all for the sake of temporary success in money-making. The secret of their true success is in service, of their false success is in exploitation of others.

True success, then, is in service, while exploitation is false success.

There is a success in business that means crushing out your rival. It is climbing up on the backs of others. It is my gain at your loss. There is a success that reaps the toil of many and appropriates it for self. It substitutes mental power for the physical force of more common hold-up men and keeps within the law. But where one gets without working, others must work without getting. It begets, in its extremity, a form of slavery worse than that of bonds, for it does not even make the master responsible for his servants' ills.

True success is in each getting what he earns, and there is enough for all.

Stealing is Trade.

To steal is to take the property of another without in any manner giving value received.

True trade consists in supplying wants, each party getting full value—it is simply an exchange of values. The element of profit enters in the service rendered in supplying reciprocal needs.

One man may steal by filchering, another by taking advantage of ignorance or necessity or by the use of superior cunning, others by "influencing" legislation that will give them monopoly rights to turn the property of many into their private purses. If one is held up in the dark at the muzzle of a revolver and relieved of ten dollars, the thief is ten dollars richer, and the victim has nothing to show for the amount surrendered. If one takes advantage of the necessity or ignorance of another and employs his muscles or mind or both for ten dollars less than they are worth in the work done, he is ten dollars richer, while the worker has nothing to show for the toil he has given. If a corporation uses the franchise of a city, gained by bribery or some form of civic corruption, and gathers in a million, the people have nothing to show for their property right, and the corporation has a million for nothing. In two of the three cases the law permitted the transactions, but it is not enough to keep out of the sheriff's hands.

There is "room at the top" is the word of cheer sent down the line, but how many can stand on the "top"? It is good to attempt to gain the "top," if the means be beyond suspicion, but to climb by bending down the backs of others is not the success of true service. Talk of the "100,000 man" is irrational. No man can be in that class. It is impossible to conceive of one man personally using that amount annually or needing the accumulation he could gain from it. That is the combined earnings of more than 1,000 men above the average of earning capacity, and no man's ability can be of such disproportionate value. Such an earning capacity is simply incredible and the spending power it implies is impossible except we freely confess that an industrial feudalism is to be desired and the earnings of the masses given into the hands of a few to conserve for the benefit of the many.

Millionairism.

The same is true of millionairism. No millionaire has a realization of the amount of his wealth. No man ever earned that large a fortune in a land where the average amount of wealth for 52 per cent of the people is less than $100 per capita. The amounts are too disproportionate to account for any degree of difference in earning capacity. It is stated that Mr. Rockefeller possesses $400,000,000. That is equal to the possessions of any 4,000,000 of this 52 per cent of the American people. The only defence of such a fortune can be that an industrial feudalism is the best system and that Mr. Baer is right in his claim that the Lord gives great wealth to a few to administer for the benefit of the many. No greater sacrilege could be uttered in a country where most ideals are democratic. While one man will earn more than another, the utter disproportionateness of income and wealth is undefensible and the aspiration to gain the success of millionairism is not one of service but of exploitation. The individual millionaire may have done no personal wrong, but the system is not sound. It is on the basis that where one gets without working, another works without getting, that is, one gets more than he earns and another earns more than he gets.

In our land, one-eighth of the people own seven-eights of the property, and 63 per cent of the people possess less than $175 per capita. These are U. S. Census statistics. The question may well be asked, "Are we prosperous, or are we only enjoying the prosperity of the few?" A panic will tell some day. It will test the ability of the masses to live comfortably under trying circumstances. True success in these things would give every man who toils the fruit of his toil, and with wealth distributed according to the part each takes in the work of the world, none need suffer but the indolent and improvident.

Success and Piety.

The old idea that success depends upon piety is gone. Jacob and his shrewd but questionable methods are no longer regarded as a fit example worthy of all emulation. Many of us are willing to pray "Lord, give me much and I will give you a tenth!" Most men would accept an opportunity to make nine dollars at the cost of one. The lily is a better example than the prosperous Jacob. It is not anxious, does not scramble, never designs secretly, preys not upon another, lives naturally, does its part, and reaps its fulness according to nature. Are we as insistent as Paul in the matter of extortion? He classed it with drunkenness and fornication. The story is told of a party who visited the South Seas, throwing pennies over the boat's edge to the little savages. One strong lad pushed and scrambled and tramples on his less powerful fellows and got half of the coveted wealth. He was then asked to dance, but refused on the plea that he had recently joined church.

The true measure of success cannot be fulfilled with the luxury of a few but in the comfort of many. No monopoly right is an honest right simply because it puts service in the hands of exploitation.

Any prosperity that leaves a victim is robbery, and that which leaves all a degree of plenty is a godsend.

Churches that have not yet made or remitted their offering to Home Missions should not delay this work. The month of May in our calendar is devoted to Home Missions, and no church should rest content to remain outside the fellowship of those who share generously the burden of this work.

Edinburgh

One of the Seven Wonders—Its Monuments of the Past—Its Place in the Destiny of Kings—Its Religious Appeal

GRAPHO.

Scotland has a reputation for more weather than any other habitable region of the globe. But no days could have been fairer than those which I spent in Edinburgh. July had just come in, decked in all her summer glory, radiantly beautiful. With such a sky above and such a city before me I went forth in the morning on the high rounds of expectation. And there was no disappointment. Nobody can be disappointed with Edinburgh, for surely it is one of the "Seven Wonders of the World," or the "Modern Athens," if you want to take the classical view of it. Another writer is to follow me, and to him I leave the larger work of description, especially of the Edinburgh of today.

The Edinburgh of the Past.

I was more interested in the Edinburgh of the past, in the dead people rather than in the living, in the men and women who had been walking up and down the highways and side paths of memory ever since I was a child. It seems to me that I was very little when I first looked at a picture of Mary Stuart and sighed or cried—I have forgotten which. And now I was here in her own city, in the very place where she lived, and also stormed and cried. I nearly held my breath when I entered the old Castle, that great frowning, mighty fortress, which was the first structure in Edinburgh and around whose sloping heights the city was built. And when the guide took me far down below, to the room where her baby boy was born, I stood in solemn awe. Before or since or all around the globe, there never was quite so much of ruling power brought into the world as when that child, that heir of the Stuarts and of the Tudors, was born. When Elizabeth's hard hand relaxed in death England's sceptre passed to this baby, and today his posterity reign, not only over Great Britain and all her imperial possessions, but over nearly all Europe. But in spite of his amazing destiny, the little fellow had to scramble to keep on earth. They point to a window on the steep side of the castle from which the child was let down in a basket and hurried away to the Highlands. On the outside of the Castle I stopped in the street and looked up at the window and wondered what would have happened if the string had broken and the child had reached the ground too suddenly. Epochs of history, crowns and kingdoms hung on that little cord.

At Holyrood.

But my sentimental system was even more stirred when I walked through the halls and chambers of Holyrood Palace, for here was Mary's home, the floors which she walked and on which she danced, the table at which she ate oatmeal—possibly, but I doubt it,—the chairs, the bed, the mirror, all the belongings of the three hundred years ago. The mirror specially interested me, for it brought back the questions which Queen Elizabeth asked so often and from so many courtiers, "Is she really beautiful?" "What makes her beautiful?" "What is the color of her hair?" This last question must have been difficult to answer, for Mary is described as having numerous shades of hair, passing through all the hues between golden yellow and rich brown. As to her beauty, the mirror makes no revelation now, it is too much affected by the personal equation of the one who looks into it. But I always have clung to the belief that Mary was at least strikingly handsome. If she had been as homely as some women one sees in his travels through Scotland, Elizabeth might have had more compassion on her, for Mary was the one person on earth of whom she was seriously jealous.

Tragical Memories.

But Holyrood was stained with the blood of an awful tragedy, and I looked at the scene of this dreadful doing with painful recollection. The sun must have gone down behind the hills of Scotland like a ball rolled in blood on the evening of the 9th of March when that deed was done. For whatever Rizzio may have been, it was a shocking piece of murderous brutality to tear him away from the supper table and hack him to death almost in the queen's presence. It is not strange that Lord Darnley got blown into eternity a year later. It was all coming to him for his part in this tragedy.

Holyrood.

Mary's Character.

But of course one wishes that Mary Stuart had been somewhat different, and three hundred years later it is easy to see how she might have been different, even very good. But when we go back with the palace, its tables, chairs, mirrors, all, to the days when they were on duty, it is not so hard to understand why Mary's life took on so many high colors and why her career was so stormy and tragical. The lords and nobles around her were not much better than brigands, men of violence, more ready for bloody deeds than peaceful solutions. And John Knox was as violently good as the nobles were violently bad. His religion was a storm and his sermons thunderbolts—good storms and good thunderbolts, to be sure, but awfully hard for Mary to understand. Knox never took his sovereign into full consideration. We must. We have to remember that she was both a Stuart and a Tudor, and that meant more passion, disposition and surging elements of human nature, than any young woman could be expected to manage. Think what the Stuart kings were and what the Tudor kings and queens were, and then think what this young woman, with the rush of all that blood in her veins, had to contend against. But that was not all. Mary's mother was a Guise of France, and there is no disguising the character of that ducal family—they were tough for their day, and their day was one of the worst. The wonder is that Mary Stuart was not worse than she really was. Anyhow, it was an awful thing for Elizabeth to murder this helpless mother of her own successor.

But suppose that the woman who laid her head on the block at Fotheringay Castle, with so much dignity and calm resignation on that sad February day three hundred and twenty-three years ago, could now come up to Edinburgh with the great throngs who gather from all the kingdoms and colonies over which her posterity rule, would she think that she had lived in vain? Would she not be almost justified in saying "But or woman in all the history of the race has lived to more purpose, and she the Mary who also bore a man child?" Mary may have been weak, but Providence is strong.

At St. Giles.

On Sunday morning I went to St. Giles.

St. Giles.

It has a famous preacher, dead of course, and no other than the great John Knox. Here it was that he preached the sermons which shook Scotland. The sermon which I heard that morning did not shake anything, except a resolution to come again. But what made it seem more stupid was the fact that when I saw the preacher preceded by a beadle and ushered into his pulpit with so much ceremony it aroused my expectation. I ought to have known that more flummery usually means less sermon. But with a little imagination I could hear the voice of Knox beating against the sounding board of the past and echoing down the corridors of the three centuries. It is worth while to go to St. Giles, for prophets never die and the preacher who made St. Giles famous was a prophet.

Some St. Georges.

In the afternoon I went to St. Georges and in the evening to Free St. Georges. St. George pretty nearly owns the town on Sunday. In Free St. George Dr. Alexander Whyte was the preacher. He was great without being dead, and fortunately he is not yet dead, but is preaching fine sermons which have not only a multitude of hearers but a greater multitude of readers.

I should say, from what I saw that day, that Edinburgh is a paradise for preachers—the people go to church. When I went out in the early morning the streets were deserted; but when the church bells began to ring they were thronged with people. The whole population seemed to be on the way to church. Edinburgh keeps Sunday, and its people worship God. This is why Edinburgh has been selected as the gathering place of the greatest missionary conference ever assembled. It is a city to make a missionary body feel at home. Every good man and woman will feel at home there. Every praying saint and yearning prophet will breathe the air of hope in its precincts.

Appeals to Great Interests.

But this Edinburgh which is so great in its religious appeal also has its attractions for other interests. And here is a curious fact. The writer who follows me will tell you that men come from far to study Edinburgh's municipal methods, that committees go about its streets trying to peer into the secret of its success as a governing body. Which is insignificant. It means that the people who go to church on Sunday know best what to do on week days. This writer also will tell you that Edinburgh is a place where they do everything in the line of "high thinking." Which means that a believing people do not vacate their thinking apparatus. Belief helps thought. Faith helps everything which is worth helping. We hear much about the beauty and value of altruism. But when or where was there ever so much altruism concentrated on one spot of the globe as will be represented at Edinburgh when the missionary hosts gather on its beauty-crowned hills?

Old and New Edinburgh

BY THE REV. HERBERT PARRISH.

Not the least charm of Edinburgh is the absence of smoke. To the Highlander coming down to the city from the heather, seeing the many chimney-pots giving forth their thin smoke, the place may seem to be "Auld Reekie"; but to the man from the thick muck of Glasgow or Newcastle—not to mention Pittsburg or Chicago—the clean streets and clear atmosphere alone will justify the name of "Modern Athens." A city of over 300,000 inhabitants, with its share of manufacturing, Edinburgh has a reputation for municipal improvements, an eye for the artistic, the thorough, the economic and the clean, that is recognized all over the world. You may see committees from the governing bodies of German cities going about Edinburgh studying civic methods.

Most Beautiful City in the World.

Baedeker, who seems to have been everywhere, says that Edinburgh is the most romantically beautiful city in the world. On a bright day in the late spring or early summer no one will be disposed to dispute this praise. Of course Naples or Palermo, between the Mountains and the sea, may linger in your memory; but the clearer northern sky, the brilliant green, the grey stones, the clean and interesting streets, the sharp hills and the wonderful bridges give a life to the charm of Edinburgh that no southern city can possess. It is full of interest. History, religion, literature, art, romance, poetry, philosophy, law and science—everything of importance to human life, where plain living and high thinking are at all valued—have been built into the record of Scotland's capital. The University, founded by James V. in 1582 with its 3,000 students, and the Medical School, with its 1,400 students; the Library, Heriot's Hospital, the Royal Infirmary, the Botanic Garden, the Scott Monument, the Museum and the National Gallery show the intellect and artistic vigor of the place. Names like those of David Hume, Adam Smith, Robertson, Robert Burns, Sir Walter Scott, Wilson, Jeffrey, Chalmers, Drummond, Robert Louis Stevenson rush to the memory at the mention of Edinburgh. The stories of Queen Mary, John Knox, the Covenanters, Bonnie Prince Charley and a dozen historic and romantic personages of the past will recur.

Two Cities.

There are really two cities in Edinburgh—the Old Town and the New Town. The Old Town is set in the midst of the new like an antique jewel in a new ring. The Castle, Holyrood, St. Giles's, the Parliament House, Canongate, the closes, the courts, the narrow, tortuous gloomy streets, the comfortless, grim, grey, tall buildings of the Old Town contrast dramatically with the green parks and white drives, the wide avenues, the smart shops, hotels, residences and public buildings of the New Town. Prince street in the New Town is a gay modern city thoroughfare—the most beautiful street in Europe. High street in the Old Town is a place where you might expect to meet a procession of knights in armour. The Old Town is picturesque, crowded, poverty-stricken, Gothic. The New Prince's Street.

Town is prosperous, clean, up-to-date. Ruskin, whose sympathies were mediæval, derided the smart newness of the buildings in the New Town; but Robert Louis Stevenson, with a more human instinct, felt their fascination. Besides, to Americans the New Town is not so new. It is eighteenth century rather than twentieth. George street, or Queen street, with their solid, massive style of buildings, their monuments and statues of worthies who flourished before our states were born, give a sense of respectable antiquity. The New Town is new merely by contrast with the Old Town. There is nothing crude about it, and the tradition of a mature literary culture, like the veil of sea-mist which has softened its stones, is over the whole place.

A Dream out of the Middle Ages.

The Old Town is a dream out of the middle ages. It for the most part dates only from the middle of the sixteenth century, for a great fire at that time destroyed many of the earlier houses. Of recent years whole districts have been rebuilt and modernized, and new streets have been driven through the old quarters. But enough of the mediæval character of the place remains. In Europe the authorities know well that the ancient and the picturesque are assets drawing thousands of visitors from every quarter of the globe and consequently to be preserved. The canny Scot is wise. He will show you Whitehorse Close, a meeting place of the Jacobites, John Knox's house, where John Knox is said not to have lived, and the Greyfriar's church with the graveyard where the "Covenant" was signed in 1638. If you want a thrill of historic memory, visit Queen Mary's room at Holyrood. It is preserved in almost the condition is was on that night when Rizzio was murdered.

Famous and Romantic.

A dozen famous and romantic places may be found in the Old Town, The heart of Midlothian, site of the Old Talbooth, the grave of Knox, the advocates in wig and gown still conferring with their clients in the great Hall of the Law Courts, are among the sights. It is a lesson in mediæval history to wander through the quaint streets. These tall, gloomy houses were once the palaces of the great. They are now the crowded, unsanitary tenements of the slums, inhabited by Irish and unsafe to be about at night. At their best they lacked comfort in the modern sense. You admire the picturesque architecture of the Old Town, but you choose your hotel in Prince street in the New. The glamor of romance which Sir Walter Scott's novels have thrown over mediæval life dies out when the actual mode of living is seen. Princes and prelates lived four centuries ago in surroundings regarded as miserable even for the poorest today.

Knox's Church.

"Come," said Dr. Samuel Johnson, when he and Boswell went to the great church of St. Giles, "let us see what was once a church."

As great medieval churches go, the collegiate church of St. Giles never was very famous architecturally. The present structure dates from the fourteenth century. Its lantern tower and the artful arrangement of its interior pillars are the only features of interest remaining. Here, as effectively as anywhere, the Reformation created havoc and let loose the dogs of war. The hammer-like eloquence of John Knox, who preached here his twenty sermons a week, each an hour or two long and terrific in vehemence, smashed the stained-glass windows, shattered the carved images of saints, broke in pieces the priceless fabrics of mediæval art, destroyed altars and shrines. In Dr. Johnson's day the scars were very visible. St. Giles's was occupied by four distinct congregations of worshippers, the great church being partitioned off for their convenience. A prejudice existed even against cleanliness in churches. "The pew swept and lined!" cried Mess John's wife; "my husband would think it downright popery!" Even Boswell admitted that the church was shamefully dirty.

Cleaned Up.

Since Johnson's time the higher aesthetic taste of nations, the appreciation of mediæval art first stimulated by the Waverly Novels, have caused the attempted restoration of St. Giles's. The place is swept and garnished. There are modern stained-glass windows, and monuments abound. The memorial of Robert Louis Stevenson is placed among those of Montrose and Argyle. The war-worn banners of Scottish regiments give a touch of color for the eye and a thrill to memory. Here Knox shaped history. Here Jennie Geddes threw her stool.

A mediæval church, especially of the Gothic type, is not well adapted to the use of the Protestant religion. There is an incongruity in the structure. The great choir, separated formerly by an impenetrable screen, the many chapels for masses, the arrangement of the building for a worship by the clergy exclusively without reference to the comfort or convenience of the people, without the idea of an auditorium for the preaching of sermons, make an awkward adaptation for modern needs which will be especially observed in the cathedrals in England. The Scots, more logical and less conservative, rooted out the screens and turned the church into a meeting house.

The Castle.

Holyrood Abbey is a shattered fragment, but the palace stands; and this castle, built on its lofty crag, surrounded by its green park in the centre of the city, Edinburgh wears as a crown. It is now utterly useless. In the days of Pict and Saxon it was a "hold"; later a bone of contention between Scotch and English; a haven of refuge in troublous times for Scottish kings; then a prison for Frenchmen; it has finally become a recruiting station for a kilted regiment and a show place for tourists. Its moat and drawbridge and portcullis, its museum and armory, its royal apartments, its obsolete artillery, the little chapel of St. Margaret, the inscriptions of French prisoners, the legends of a thousand years make of it a civic ornament and an historical monument. The view from its battlements to the Firth Bridge is superb. The wattled huts of the people have vanished, but in their place, beyond the Old Town, stretch the many busy streets, the roofs of comfortable homes, the libraries, schools, hospitals, gardens, of the people of the New Town. That is the fascination of Edinburgh. The Old Town, dominated by the castle, is the story in stone of a past age. Formerly the lords of the castle summoned their wild vassals from their wattled huts, or, clad in bright armour and armed with long spears, pricked the people to the fields of labor or for war and hanged those that murmured.

A Social Revolution.

The movement which rendered castles obsolete and palaces uncomfortable, which transformed the wattled huts of the common people into the New Town, was the same movement which shattered the abbey and changed the Collegiate Church of St. Giles. The Reformation was in essence a social revolution, a movement of the people. The caste system of an aristocratic class, the privileged and numerous clergy have given way to the democratic and lay tendency of modern life, modern government and modern religion. The movement in the sixteenth century began in Scotland in a mist of Scotch Calvinism. But there was in the cloud the lightning of a social revolution, of the rising of a people and the theory of liberty. There is a pathos in the ruined arches and roofless aisles of Holyrood Abbey. The fragments of delicate tracery that remain, the exquisite designs, the chisled stones, speak of a dignity of worship and a piety in the past that must be recognized. But the intelligence and prosperity, the liberty and vigor of the holiday crowd pressing along Princes street in the New Town tell a story also. It is the story of new ideals for society, or new standards for civilization, the story of the purpose of the Reformation and the accomplishments of the modern world. And better than any other place Edinburgh, with its wonderful combination of the Old Town and the New, tells the story in a way not to be found in books.

The Infirmary.

Prayer

Be not afraid to pray—to pray is right.
Pray if thou canst, with hope; but ever pray,
Though hope be weak or sick with long delay;
Pray in the darkness, if there be no light,
Far is the time, remote from human sight,
When war and discord on the earth shall cease;
Yet every prayer for universal peace
Avails the blessed time to expedite.
Whate'er is good to wish, ask that of Heaven,
Though it be what thou canst not hope to see;
Pray to be perfect, though material leaven
Forbid the spirit so on earth to be;
But if for any wish thou darest not pray,
Then pray to God to cast that wish away.

The Knights of King Arthur

(Of the Hyde Park Church.)

BY RICHARD W. GENTRY

Chicago Ill
May 12 1910

Dear Mr. Gentries.—

I have decided that I would like to belong to the Knights of King Arthur. Will you please tell me on what day I may be initiated and on what day the next meating will be.

Was it actually true that a real live boy was enthusiastic about something connected with the church? This seemed too good to be true. But it was true, for something had been found that "made good" with the boy.

The History of the Order.

"It was a snowy afternoon in midwinter, the 10th of February, 1893, that a Congregational pastor in the village of Riverside, Rhode Island, gathered twenty boys in a little chamber in his home to organize a society which he had decided to call the Knights of King Arthur. For some time there had been lurking in his mind the memory of a college fraternity to which he had belonged and whose ceremonials were based upon the customs of ancient knighthood. It occurred to him that something of this sort might suit these boys, who were tired of a rather stormy company of the Boys' Brigade." Thus was born the order. Now it numbers over 1,300 castles and about 35,000 boys are believed to have been members.

The Order and the Boy.

But why was this lad so anxious to join the order? For those who are interested in the scientific viewpoint the following words of G. Stanley Hall may be illuminating. ("Adolesence"):

"The spirit of the pure chivalry of King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table affords perhaps the very best ideals for youth to be found in history." . . . "The value of this material makes it almost biblical for the early and middle teens. It teaches the highest reverence for womanhood, piety, valor, loyalty, courtesy, munificence, justice and obedience. Here we find the origin of most of the modern ideas of the gentleman, who is tender, generous, and helpful, as well as brave. . . . This material educates the heart at an age when sentiment is predominant. It is the best expression of the adolescent stage of our race. . . . This spirit is organized in and its fitness shown in the growth and success of the Knights of King Arthur, an unique order of Christian Knighthood for boys."

For those who are interested in the practical viewpoint, the story of how we got our castle and the attitude of our boys may explain the enthusiasm of the candidate mentioned above. There was a boy in our neighborhood who had belonged to a Castle of the Knights of King Arthur. And it had gotten into his blood. He had visions of a new castle, over which he was willing to preside in the modest capacity of king. And he would be ready for kingship if he succeeded in the difficult and knightly task of finding a Merlin. For it takes time to be a Merlin and most people in the great city are very busy. The Merlin secured, there still remained another introductory step in the gathering together of a Bunch of Boys.

We got them together. They were a motley group. Some were little, some were big. They were about as solidified as the recent comet's tail: Back we fled—to our Mount Horeb, the text-book, to get our courage rejuvenated. Was there a place in this order for our ten, twelve, and sixteen year old boys? Joy came when we read the words, "The plan of the order is, by use of a form for meeting imitative of the Knights of King Arthur's Round Table, by progressive degrees of honor corresponding to the three degrees of chivalry, to furnish the outline of a non-secret boys' fraternity. . . . The degree of page, representing the servitude of the old time castle, is regarded as a temporary position, although some never rise above it. The watchwords of this degree are watchfulness, obedience and service. The degree of esquire represents preparation for Knighthood. Its virtues are purity, temperance and reverence, the typical virtues of chivalry. The degree of Knight represents the ideals of Christian Knighthood. It is to be followed, if possible, by giving the young Knight a quest."

So we made them pages and esquires, reserving the Knightship for a last step. Meanwhile we had found it necessary to find our meeting place,

The Castle of the Lake.

Here in the attic room of a generous mother we began in our small weak way. The boys hardly knew what it meant. The throne of the King was erected, a siege perilous set up, the walls were decorated with the Maltese Cross, and preparations were begun for the first initiation.

The First Initiation.

In he came, a little shaver, with the blindfold tight over his eyes, and the ceremony began. Amidst much forgetting of parts and chaotic excitement it proceeded. Game to the core, the small chap faced its every stage. Tremulous feelings were bottled up in true knightly fashion. At one point the lad, hearing his brother's familiar voice, called out in a tone of immense relief, "That's you, Roland," then went on as brave as before.

Thus one by one we took them in, learning the parts more thoroughly each time, the heat of the thing welding the boys together, the seriousness of it sinking into each boys heart as we read to the candidates their noble virtues and swore them in. But an order could not live by initiations alone, and soon we found ourselves face to face with the question,

What to do With the Boys?

Again to Horeb, where we read, that through the summer indoor meetings should be disbanded and the boys given "Quests," tramps for nature study, visits to historic sites, tournaments and hiking trips, and best of all, " a week in tents together and with their Merlin, where the sweet intercourse with nature and the sharing of hardship will do more for them all than the weekly meeting indoors for a whole winter."

But since we were yet in our infancy, we decided to compromise, holding an indoor meeting now and then, but laying the emphasis on "God's out of doors." One afternoon a week was set for baseball. Other outings were planned. One morning ten lads with wheels met for a "hot bacon tournament." Amidst punctured tires and jangling bells they peddled to ye jousting grounds. There the main feature of the day was to joust bacon off a hot rock. One novice had said to his mother: "That bacon on a hot rock doesn't sound good to me. Fix me up a ham sandwich and some boiled eggs." Gingerly he was persuaded to joust his first slice from off the rock. Gingerly he bit it—the first bite. Then he sat on his ham sandwich and threw his eggs in the lake.

Meanwhile initiations proceeded until we had twenty-one fine boys, and it seemed good that some indoor meetings should be held. The idea of fun was rampant. Could the serious side be brought to the front? To Horeb once more:

The Round Table Conclave.

Together they stood around their Merlin after Sunday-school while he explained to them that each lad was to have a cape, covering the elbows, with maltese cross. Each lad was to report on his Knight, telling who he was and why he chose him. The minister conferred his dining-room and provided a table both wide and long. The day came. The boys came. The house bulged with boys. They "bulged" into the dining-room. Each took his seat. Their eyes took in each other, the spears on the wall, the maltese cross banners, Arthur on his throne, Merlin, sedate,—the spirit of the thing seized upon their boyish souls and they were changed into

A brief prayer; the oath of secrecy; the financial report. Then King Arthur called for each to tell of his Knight. One by one they rose in their seats, manner sedate, faces eager, interest at white heat, and voices full of feeling spoke, "I chose my knight because he was a good fighter. He was the bravest knight King Arthur had." Other Knights and other virtues were described. But every now and then a voice piped out, "I chose my knight because he was a great fighter." Thus passed our first conclave, successful beyond our greatest hopes. And if by this time you are still asking the question,

What is it for?

I would reply: "The Knights of King Arthur is to keep a boy from evil and to so direct his activities as to build up character. We are giving our boys all sorts of things to do. There was a committee of the comet, appointed to spy out the "sky tramp" and report to a later conclave; a committee to draw up a system of discipline; a committee on music; a committee on the camping trip next fall; baseball captains, and other offices will follow. We have appointed some honorary members and they seem duly impressed. We took a gentleman whose name was luminous with an appendage of Ph. D.s and LL. D.s on an outing, and he felt honored to umpire the baseball game, continuing humbly in the face of a side line ejaculation, "Get a new umpire."

This is the story of our "Castle of the Lake" in its first crude stage. Its very crudity is fascinating in lieu of the infinite possibilities that lie ahead. If you are interested in the boy, write W. B. Forbush, Taylor and Third avenue, Detroit, Mich., sending one dollar for the book, "The Boys' Round Table," or $2.25 for complete outfit. If you start a castle your greatest reward will be to learn how much there is inside of a boy.

Gran'dad's Memorial

BY HENRIETTA FLINT SIMMERMAN

A timid knock at the back door was answered by the cordial call of "Come in" from Mrs. Mason. Lula Brown entered quietly, her thin face white with the very intensity of her desire.

"Oh, Mrs. Mason please, I wondered if you had some work I could do. I don't care what it is, I'll rake the yard or weed the flowers or —or anything I'm big enough to do and I'm getting quite large you see."

"Yes, I see. But child, I don't know of a thing you could do today. The colored man around the corner is going to keep our lawn and garden in shape this summer and I had a woman here all last week cleaning house, so things are pretty well done up. What are you wanting money for now? You are too ambitious for a girl of your age."

"Tomorrow is Memorial Day," ventured Lula.

"Oh I see, and you want a new ribbon for your hair. That makes me think, I came across a bit of new ribbon in the house cleaning and I thought I'd give it to you for your hair. Wait a minute, I know just where I put it."

"Oh thank you very much," as Mrs. Mason reappeared with the ribbon so dear to the little orphan's heart. "I do need a ribbon badly but it was flowers I was thinking of. Flowers for grandfather's grave. I couldn't bear to see flowers on all the other graves and none on dear grandfather's and he loved them so."

"But the soldiers will put flowers there. Haven't I heard you say he was a soldier?"

"Oh, yes, ma'am," then slowly, "but he was a Confederate."

"Well, now that is too bad. I just wish I had some flowers to give you, but I promised all the snowballs and syringas to the committee and I'm sure none of my peonies will be ready, it has been such a backward spring."

"I asked Miss Bates to please let me be excused from marching with the other children, but she said it was little enough us charity children can do for our country. I asked Mrs. Jones for just one lilac, but she said they were all for the committee and anyhow she had no flowers for a Confederate. But, Mrs. Mason, grandad fought for his home and what he thought was right. He often told me just those words. Well, goodbye; I'll go over to Mrs. Lockwood's and see if she doesn't want me to tend the baby for an hour or so."

But Mrs. Lockwood and the baby were not at home and Lula went sadly back to the charity school.

That night long after the lights were out one pair of eyes stared into the darkness and one heart beat fast as the little brain formed a daring plan. The next morning she was up bright and early and hurried through with the simple tasks that fell to her lot. Then gaining permission to be gone an hour she sped to the florists.

At the door she faltered and her resolution almost failed her, but the sight of the flowers in the windows and the hurrying crowd coming out of the door laden with great baskets of sweet scented blossoms drove her mad and she went in.

"A dozen white carnations please, and charge them to the Murdo Florist Co."

The man was too hurried to look fairly at the child else he could have seen how she trembled.

To the cemetery she hastened bearing her precious burden. Kneeling beside her grandfather's grave she murmured softly, "Dear grandad, I brought some flowers after all. I had to tell a story to get them but I didn't have any money and I could not earn a penny but I tried. I don't have anybody to love me since you are gone and for all I'm telling you, you'll never really know how I got these flowers."

Then kissing them one by one she laid them tenderly on the grave and went back to the school. That afternoon she carried a flag and marched in the procession with the other children, but there was a strange ache at her heart and as soon as the exercises were over she went slowly to Mrs. Mason's.

That good woman had had a busy day and was resting on her porch as Lula appeared. The thin white face was thinner and whiter than ever and Mrs. Mason wondered if she had lost her precious ribbon.

"Have a seat, do, child. You look tired, but I guess everybody is after such a day. I'm glad I'm home and do not have to budge again tonight."

Lula wasted no words but came to the point at once. "Dear Mrs. Mason, you have always been kind to me, you are the only person who has been kind to me since grandad died. But you will not like me any more when you know what I did today. I got some flowers at Kirby's and told them to charge them to Murdo's. They were in such a hurry they did not ask any questions."

"Child, don't you know that is very wicked?"

"Yes I know, but I thought you would understand so I just came to tell you. I am going now to explain to Mr. Kirby. I don't know what he will do to me but I had to get flowers for grandad."

"Wait a minute child and I will walk down with you. I want to see Mr. Kirby about some scarlet geraniums."

But it was not of scarlet geraniums that Mrs. Mason thought as they walked in silence to the florists. The rush of the day was over and Lula walked straight up to Mr. Kirby, while Mrs. Mason seemed intent on examining such flowers as still remained unsold.

"Please, Mr. Kirby, I came to tell you that the flowers I got here this morning were not for Murdo's but to put on grandfather's grave. I had no flowers and no money and I had to get some for grandad."

The angry man glared at her. "Who's your grandad that I should furnish flowers for him? You are a wicked child and should be sent to the reform school. I shall turn you over to the police."

With never a look of pity toward the pinched little face he started toward the door but was confronted by Mrs. Mason.

"What is the price of the flowers she got?"

"One dollar, but you need not think to buy me off that way. Such conduct must be punished. What's to hinder her trying that trick over again? I must call the police."

"There is no need of that. I will vouch for her future good behavior. She will appear in court in the morning if need be, for I shall be there to make application for adopting her. Come, Lulu, let us go home."

Two big tears crept down the pale cheeks as they started down the street and a choked little voice said, "Oh, Mrs. Mason, do you s'pose I can ever be good enough to be your little girl?"

Australia and the State Convention

BY ALBERT J. SAUNDERS

Gold! What an irresistibly magnetic power has almighty gold! Who does not know of California in '49, or the Klondyke? Australia likewise was advertised to the world by the rich Ballarat finds in the early days, when the wonderful Mount Morgan mine, and more recently Coolgardie, and the rich Golden Mile, which have placed western Australia among the greatest gold-producing countries of modern times. Until the gold rush of a quarter of a century ago West Australia was isolated and practically unknown, but since then things have been moving in this great state. One may justly call it great, for it is three times the size of Texas, and has over 900,000 square miles of territory.

Encouragement.

This large area has nevertheless a shockingly small population. There are less than 300,000 people in the whole state. Perth is the chief city on the Swan river, beautiful for situation. In Perth we have an influential church ministered to by W. B. Blakemore recently of Bridgeport, Conn. He and his good wife are adjusting themselves admirably to Australia and her ways, and their solid constructive work, especially in Bible-school methods, is beginning to tell. Mr. Blakemore commends very highly the Australian church for many of her positions and practices, but there are some things he would like to see altered. Quietly yet surely, and with an encouraging response, is the larger vision and greater social outlook appealing to the people. So it is everywhere that the message of the kingdom of God comes to the hearts of men.

Aborigines Disappearing.

The aborigines of Australia are a disappearing people. They are very primitive and inferior, and in contact with the white man the fittest survives. In the western state the black man is found principally in the northwest. They have caused trouble to the white settler, but in the main they are docile and reserved, and prefer to live alone in their native simplicity. Spencer and Gillen have done a valuable work in their studies of the Australian natives. There are several branches of mission work conducted for the good of the natives. The state has industrial institutions which are doing good work. The Roman Catholics have missions in many parks confined almost exclusively to the native children, while just recently the Presbyterians have ordained a splendid medical graduate of Melbourne University to become their leader in mission work among the aborgines.

To Be a Great Fruit Country.

Until very recently the chief revenue to the state was its gold mines, but now other important industries are being developed. The state is destined to be a great fruit producing country. Thousands of acres are already planted with apples, oranges, pears, lemons, vines, etc. The Jarrah timber trade has immense possibilities. Jarrah is becoming important on the lumber market. But wheat growing seems to offer the greatest promise. There is really an exodus to the land. The government is making liberal terms to land seekers. A man with two or three sons can secure several hundred acres free upon certain improvement conditions. And let it ever be remembered that Australia is the paradise of the working man. He works only eight hours a day, has a weekly half-holiday, and a delightful climate the year round. Last week were held the federal elections, and it has resulted in another labor victory. Like all new countries Australia has her problems, many and great they are, but this is God's country, there are many noble Christian souls here, and the prospects are bright.

Easter week is the annual state convention of the Christian churches of western Australia. It is the great church event of the year. As did the pious Hebrews so long ago from mountain and vale, city and hamlet, wend their way to the holy city, so from many parts of this great state come the faithful to our Zion, Lake Street Church, Perth, to worship, to fellowship, to plan.

Annual Conference.

The convention or conference is an association of churches of Christ banded together for religious work. New churches are admitted to the association upon application and approval. The business of the association is done at this conference by delegates representing the churches. Committees are selected to see that the suggested work is done during the year. All the activities of the church are represented in mass inspirational meetings during conference week. One item of unusual interest this year was a lecture by the conference president, Mr. G. B. Maysey, a centennial delegate, on, "My Visit to the Pittsburg Centennial, and Notes by the Way." The church in Australia is deeply interested in the progress of the work in America and it is needless to say that the lecture was much appreciated.

One feature of our annual meetings is the conference picnic—the social event of the conference gatherings. A beautiful spot is chosen down the river Swan, steam boats are chartered, and all young and old go to the picnic. The advantages of pleasure and fellowship and deeper talk about the work are inestimable. The present year gives promise of much success.

The writer has located with the church at Fremantle. Fremantle is the chief port of the state, and has a population of about 30,000. Some influential men of business and civic recognition are on the membership roll, and the prospects for perhaps slow but genuinely constructive work are good.

Religious Situation in Europe

From the Address of Dr. J. H. Shakespeare of London Before the Northern Baptist Convention in Chicago.

We must remember that Europe is only nominally Christian. Religiously it may be roughly divided into three great sections. The Latin nations are Roman Catholic, the northern are Lutheran or Calvinistic, while the eastern or Slavs are of the Greek or Russian church. I do not propose to discuss how far the church in Germany is the charred stump of what was once a living tree, blasted by rationalism, but it is certain that the hand of the state has crushed out its life and that the masses of the people are alienated from it. Nothing could be more significant than one fact: in England the leaders of the Labor Party in the House of Commons are most of them earnest Christians and local preachers, but in Germany the Social-Democrat movement is entirely atheistic. In Catholic countries the gospel has been lost in mists of superstition. The "untroubled many" disregard the church and give themselves to the follies and vices of the great cities. Educated and earnest Catholics find it increasingly difficult to believe, and to be at peace, as Father Tyrrell said, it is necessary for them "not to see, or hear, or read, or converse, or live."

The worship of the Russian church is cold and formal and many of its priesthood ignorant, its hierarchy not daring to lift up a voice against massacre or in defense of patriots. Is it surprising that in Europe the church is on one side, upholding war, hiding the Key of Knowledge, witholding the Bible, setting her seal and benediction upon every wrong, and on the other side are the people, the struggling, disinherited, unshepherded masses of humanity? On an island, washed by the waters of the Neva, the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul, rises grim and sinister, looking out upon St. Petersburg. The student sees it from the university. The peasant sees it as wrapped in his sheep-skins he goes to his daily task. There are the tombs of the emperors, the lords of life and death to the hundred millions of Russia. There are the mighty fortifications like the entrenched strength of an impregnable empire; there, deep down below the water level, with filth and vermin, are the dungeons in which the martyrs of liberty have endured innumerable wrongs; and above it all, the crown and flower of the system is the church of St. Peter and St. Paul. It is strange that as the years go by all that is enlightened and humane in Russia turns with distrust from a church which it connects with despotism?

NO CAUSE FOR ALARM.

A young preacher who was staying at a clergy house was in the habit of retiring to his room for an hour or more each day to practice pulpit oratory. At such times he filled the house with sounds of fervor and pathos, and emptied it of most everything else.

Phillips Brooks—so the story goes—chanced to be visiting a friend in this house one day when the budding orator was holding forth.

Gracious me!" exclaimed the bishop, starting up in assumed terror. "Pray, what might that be?"

"Sit down, bishop," his friend replied. "That's only young D. practicing what he preaches."—The Interior.

A BARGAIN.

A well dressed man was standing outside a bookseller's shop in Charing Cross road, closely examining one of Balzac's works, illustrated by Gustave Dore. "How much is this Balzac?" he asked an assistant outside.

"Twenty-five shillings," was the reply.

"Oh, that's far too much. I must see the manager about a reduction," continued the prospective customer, and, suiting the action to the word, he took up the book and went into the shop.

Approaching the bookseller, he took the book from under his arm and asked what he would give for it. "Seven shillings, highest offer," he was told.

The offer was accepted—the man took his money, and left.

"Well," queried the assistant later, after the man had gone, "were you able to hit off with the gentleman, sir?"

"Oh, yes. I managed to get another copy of that edition of Balzac for seven shillings."

Then the bookseller went out to lodge a complaint with the police.—London Weekly Telegraph.

A SERIAL STORY

Donald Graeme

Copyright, 1910, by J. C. Kilner

By M. A. FULTON

CHAPTER SIX.

When the Bolt Fell.

September, the month of many colors, was drawing towards the close. The crimsons, and yellows, and browns that had spread themselves so lavishly over foliage, high and low, from the early days of the month, were beginning to take on spots of age, and its wrinkles too. And overhead, among the trees. one could hear the continual rustle, rustle, rustle of a language not yet understood by the vast majority of that mighty multitude of beings, calling themselves men. But to those who know, the dying leaves are simply whispering words of hope and faith to each other, ere they quit a narrow environment to enter a state of rest, from which they will again rise into existence on a higher plane.

Donald Graeme stood in the manse garden, rake in hand, a light in his clear, blue eyes that we have not seen before. He seemed to be watching the swirling, eddying floating leaves, as they chased one another, sometimes in twos and threes, at others in showers, and fell all round him on the dry ground.

"Moralizing on the falling leaves, Donald?" said Mr. Sinclair, as he came round a bend in the path and found the young man watching so intently the death dance of the leaves.

"I am not given to moralizing, Mr. Sinclair. But, does it not seem sad to see things—such beautiful things as they were, too—with so brief a life?"

"Their lives are not over, Donald," he said, laughing and giving the leaves under his feet a gentle kick. Donald looked puzzled.

"They look very like it," he said.

"Is not this a magnificent beech tree, under which we stand, lad?"

"Very."

"And it has put forth its leaves and carried its mast, and felt the summer sun and the winter's blast for more years than you or I can guess. And in all probability it will stand here and live and grow long, long years after you and I have passed beyond human ken. Yet remember, Donald, that in helping to build up that mighty trunk, and spread out these giant arms, the dead leaves of the centuries gone by have had their part to do. We can see them here," he laid his hand on the hoary tree-trunk as he concluded, "not dead, but alive."

"I see," said Donald, smiling back into the minister's rapt face, "and I think I'll enjoy the apples this year all the more for that thought." They both laughed gaily.

"I fear we do not often look far beneath the surface for our blessings; yet when we think of it, does it not seem strange that dead leaves such as we now trample under our feet, may one day, through the medium of the apple kingdom, say—help to build up the colossal fabrics of two philosophers' brains—yours and mine, Donald?" They were laughing again most heartily, when Donald, who faced the garden gate, exclaimed:

"Oh, here's Jeanie, and her school friend, I suppose. She was to come today." They left their bicycles at the gate and came tripping along the leaf-strewn path, a pair of the most gladsome things on God's fair earth—two maidens not yet out of their 'teens, who are knit together in bonds of friendship, born from the love of each, for high ideals of life.

"This is my friend, Elsie Wallace, Mr. Sinclair."

"Let me bid you welcome to Brigend, Miss Elsie," said Mr. Sinclair, warmly clasping her hand.

"My brother Donald, Elsie." Donald blushed most becomingly, but Elsie looked calm and self-possessed, as she said brightly, "I've known you both for ages—and I am very glad to meet you—and, oh, what a dear old garden, Mr. Sinclair. How I should love to work in it."

"Donald and I are half killed trying to put it in order. We shall be very glad of another hand, won't we Donald?"

"Most certainly. But would it not be wise of us to get the apples safely stored away, before we engage additional help?"

"You are most ungallant, Mr. Donald Graeme. I'll tell you what we'll do, Mr. Sinclair, Jeanie and I will come to help gather the apples, leaving Mr. Donald at home. Will that arrangement do, Mr. Sinclair?"

"Splendidly," he replied. "Donald has been my assistant every half-holiday, I believe, for five weeks past. I have not the slightest doubt but he is weary of the job now. Say you are, Donald. Don't you see what a gain it will be to me to have two assistants instead of one. What do you say, Jeanie?"

"If it would do me as much good to work in the garden as it has done Donald, the sooner I come the better."

"Does no one think of the good it might do me, a poor Robinson Crusoe in the desert island of the manse garden, to see a human face betimes—other than my man, Friday." He pointed with mock solemnity at Donald, who pretended to wipe tears away as he answered:

"It's not fair, Mr. Sinclair, so it's not, to put me out of the garden before Eve comes into it—besides there are two of them—" He paused and glanced mischievously at Mr. Sinclair who joined most delightedly in the laugh that followed Donald's speech.

"It is time we were off, Elsie, if we are to reach Motherwell and come back in time for tea."

"Oh, I'm sorry I have not my bicycle here," said Donald eagerly, I could go with you."

"We must go without you, Donald," Jeanie said; then she added, "We'll not be long, and mother told us to ask you, Mr. Sinclair, to kindly walk down with Donald to our house for tea."

"Thanks ever so much, Jeanie. I was just going to invite myself." Nobody ever remembered Mr. Sinclair in such high spirits as he had evinced lately. His friends all said his improved health dated from the time of his motoring tour with his brother, the Edinburgh solicitor.

Elsie Wallace and Jeanie had only stayed a few minutes in the manse garden, yet so well had they enjoyed the harmless chatter there that both girls left in the best of spirits with themselves and with every one else. So soon as they were fairly off on their bykes and well out of hearing Elsie exclaimed:

"Why, Jeanie, you used to speak of Mr. Sinclair as if he were an elderly man. He's quite young, and a splendid looking man." Jeanie felt herself blush most uncomfortably, but she tried to look unconcerned.

"He's turning gray, Elsie; but no matter, he has been a true friend to Donald and to me. There's nobody else like him dear, that's the truth."

"I can well believe it," answered Elsie, sagely.

Mr. Sinclair and Donald leaned over the garden gate watching the girls in silence till they were out of sight.

"Your sister's friend is a bright little body, Donald. She reminds me of what Thomas Carlisle once said to your mother when she called with some others to see him in his house at Chelsea: 'Right weel I ken by your face that you're a guid Scotch lassie.' He could have given no higher praise, lad."

"It was great, Mr. Sinclair. But this—this Miss Wallace is bonny, I'll warrant. If she's 'guid' too, so much the better. Didn't she look just like a part of the garden in that dark brown dress she wore?"

"Donald, what's the matter with you? I seldom notice what a woman wears, but I am almost certain, this one was dressed in navy blue."

"Oh, it is Jeanie you are thinking of." Mr. Sinclair had to laugh again. Never had Donald and he spent so merry an evening together, though they had enjoyed many a long, delightful evening among the flowers and fruits of the old manse garden, since that evening in August when Donald had shown so much anxiety to leave his native land for life in the far West. Mr. Sinclair had never by word or look, shown Donald that he guessed his trouble. He laughed over Donald's idea of farming in Canada, and insisted on the young fellow's spending evening after evening with him among his flowers, fruits and vegetables, always declaring that he was highly indebted to Donald for his valuable help. But while they tended the garden, the good man was sowing seeds of another kind, in his young friend's mind, and already Donald was hankering after a higher life than he had ever dreamt of till now. If he could only forget the miserable past, how happy he would be. True, there were times, like the present, when he did forget, but the thought of the money Jeanie had given him and the secrecy she maintained about it, would come into his mind even in his gayest moments, spoiling everything. Many a time lately he had been on the verge of telling Mr. Sinclair all, but he feared to lose his best friend by letting him know how wicked he had been. Erring men, like Donald, know little of the greatness of a good man's heart. So he held his peace. And the minister, groping in the darkness, hoped on, and prayed on, for the sheep that was lost.

"We have still an hour to spare, Donald," said Mr. Sinclair, looking at his watch, "what shall we do with ourselves?"

"Go down to the riverside. I like to see the Clyde swirling among the boulders."

"So do I, Donald. When I wish to get up a sermon on the greatness of service, I often take an hour by the river's brink.

"Does the thought of it at Glasgow on a summer day when the tide's out, not bother you, Mr. Sinclair?"

"It teaches me, Donald."

"Sad things?" Donald himself looked sad as he spoke.

"No. Glorious things," said the minister, earnestly.

"How?" The young man's eyes were full of wonder.

"Because I know that, though the river must suffer from contact with the pollution and filth, inseparable from commercial life, yet in its humiliation, it is helping mightily in building up human happiness and prosperity. I know, too, that the river finds no rest in its poisoned places. Back to mother ocean its great aim is, there to regain the purity lost awhile. You see we have few better pictures of human life than a river, Donald."

"My life has not had much of the usefulness of the Clyde in it, so far though, it has had its muddy places, sometimes."

"In that, true men may differ—must differ, indeed, from the river. We can be strong, and deep, and useful, without suffering ourselves to be soiled by the tear and wear of life. You are young, Donald. Whatever your faults of youth may have been, waste no moments in idle looking backward. Look forward and upward. The river becomes pure when it mingles with the ocean. The spirit of man becomes pure when it gets in touch with its Maker." Donald's heart was touched. He felt that the time had come at last when he could tell his minister everything. But it was not to be. As he was on the point of blurting out the story of his folly, an interruption came in the shape of Mr. Sinclair's fat housekeeper.

"Askin' yer pardon, Maister, there's a gentleman in ane o' thae things that's ca'd a motor car—speirin' for Mister Donald, here."

"It is not my brother then, Mrs. Johnson?"

"Na, na, I didna speir his name. Ye'll see for yersel's, dootless."

"It will be Archie Monteith, Mr. Sinclair. He has been saying often for the past month or so, that he would soon be coming to see us on his own motor car."

"Was he not jesting, think you, Donald?"

"I believe he was quite serious. The company he is connected with has been doing well, he says." A shade crossed the minister's face. He did not reply. He lagged half a step behind Donald who was striding towards the high road at a rapid rate. Perhaps it was the speed at which they were walking which brought such a flush to Mr. Sinclair's usually pale face.

Donald had been right. When they reached the manse gate, there was Archie Monteith seated in his brand new motor car, looking as happy as if he had never known a care.

"I quite agree with you, Mr. Sinclair," he said gaily, as they shook hands, "if a man wants to know what true happiness is he has only to get a motor car."

"Always remembering, Mr. Monteith, to drive in moderation."

"She's a beauty, Archie," said Donald in high glee, "but how did you learn to manage her so soon." Archie laughed.

"Oh, it's nothing. Jeanie will be able to drive in a week."

"I hope not," said Mr. Sinclair, hastily.

"And why not, Mr. Sinclair?" inquired Archie in a cool, half-sneering tone of voice. Donald saw Mr. Sinclair's color rise and quickly interposed—

"Father and mother won't allow Jeanie to ride in her at all, Archie; be sure of that."

"I'm pretty sure I am not going to ask their leave, for today, at any rate. I only waited long enough at the house to know where you all were. Jump in, Donald, you and I will go to meet the ladies. You will ride Jeanie's bicycle home and she will taste true happiness with me in the motor." He glanced maliciously at Mr. Sinclair, who had not quite regained composure. Had he been calmer indeed, he might have felt it to be wiser to maintain caution, in dealing with a man like Archie Monteith. Looking steadily at Donald, and quite ignoring his cousin, Mr. Sinclair said:

"Donald, I am sure you will not allow your sister to be persuaded to come back in the motor, today at least, till the car has been longer on trial."

"Is it the car, or its owner you object most to, sir?" Archie almost hissed the question at him and rushed off.

"The owner, most decidedly," mused Mr. Sinclair, as he turned towards Brigend.

Old man Graeme sat in his office, a troubled look on his face, a cheque-book in his hand. James Douglas stood before him, looking distressed and puzzled.

"Do ye no' remember the day Smith o' Birmingham was here, Jamie?'

"I remember weel enough. But I ken naething aboot the cheque."

"The block is here a' richt—Richard Smith o' Birmingham, ten pounds for goods received."

"Is it no' a' richt, Maister?" inquired James.

"It's no' a' richt, Jamie; it's a' wrong. I had a note frae Smith o' Birmingham saying he was sorry he had nae time to call again for the cheque I had promised him in August. I find the block here as I noted it when I wrote the cheque. Then I gaed tae the bank tae inquire there. Ay, Richard Smith of Birmingham had presented a cheque there the day after date, Jamie—a cheque for one hundred pounds—Hae I a forger an' a thief in my employ, Jamie?"

James Douglas went white as a sheet.

"I hope not, maister," he said slowly, and looked pityingly into the old man's face.

"Only you and Donald have the richt to come into this office, Jamie."

"There must be some mistake, sir." James spoke rather from the desire to comfort his master, than from conviction.

"I hear Mr. Sinclair's voice askin' for me, Jamie. Show him in, I need him sorely."

"Would it no' be better tae say naething aboot it till we ask Donald?"

"Show him in. If Donald has done this thing, he's nae son o' mine."

The office door had but closed on Mr. Sinclair, when Archie Monteith's motor car dashed up in front of his uncle's shop. Donald came in with a bound.

"I've had a glorious ride, James," he cried, his face glowing with excitement. James Douglas took him by the arm and drew him aside.

"Donald," he said sternly, "your father's name has been forged to a cheque for one hundred pounds."

Why the Clergy Are Dull

"We clergy are a frightfully dull set," remarked Rev. G. A. Hazelhurst (vicar of St. Thomas', Derby) at a meeting of clergy at Mansfield. "At middle age we can never see a joke, and we are as dull as ditchwater. If a railway traveler sees a clergyman in a compartment he will not enter it because he believes the clergy can talk of nothing but religion and church topics. And a clergyman very often cannot talk of much else besides this, for generally he knows nothing about sport or the latest thing at the theatre. But if the clergy are a dull race it is the laymen who are to blame. We are overworked; we have all the burdens of a parish piled upon our shoulders; we have to do work which should be performed by a staff of three or four men, and under such circumstances you cannot expect a clergyman to be bright and to retain his freshness and any sense of humor by the time he is middle-aged. Heavy work and financial worry cause many a clergyman to become hipped, his enthusiasm dies out, and he shuts himself up in his study. He preaches more scholarly sermons than before, but there is not that living interest in them that there used to be."

The Mink Family

The minks are a very fine family. Some of their cousins are called sables, and others ermines, and all have pretty and costly clothes. The mother mink is a beautiful brown creature, with a very long tail, about as large as an English hare, quite slender and graceful.

All the minks and martens wear two fur coats, one above the other. The under one is short and woolly, and sticks close to the skin, keeping its wearer warm in coldest weather, and dry in deepest water. The outer coat has long, glossy hair, which throws off the rain, as does the thatch of a cottage. When our boys and girls want to bathe in the sea they must take lots of trouble, wear a special bathing dress, and be careful not to take cold.

The little minks and martens and their numerous cousins can spend as much time as they please in the water. Their costly fur dresses can stand all sorts of mud and dirt and water. All they have to do when tired of their bath is to shake themselves and run about in the sunshine.

These happy little people live on fish and have great fun in catching them.—The Sunbeam.

An Old Legend

By Grace Wood Castle.

Stranger tale was never told.
Years ago, some hundreds, surely,
In a village quaint and old,
Wonderful the thing that happened;

It was on a Sunday morning
Dismal, dark with fog and cloud,
When, the service being over
Through the church door came the crowd.

Fathers, mothers, grandsires, children,
Pausing, stared in dumb amaze;
Doubting, fearing, wondering greatly
At the sight that met their gaze.

Hooked about an old gray tombstone
A ship's anchor tightly clung;
While its hempen cable tautly
From the clouds above them hung.

Then, as every eye looked upward,
Vainly strove to pierce the murk,
Came the sound of muffled shouting
As of sailors at their work.

"Yo heave ho!" The anchor wavered,
But the gravestone held it fast;
A second pull and many others
Failed to move it; then at last

Deftly down the cable sliding
Came a sailor to the ground,
But ere he could loose the anchor
All the people crowded round.

Eager, curious, they seized him;
The poor soul with questions plied;
While he, struggling to escape them,
Answered nothing—gasped and died.

Closed they then his eyelids gently,
Crossed his hands upon his breast,
Watched the cable stretching upward
Whence had come th' unbidden guest.

Soon, by unseen fingers severed
It fell to earth. Faint, fainter grew
The sailors' shouts; gone was the vessel
With its mystic unseen crew.

* * * * *

Those who've traveled to this village
Quaint and old across the sea,
Have been shown the massive hinges,
That upon the church-door be:
Have been told that they were welded
From the cloud-sent anchor stout:
With such evidence before them
Who would dare the legend flout?

Elgin, Ill.

Do you know the way to God so well that you can show it to some one else and send him away rejoicing? Philip did. What else in life is so well worth while as showing a wanderer God's road?

The Guest

My daddy is a 'fessor at a big, big 'cademy,
And he has got a picture-book of stars, called 'stronomy.
But, oh, you ought to hear him talk to me and brother Jack
'Bout all the funny folks who live up in the Sody Ack.
I don't know what the Sodys do
And never saw an Ack, did you?

My daddy has a telescope that pokes up through the trees.
He let me see the Ram one night, the one with Golden Fleas,
And pointed out the Fishes in the Pie Seas of the sky.
I couldn't find the Fishes, so I tried to find the Pie,
And found it, too, all by myself,
On Aunt Lucinda's pantry shelf!

David's Little Friend

BY SUSAN HUBBARD MARTIN.

"David wants to buy some land adjoining his cabin," announced Willard Baxter to his wife.

She looked up.

She was a pretty, slender woman with blue eyes and abundant chestnut hair. She had been very delicate and ailing until she had come to this Colorado ranch, but the pure air and splendid sunlight had worked a miracle. She was almost robust now.

Beatrice, aged eight and the only child, was busy with her kitten near by.

"More land, why does he want that?" answered his wife. "He has more than he needs already."

"Yes, I know, but he is anxious for it, besides ready to pay the money. I think David wants to branch out a little. He has plans of his own, no doubt, and I don't like to refuse." "He seems rather heavy-hearted of late," replied Millicent Baxter thoughtfully.

Willard nodded.

"No one knows that better than I do. I had occasion to get up for some water the other night. Beatrice wanted a drink, you remember? As I passed the window, I saw him wandering about under the trees. It was bright moonlight and I recognized him at once. John, one of the men down at the bunk house and his closest friend, says he often does that. Wanders about over the ranch half the night. The fact is, dear, he has a wife in England and the poor fellow is pining for her."

"Why doesn't she come out?" asked his wife quickly. "David seems to be a fine, steady fellow."

"He is, but there was a quarrel of some kind," replied her husband. "I am really attached to the fellow and I wish he were happier. He is the best workman I have and indispensable on the ranch. He's a genius when it comes to handling tools. I couldn't manage without David, and, Millicent, you'd be surprised to see his cabin. It is a perfect marvel of neatness and order and he has made some really artistic furniture. Some one ought to let his wife know how much we think of him, it might help."

Little Beatrice looked up.

"I will," she cried.

She was a beautiful child with brown eyes and thick, dark curls.

Being alone as she was and away from other children, she had developed more than the ordinary child. She could read and write exceptionally well, and besides that was really a fine little speller.

Willard Baxter and his wife both smiled.

"So David's your friend, is he?" her father asked, stooping to stroke the soft curls.

"Yes," answered the child gravely, "and, father, what do you think he is making?"

"I don't know, Beatrice."

"A bookcase, a beautiful bookcase—there's carving on it, too, and when that is done he told me he was going to make a china closet.

"I asked him," added the child as she stroked her kitten's sleek, little head, "who they were for and, mother, he groaned, really groaned and then he said so sorrowful:

"For Alice, though she may never see them," and then he said to me in such a solemn way:

"Little Beatrice, I keep busy and I make things for the cabin. I try to keep it nice for her. Alice is my wife though she will not come."

"Did you ever do anything to make her angry, David?" I asked.

"And then he sighed."

"Plenty of things but I thought perhaps she might forgive me, little friend."

"Alice, that is her is it?" remarked Willard Baxter. "Well, it is too bad for him. A woman can be very unforgiving at times, but I suppose there's something back of it," and then the subject dropped.

But little Beatrice did not forget.

"John," she asked one day, "do you know where David came from?"

"Sure, the same place as I did in old England."

Little Beatrice caught his hand.

"John," she said earnestly, "I love David."

"Aye," answered John, "So do I, my bit lassie."

"Well," answered the child, "I want to write a letter to his wife."

"You do?"

"Yes, and won't you help me?"

"I'm going to tell her how David has fixed up the cabin and what pretty furniture he's made, and I'm going to tell her too, that he's very unhappy. And John—"

"Yes, lassie."

"Sometimes he gets up and walks in the night. Father saw him."

"Aye, child, I knew it. He can't hide his misery from his old friend."

"Well, John, I'll write the letter and you direct it and don't let us tell anyone about it."

"That we won't," returned John heartily. "And may blessings be upon your head whether anything comes of it or not. You're a true little friend."

In one of England's little villages in Yorkshire, Alice Thomas sat at work. She was a dark haired, young woman of twenty-eight or so with an erect figure and firm well-shaped hands.

She sat at a window in the cottage kitchen. She wore a blue linen dress and a white apron. Everything about her was scrupulously neat.

A woman came into the room. Evidently her mother.

"A letter for you," she said—and then she hesitated. "It is from America," she added, "but it isn't in David's writing. Oh, Allie, lass, I wish you and David were at peace."

A proud look swept over the fine face.

"That will do, mother," she replied.

"There, give me the letter."

But she did not open it.

"It was his fault," she cried with bitterness. "Why should he take that boat for America and leave me as he did. He knew I did not mean half I said. But he can bide his time now. I'll not go to him, nor—will I write."

"Oh, Allie, and you're a Christian."

"We won't speak of that, mother."

"Well, then, I'll say no more but open your letter, lass."

Alice Thomas took it up again and opened it. She stared somewhat at the round childish letters.

"Dear Mrs. Thomas," it began:

"I thought perhaps you might like to hear about your husband. He works on our ranch and is my best friend. He has made me a sled, a house for my dog, and a beautiful little desk. But that is not what I wanted to tell you about. He has a cabin of his own. He doesn't like to live as the other men do and he has fixed it up so nice and he has just finished such a pretty bookcase. He says he is pretending you are going to come, though he knows you never will, but you will, won't you?

David is so good. Not a bit like the rest of the men and papa says he is very unhappy. He saw him the other night walking about when everyone else was in bed. We all love David and we do wish you would come out and make him comfortable. He works for my papa and we live on the Green Mountain ranch out in Colorado. We go four miles to get our mail and the name of the place is Pine. I do hope you will come.

I have been a long time writing this letter, but John said he would direct it for me. John is David's friend.

I will close now and will sign myself as papa does, Yours sincerely,

Beatrice Grace Baxter."

Alice Thomas' face flushed. Her fine lips quivered. She laid the letter down, then took it up again.

"Bad news?" asked her mother anxiously.

Without speaking, Alice laid the letter in her mother's hands.

Out in Colorado the frost came nights, but in the sun it was still warm. A purple haze veiled the mountains and a stillness born of the waning year was in the air. In the canyons, the leaves gleamed scarlet and yellow.

David, outside the cabin door, saw Beatrice coming.

"I've brought you some spice cake, David," she said, "and have you begun on the china cabinet yet? Mother says I may give you a plate for it."

David looked at her with sad eyes.

"It doesn't seem to grow very fast, Beatty," he said.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, JUNE 19.

Theme for the Day.—The Nations and the Bible.

Scripture.—And he will lift up an ensign to the nations from far.—Isa. 5:26.

I am sanctified in them in the sight of many nations.—Ezek. 39:27.

Out from the heart of nature rolled
The burdens of the Bible old;
The litanies of nations came,
Like the volcano's tongue of flame,
Up from the burning core below,
The canticles of love and woe.
—Emerson ("The Problem.")

Prayer.—Our Father, we thank Thee for Thy hold Word, which has come to us laden with the hopes, the sufferings and the triumphs of Thy people through many generations. It has opened to us the secret of the divine life as revealed in Christ, and it has made clear to us the long and painful preparation for his coming. On this day of worship we meet Thy people in the sanctuary to join in Thy worship and to listen to the message of the gospel. And may the Word be preached with power whenever the name of Christ is honored. We ask for his sake. Amen.

MONDAY, JUNE 20.

Theme for the Day.—America's Call to the Oppressed.

Scripture.—Behold, I have given him for a witness to the peoples, a leader and commander to the peoples. Behold, thou shalt call a nation that thou knowest not; and a nation that knew not thee shall run unto thee, because of Jehovah thy God, and for the Holy One of Israel.—Isa. 55:3, 5.

There's freedom at thy gates and rest
For Earth's down-trodden and opprest,
A shelter for the hunted head,
For the starved laborer toil and bread.
Power, at thy bounds,
Stops and calls back his baffled hounds.
—Bryant ("America.")

Prayer.—O God of our land, we praise Thee for the history through which Thou hast brought us. On the foundations laid by our fathers under Thy providence there has been builded a nation which opens its doors to the oppressed of all the earth. Help us our Father, so to understand the problem presented by the thousands who come to us from beyond the sea, that we shall appreciate the hope with which they come, and shall try to interpret to them both our national ideals and our Christian faith. Amen.

TUESDAY, JUNE 21.

Theme for the Day.—The Higher Wisdom.

Scripture.—Seeing that the Jews ask for signs, and Greeks seek after wisdom; but we preach Christ crucified, unto Jews a stumbling block, and unto Gentiles foolishness; but unto them that are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God.—I. Cor. 1:22-24.

Oh, when I am safe in my sylvan home,
I tread on the pride of Greece and Rome;
And when I am stretched beneath the pines,
Where the evening star so holy shines,
I laugh at the lore and pride of man,
At the sophist schools and the learned clan;
For what are they all, in their high conceit,
When man in the bush with God may meet?
—Emerson ("Good-bye, Proud World.")

Prayer.—Father of grace, Thou God of wisdom and of might, we are very weak and ignorant, and we lean on Thy sustaining love for our welfare. We thank Thee for such knowledge as we can secure from study. Thou hast given us many opportunities of self-enrichment in the institutions of learning which abound in our land. But help us not to be satisfied with these aids alone, but to seek the true wisdom which comes down from above, and which Thou freely givest to those who ask, in Jesus name. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22.

Theme for the Day.—The Breath of God.

Scripture.—Thou didst blow with thy wind.—Ex. 15:10.

Awake, O north wind; and come, thou south; blow upon my garden.—Song of Solomon 4:16.

But Jehovah sent out a great wind upon the sea.—Jonah 1:4.

Winnow me through with thy keen, clean breath,
Wind with the tang of the sea.
Speed through the closing gates of the day,
Find me and fold me, have thy way
And take thy will of me.

Use my soul as you used the sky,
Gray sky of this sullen day.
Clear its doubt, as you sped the wrack
Of the storm-cloud, bringing the splendor back,
Giving it gold for gray.

Prayer.—Our Father, in our consciousness of imperfection and sin, we yearn for Thy cleansing breath to purge us from all evils of flesh and spirit. Thou knowest how little we attain to the ideals set before us in the life of Jesus, or even in our own best hours. Winnow the chaff out of our lives, we beseech Thee, and give us the joy of the clean heart and the pure mind. For we ask in Jesus' name. Amen.

THURSDAY, JUNE 23.

Theme for the Day.—The Witness in the Sky.

Scripture.—My loving kindness will I keep for him forevermore. . . . It shall be established forever as the moon, and as the faithful witness in the sky.—Psa. 89:28-37.

And forever and forever,
As long as the river flows,
As long as the heart has passions,
As long as life has woes.

The moon and its broken reflections
And its shadow shall appear,
As the symbol of love in heaven,
And its wavering image here.
—Longfellow ("The Bridge.")

Prayer.—Our God and Father, Thou hast made the heavens and the earth for Thy glory, and in all their changes Thy glory is made known. We praise Thee for the beauty of the day and the quiet and mystery of the night. May the moon and the stars which Thou hast ordained be constant witnesses to us of Thy providence, and may they behold nothing in our lives save what Thou canst approve. Amen.

FRIDAY, JUNE 24.

Theme for the Day.—The Green of Summer.

Scripture.—The fig tree ripeneth her green figs, and the vines are in blossom. They give forth their fragrance.—Song of Solomon 2.13.

Now is the high tide of the year,
And whatever of life hath ebbed away
Comes flooding back with a ripply cheer,
Into every bare inlet and creek and bay;
Now the heart is so full that a drop overfills it,
We are happy now because God wills it;
No matter how barren the past may have been,
'Tis enough for us to know that the leaves are green.
—Lowell ("The Vision of Sir Launfal.")

Prayer.—Father of mercies, we adore Thee that Thou hast given us so marvelous a world in which to live, with its changing seasons and its never-ending sources of satisfaction. We grow ashamed when we stop to think of our own selfish negligence of Thy goodness, and our failure to enjoy the loveliness Thou hast spread about us. Help us this day to really open our hearts to the good that Thou art sending us, and to receive in thankfulness the gifts of nature at Thy hands. Amen.

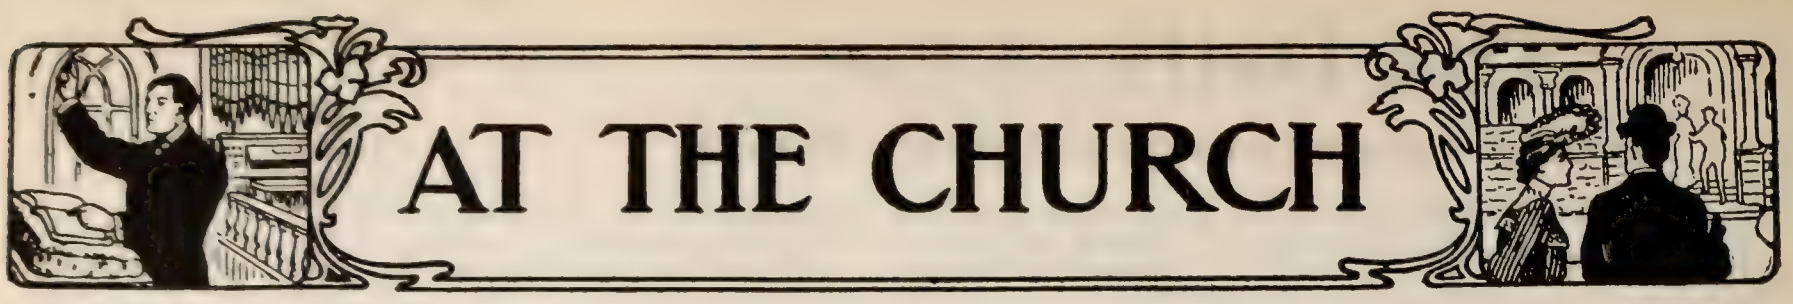
SATURDAY, JUNE 25.

Theme for the Day.—The Sin of Foolishness.

Scripture.—It is an honor for a man to keep aloof from strife; but every fool will be quarreling.—Prov. 20:3.

The words of a wise man's mouth are gracious; but the lips of a fool will swallow up himself.—Eccl. 10:12.

'Tis not by guilt the onward sweep
Of truth and right, O Lord, we stay;
'Tis by our follies that so long
We hold the earth from heaven away.



The ill-timed truth we might have kept—
Who knows how sharp it pierced and stung!
The word we had not sense to say—
Who knows how grandly it had rung!
—Edward Rowland Sill ("The Fool's Prayer.")

Prayer.—Gracious God, we confess before Thee our sins and our follies. Sinful we are, and still more foolish. We miss daily a thousand blessings of Thy sending, because we will not see or understand. We make daily a thousand mistakes that do harm we cannot calculate. Help us to learn wisdom from Thee, dear Father, and so to order our lives that we may bring our days and weeks to happier issue. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Friends Tried and True

The little dog drooped what tail he had,
The broken doll fainted away,
And poor Teddy Bear was filled with despair
When the new doll came to stay.
"Oh, have you forgotten old friends?" they cried,
But the little girl didn't hear,
As she cuddled with joy her new-found toy,
And sang in its waxen ear.

But the days flew by, and she missed her friends,
Though she cherished the new love, too,
But the waxen girl with the flaxen curl
Played none of the games they knew.
So she hunted around till she found them all,
And they snuggled up close to her breast,
And never a word of reproach was heard
As she whispered, "Old friends are best."—

THE TWO CROPS.*

The teachings of Jesus, like those of the prophets of old, were sometimes intended to explain the problems of common experience, as well as to set forth the facts of the kingdom of God. It was necessary at times during the history of ancient Israel to throw some light upon a difficult question by means of a parable, a vision, or a striking figure of speech. When the returned exiles were mourning because they were unable to build walls about Jerusalem, Zachariah attempted to cheer them with the vision of a city protected of God and therefore not needing walls, and so large that no walls could enclose it. When the people were troubled over the fact that all those who made up the population of the slowly growing city were of middle age, such as had been able to make the long journey from Babylon, another vision was set forth by the prophet in which the streets were pictured as full, both of old people and of boys and girls. In this way the prophets sought to reassure the troubled souls of their time by such figurative presentations of God's purpose as seemed to make the present problem more easy of conprehension.

Purpose of the Story.

Even so Jesus sought to relieve the minds of his people when the difficulties of the mixed state of human life became hard for them to comprehend. They saw that those who followed after the Lord were still but few in numbers, and even these few were compound of mingled good and evil qualities. They could not always be depended upon to choose the right and avoid the wrong. How was this unhappy and perplexing state of affairs to be explained? How in a moral universe could God permit evil men to continue prosperous and powerful, and why should bad qualities be allowed to have partnership with good in the lives of so many whom they knew? It was this problem on which Jesus wished to throw light when he told the disciples and the multitudes the parable of the tares.

The character of farming in the East was very different from that which prevails with us. The fields are small and are not divided from each other by fences or hedges such as mark the limits of our own fields. The land which is capable of cultivation is divided into strips or parcels of ground by means of small stone piles here and there, and by nothing more. Fencing material is too valauble in that land, save where the stones are sufficiently abundant, and even then most eastern farmers are too careless to take the trouble to make boundary barriers. If then one of these farmers had an enemy who was intent upon doing him injury it would be very easy to scatter seed of some inferior or noxious sort upon the small acreage of the man he hated. Of course, with the large farms of our American sort such an action would involve far too much labor to make it worth while; but the little patches of ground cultivated by the farmers of Palestine could easily be spoiled by such acts of vandalism. That incidents of the kind were not unknown would seem to be the clear suggestion of the story, for Jesus usually chose familiar incidents to point his lessons.

The Hidden Meaning.

Neither the multitude nor the disciples understood what he meant when he told the story. Probably the people found in it merely the suggestion that grain and nettles were likely to grow together in any plot of ground, and that a man must be thankful who was able to secure any reasonable percentage of good wheat or barley from his land. But the disciples were not satisfied with this explanation. They had learned that Jesus' stories had always a deeper meaning than at first appeared. Moreover he had explicitly told them that he had a special reason for giving his teachings in this story form, and that while he did not wish the scribes to know the meaning of his words, he was more than anxious to have his disciples comprehended every item of the narrative. And so he gave them the interpretation.

It would seem at first glance as if Jesus in this explanation violated his general principle of adhering to one single impressive truth in each parable. Our study of these stories has convinced us that Jesus had always one thing to say in each parable and no more, and that to look for hidden meanings in the details of the story is to miss the central fact. Here it would seem at first as if Jesus explicitly gave values to each one of many items. He defines the sower, the field, the good and bad seed, the enemy, the harvest and the reapers. Yet he has not really departed from his custom of making explicit the one leading idea. In so doing he accepts without reserve the familiar language of Jewish apocalyptic and symbol. There is the usual distinction between the children of good and the children of evil. There is the figure of the devil, the antagonist of God and of all good purposes. There is the usual idea of the judgment to come and of the angels who are to execute the divine will. In the use of these familiar and habitual elements of Jewish belief Jesus employs that great law of accommodation, without necessarily committing himself to any of the external items of the picture.

The Mingling of Good and Evil.

The thing which he wishes to make clear to the disciples is his recognition of the fact that good men and bad men are apparently so closely related in the social order of the world that it is impossible to separate them without destroying the entire fabric. What is the explanation of this perplexing fact? Christian people have been puzzled over it through all the centuries. More than this, they have tried to remedy it by one or another supreme experiment. They have attempted the plan of isolating all the good in religious institutions, leaving the evil to perish in their sins. That was the spirit of monasticism. They have tried the plan of holy orders, in which the good were supposed to be set apart in a class by themselves, distinguished by dress, manners or title from the common and sinful herd. That was Phariseeism. They have attempted to organize little bodies of the strictly orthodox in denominations and churches, so exclusive as to limit the grace of God and the forgiving power of the gospel to these small and contented companies of the saved. That is arrogance and spiritual pride.

As over against all this Jesus sets his teaching in this parable. In the nature of the case the good cannot be separated in any such drastic way. In the grain field such a process would destroy the entire crop. In human society it would deprive the unsocial and selfish portion of humanity, here called the tares, from all the redemptive and uplifting tendencies of the men and women who have the right to be known as the wheat. It is clear that no figure of speech such as our Saviour here employs can describe all the facts. It is only the central truth that can be made clear, namely, that to the end of the day there will be complex conditions in the world and that good and bad will be found associated in every enterprise.

Daily Influences.

But there are two features to this truth which are implicit in the workings of the kingdom, to which the parable can make no reference. The first is the vital nature of human relations in the interaction of different characters upon each other. The wheat and the tares do not affect each other save as they struggle for the soil which both require. But the evil men and women are active and potent influences in opposition to the ideals of the kingdom of God, and are never inert or unconcerned. For this reason those who are the children of the kingdom have always to keep themselves in the attitude of awareness and effort. Things will not remain in poise. No putting off until some future day is possible, for every day may be one of crisis, every day is a day of judgment. What the final verdict will be will depend upon the accumulated results of daily struggle in behalf of the right.

The Struggle of Good and Evil.

The second fact which the parable does not discuss, but clearly suggests, is that none of the wheat is wholly good and none of the tares are wholly bad. The conflict of tendencies in human nature is one of the subtle and perplexing facts which often baffles any attempt to classify men and women in a satisfactory way. We speak of good people and bad people, as if it were perfectly clear to which company any particular individual belongs. Yet there is no moment short of the last when it is possible to pronounce a finished verdict on a human life. In the best of men there are qualities of evil that require constant vigilance to repress and conquer. In the worst of men there are promptings toward good and yearnings after the right that if taken at an opportune time may be nourished into effective and transforming forces. It is this ever mobile and uncertain quality in human life which makes the fascination and the discouragement of all redemptive effort. The failures of the good would crush us to earth were it not that tn redemption of the evil is a constant proof of the grace of God and the salvability of human nature. And so in every life in proportion as it is willing to receive the truth and pay the price of the achievement of character, the gospel proves itself afresh to be the power of God unto salvation.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Money, Men and Prayers—The Three Great Missionary Needs. June 26. II. Cor. 8:1-9; Matt. 9:35-38.

Given sufficient money, enough men, and ceaseless prayers the evangelization of the world in this generation would be an accomplished fact. None of us doubt that there is money enough, nor believe that there is a lack of men, but is there a sufficiency of prayer? Not the mere mouthing of stock phrases in petition nor the agonizing in the closet at stated periods after which we go thoughtless and unconcerned about our selfish pursuits and interests. That is perfectly useless, yes, mockery. If all Christendom were to engage in such performances every day for a century it would profit nothing. But by prayer we mean that intense longing of our hearts for lost souls which will not only send us on our knees to the closet where we will pour out our longings to God in petition that they may be saved, but will send us away from home into these dark lands to tell the message as it did Livingston, Carey and Morrison. These men prayed a true prayer unto Jehovah. God heard their prayer and answered it because their longing to save the lost was the ambition of their whole souls as their lives of service indicated. No prayer is a prayer until we have exhausted all of the power we possess to realize the object for which we pray. Men and money—all things wait and depend on this kind of prayer. Yes, and when we get this kind of prayer, men and money, all things will come. The kingdoms of this world will become the kingdom of our Lord.

The progress of missions in this century prove the truth of this statement. When in the opening of the last century these men who petitioned the throne began to carry their petitions into action, the doors of heathen nations, all of which were closed, began to open. Now the gospel can be preached anywhere if we can find men who will go and take it. Late in the century came the Student Voulnteer Movement, when students in the colleges and universities ceased mouthing their petitions, but after pouring out their souls in petition they said: "Lord, here am I, send me." There are enough to go, but lo, there are not funds with which to equip them, to feed and clothe them while they tell the story of salvation to the lost and dying.

Give us such prayers—prayers of the heart rather than of the lips—from our Christian Endeavorers, yes among all Christians, young and old, and they would be giving of their boundless wealth more than enough to save all the lost. J. Campbell White has told us that six cents per week—a street car fare and a stick of chewing gum—from each Christian would accomplish the evangelization of the world in this generation. That seems so small that we smile at it. But how many give that much from our weekly salary? Do I? Do you? Did you ever stand up in the Endeavor prayer meeting and pray for missions? Do you think that God heard your prayer when you were not willing to take six cents out of six days work—a penny a day and this too when money is the one thing lacking? Let us pray a true prayer and the world will be converted, for we cannot pray a true prayer without doing our best to bring it about.

Dandelion

A Story for the Nursery

BY FAY STUART.

Ruth's birthday present from Grandma Moore was a pretty kitten. It was ever so plump and frisky; papa said it looked like a lively yellow ball of fur.

Mamma thought that Marigold would be a good name for kitty, but when Royal said, "Let's call him Dandelion," Ruth clapped her hands in delight.

"That is a lovely name,' she said, "for he looks just like a fluffy dandelion blossom. I'll call him Dandy, for short."

The kittens eyes were bright blue and grandma said they would never turn yellow like common cats' eyes. His tail was very short like a rabbit and Ruth knew it would never grow long, for his mother was a Manx cat with a bob tail.

Ruth tied a blue ribbon belonging to her doll around Dandelion's neck. She gave him a rubber ball to play with and had great frolics all about the play-room. When he wanted to play he would hunt all around until he found the ball and roll it coaxingly toward Ruth until she threw it for him.

Royal tied a piece of paper on a string and hung it from the door-knob. Danedlion would sit up like a little rabbit and strike at the paper with his great double paw.

When he got sleepy, he would creep away and roll up in a soft, cosy, purring ball upon Ruth's doll-bed. But at night mamma insisted that he must sleep in his warm nest of hay in the shed.

Out of doors, Dandelion followed Ruth about like a little dog. He was very gentle and would let her wrap him in a blanket and carry him, just like any baby, over to see grandma. Indeed, he sometimes wore a little bonnet with ribbons tied under his chin, which made him look very funny. Ruth tried to give him a ride in her doll's carriage, but Dandelion did not like that at all and kept jumping out.

One day, Royal was building a tall castle of blocks. He was just placing the last block at the very top, when Dandelion came galloping in rolling the rubber ball. Before Royal could stop him, he ran against the tall building and it fell with a crash.

"You hateful thing!" he cried, bursting into tears. "You've spoiled all my work," and catching up a block he threw it angrily at poor Dandelion.

"You shall not hurt my kitten!" cried Ruth, as she took Dandelion up and held him safely in her arms.

"He tumbled my blocks down; I will hit him!" replied Royal, stamping his foot and throwing another block.

Then he stopped crying and stood still in dismay. Instead of hitting Dandelion, he had knocked down the green vase filled with roses. It lay upon the floor in bits of broken glass.

Ruth ran to get a cloth to wipe the water from the carpet.

"Oh, my pretty vase!" cried mamma. "Tell me just how it happened, children."

When she had listened to the story, mamma said in a sad voice, "I am very sorry that my little boy should get so angry. Dandelion is only a kitten; he did not mean to do any harm. The castle might be builded again as good as new by this time if you had only laughed at the accident and gone to work. Now I want you to sit very still in this chair, Royal, and think it all over."

Pretty soon, Royal slipped down and went to the room where mamma was sewing.

"Please, mamma, I want to whisper," he said. "I'm sorry I got mad, an' Ill never try to hurt Dandy again, and when I have pennies enough, I'll buy you another vase."

Mamma kissed him and the children were soon playing happily again. They rolled the rug into a long tunnel and coaxed Dandelion to chase the ball through. Then they built a block bridge with an arch and Dandelion ran through that. Once he knocked it over, but this time the children both laughed.

"Mamma says to never mind," said Royal, "cause we can build a better one next time. Something horrid always happens when I get mad and I'm not going to any more."

Mary Ann Hubble

I once knew a woman named Mary Ann Hubble,
And this woman always was looking for trouble.
She was looking all day from the time she got up
To the candlelight hour when she sat down to sup.
She would look all around her, and search high and low—
Just looking for trouble where'er she would go.
And you may be sure that this Mary Ann Hubble
Had more than her share of what people call trouble.

—St. Nicholas.

Beatrice did not answer for a moment. Then she looked up.

"Let's pretend she's coming," persisted the child.

"When you pretend and pretend, sometimes things come true."

David dropped upon the doorstep.

"If she only would," he cried.

As he spoke, a wagon came slowly up the road.

He looked at it.

"Arundel's team," he said. "I wonder what he's coming here for?"

The wagon came nearer—stopped.

A young woman alighted.

A young woman with clear, true eyes, erect shoulders and a quick, firm step. David stood transfigured.

Nearer came the young woman treading lightly over the buffalo grass.

"David," said a clear, soft voice.

And the next moment it seemed as if Heaven had opened for poor, lonely David. His arms went tight about her. Big sobs shook his frame.

"I didn't mean it, lass," he cried. "I'm sorry, sorry."

Soft lips found his own. "Neither did I, Davy," whispered his Alice, but I wouldn't give in until—a letter came, a child's letter, and when I read it, the ice in my heart swelled into a warm and sudden flood. All the old bitterness vanished. She told me about the bookcase and all that you were doing for me. The sleepless nights—and when I read it—I couldn't stay away."

"A child's letter?" faltered David.

Little Beatrice came forward. "It was me, David," said a sweet, little voice. "You don't care, do you?"

"Care?"

David lifted her high in his arms, hugging her close. "You've brought me back the light of life, little friend."

Church Life

—The Educational number of the Christian Century will be issued next week.

—News of the colleges, will be given a prominent place in the Educational number next week.

—Dr. and Mrs. Herbert L. Willett will leave next week for a two weeks' trip in the West. Dr. Willett has continuous lecture engagements for the trip.

—It would be of interest to the readers of The Christian Century if the preachers who have their vacations planned would send a card for publication telling their friends of their plans.

—The Bethany Graded Lessons for the Autumn quarter should be ordered early for there is likely to be an unusual demand for them. This system has been in operation for just one year, and where it has been adopted the schools would not think of returning to the ungraded lessons.

—The article on Edinburg, the place of the meeting of the World's Missionary Conference, which will be attended by a number of the pastors and editors of the Disciples, will be read with interest, and will quicken the interest with which we may look forward to the complete report of the meeting, to be made in these columns by Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor of The Christian Century who is now at the conference.

The building of the church at Dixon, Ill., recently has been completely overhauled, and was rededicated Sunday, June 12.

A. R. Harper, formerly pastor of the Baptist church at Mt. Pleasant, has become pastor of the Disciples of the same city.

J. W. Borden, who completes his work in Hiram College this months becomes pastor of the church at Waldron, Mich.

A new pipe organ has been installed in the church at Amarillo, Texas., where W. P. Jennings is pastor, at a cost of $3,150.

J. R. Perkins, formerly of the West Side Church, San Francisco, preached at Modesto, California, June 5th.

Oliver W. Stewart, of Chicago, addressed the Men's Club of the First Church, Champaign, Ill., at a recent meeting.

The First Church, Warren, Ohio, observed Children's Day Sunday, June 12. J. M. Van Horn is acting pastor of this church.

George Darsie, pastor of the church at Akron, Ohio, is president of the State Convention for the coming year. The meeting will be in Portsmouth.

Charles E. McVay, of Hardy, Neb., will sing for Evangelist Lew D. Hill of Queen City, Mo., in a meeting in July, and at Truscott, Texas, in a camp meeting in August.

C. A. MacDonald and wife have just completed a seven months' Sunday-school campaign in Missouri. They should be kept busy at such work.

H. H. Harmon, pastor of the First Church, Lincoln, Neb., who is now abroad, has been elected platform manager for the Chautauqua at Auburn, Neb., August 5 to 14. Mr. Harmon expects to be home by June 29.

I. H. Teel, pastor of the church at Ukiah, Cal., is assisting W. A. McCousland in a meeting at Christian Colony, Cal. W. P. Bentley of Berkeley will supply at Ukiah during Mr. Teel's absence.

J. J. White, who recently resigned his work as religious director of the San Francisco Y. M. C. A., is supplying the pulpit of the West Side Church during the month of June. He is available for the pastorate.

J. J. Haley, who has been supplying the pulpit of the church at Modesto, California, has been called to the pastorate of the Lodi Church and will begin work there the first of July.

I. C. Smith has been called from Miller, So. Dak., to Sioux Falls, which is felt to be a strategic field. The work opens very hopefully. Good audiences are hearing the new pastor.

W. S. Goode, who has been pastor of the Central Church, Youngstown, Ohio, for ten years has accepted a call to the Lakewood Church, Cleveland, and will begin work there the first of September.

The Brotherhood of the First Church, Galesburg, Ill., recently entertained the Brotherhood of the Knoxville church. The program of the evening consisted of music and addresses, preceded by a fine spread, of course.

Dr. Errett Gates, Associate Professor in Church History in the University of Chicago, Now Spending a Year in Study Abroad.

T. A. Lindenmeyer, minister for the church at Frankton, Ind., delivered the baccalaureate sermon for the graduating class of the Frankton high schools and the Memorial sermon in honor of the old soldiers on Memorial Sunday.

A. J. Saunder who recently left Chicago, has located with the church at Fremantle, West Australia. He says the prospects are good "for much hard organizing work." Mr. Saunder's address in 279 High street, Fremantle, West Australia.

The Annual Dinner and Meeting of the Chicago Christian Business Men's Association was held Thursday evening, June 9th at the Boston Oyster House. Prof. W. D. McClintock, of the University of Chicago, made the principle address on "Missions in China and the Philippines."

Prof. O. B. Clark of Drake University recently delivered an address at the annual program of the Mississippi Valley Historical Association at Iowa City. The address has been very highly commended by some first-class authorities.

B. B. Tyler, South Broadway Church, Denver, says: "All goes well with us in Denver. 'Our People' are doing better in this 'Queen City of the Plains' than for a number of years. The Central Church observed Children's Day June 5. The missionary offering of the Sunday-school was $110."

Harvey H. Harmon, pastor of the First Church, Lincoln, Neb., while on his trip abroad this summer is writing a note each day for publication in the parish paper of the church at Lincoln. In this way the church will enjoy with him the delightful trip.

The large choir of the Central Church, Des Moines, Iowa, as a fitting close of their faithful work of the year gave a fine musical program Sunday evening, May 31. Next year the choir will be under the direction of Prof. Murrison, and it is expected that it will number as many as seventy-five voices.

M. M. Nelson, of Monte Vista, Colorado, delivered the baccalaureate sermon before the graduates of the high school, and also delivered an address to the old soldiers on Memorial Day. The National Soldiers' and Sailors' Home is located here. Four added by confession and baptism recently.

The Fifth (Illinois) District Missionary Convention was held at Petersburg June 14 to. The C. W. B. M. sessions were held Tuesday afternoon and evening. The evening address of the state program was made by C. G. Kindred, pastor of the Englewood Church, Chicago.

The River Street Church of Christ, Troy, N. Y., was on June 5 surprized by the resignation of its pastor, Cecil J. Armstrong, to take effect December 31 next. During the four years that he has been with that church the work has prospered. His plans for the future are altogether unformed.

The men's clubs of the four churches of the Disciples in Danville, Ill., on a recent evening held a meeting in Lincoln Park of that city. A banquet was served at 7:30 and followed by addresses by P. C. Macfarlane and Arthur Holmes. The occasion was greatly enjoyed by a large number of men.

During June, W. F. Rothenburger, of the Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, is preaching the following series of sermons: "The Sin of Incompleteness;" "The Value of Right Friendships;" "The Christian Dignity of Labor." The last Sunday evening in the month will be given over to a program of sacred music.

Many Summer Conferences for Christian Workers are being announced. Lake Geneva is alluring Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. workers from all parts of the United States. Winona Bible Conference, beginning August 19th, has a rare program again. Northfield and Old Chautauqua are inviting. Some of the greatest movements of the present generation were born in the Summer Conferences.

The members of the Memorial Church, Chicago, on June 9, took advantage of the invitation of E. M. Barton to come to his home at Hinsdale, for a picnic. Mr. Barton owns twelve hundred acres of land at Hinsdale, and has on it a very fine herd of the famous Swiss Jersey cattle, with a model dairy. It was a matter of great interest to many members of the party to see the operation of this large model farm.

A. R. Adams, pastor of the Forest Avenue Christian Church, Muskegon, reports the result of eleven months' work in the city as follows: Sermons, 84; special addresses, 27; new members added to the church, 48; pastorial calls, 1,216. Mr. Adams has been recalled for another year with an increase of salary of $100. The state board as well as the church are well pleased with the work done in Muskegon.

Harvey Hazel, of Los Angeles, closed a three weeks' meeting at Beaumont, Cal., May 31st, resulting in the organization of a church of 43 members and a Sunday School of 50. Mr. Hazel was sent to establish the cause in that beautiful mountain town by the Boyle Heights Church of Los Angeles, of which he is the pastor. The Boyle Heights Church is one of the most progressive churches on the Pacific Coast.

A Federation of Men's Clubs of the churches of Lawrence, Kans., has just been formed. A banquet was held at the Y. M. C. A. at which C. L. Milton, pastor of the Christian Church, and president of the Ministers' Alliance, was toastmaster. The chief address was by Hon. H. M. Beardsley, ex-mayor of Kansas City. He was followed by Dr. Powell of the Presbyterian church. The aim of the federation is to make Lawrence a better place in which to live.

Martha Stout Trimble has just closed a meeting of several weeks at Whiting, Ind. There were fifty-five additions to the local congregation, forty of these by baptism. This practically doubled the membership of the church and the members are encouraged. Mrs. Trimble is now at work in a meeting with the church at Indiana Harbor, where in two weeks there were twenty-five accessions. The meeting continues.

The death of Mrs. Elizabeth Volney, of East Liverpool, Ohio, was cause of sadness to the church and many friends there. Mrs. Volney was born in 1839, and died May 10, 1910. In her girlhood she became a member of the church in Fredericktown, Ohio. She was a charter member of the East Liverpool church, where she remained in faithful service to the hour of her death. The pastor, E. P. Wise, speaks appreciatingly of the influence of her life in the church.

The New First Church at Urbana, Ill., was dedicated June 5th. The services began the preceding Friday evening, when the sermon was preached by Robert Harris of Veedersburg, Indiana, who was formerly pastor of this church. Saturday evening there was another meeting with a sermon by J. F. Burnett, of Dayton, O., who also preached the dedication sermon on Sunday. In the Sunday service pastors of other local churches took parts.

E. B. Barnes, for two years pastor of the Lyons Street Church, Grand Rapids, Mich., has resigned to accept a call to the church at Richmond, Ky., where he goes at a decided increase in salary. Mr. Barnes has added 150 members to the Grand Rapids church in his stay there, and has led the congregation to the place where they are ready to enter upon the task of erecting a new building, which they will do in the near future.

Since February 1, J. Frank Green, associate secretary of the Michigan Christian Missionary Society, has been supplying the pulpit of the new church at Cadillac, Mich. The work here is well organized, and the attendance at all meetings is steadily increasing. Offerings have more than trebled. Harold E. Knott, of Drake University will begin work as pastor of this new church June 19. During the four months that Mr. Green has been with this church he has visited sixteen other churches in the interest of Michigan missions.

Ernest C. Mobley writes of the victory that has been won by the civic righteousness forces in Gainesville Texas. When Mr. Mobley and other ministers took up the fight a year ago there was little disposition on the part of the citizens to take seriously to their work. Much educational work had been done for years, which served as a basis for the work. The campaign was pushed fearlessly and with vigor. Every legitimate means was used for the right. Every illegitimate means was used by the opposing forces. But a majority was won by the good citizens and Gainesville goes dry.

Richard W. Gentry, who received his B. D. degree from the University of Chicago one year ago, and who has since been studying for the Ph. D. degree, has been honored with a fellowship by the university for another year, and will complete his work as speedily as possible. Mr. Gentry regrets that the conditions of the fellowship make it necessary for him to give up the pleasant work in which he has been engaged as associate pastor of the Hyde Park Church of the Disciples. This is necessary that he may do the exacting work of the last year's study for the doctor's degree.

Dr. B. B. Tyler is delivering a series of four addresses of Sunday evenings in the South Broadway Church, Denver. The addresses are: "The Familiar Christian Science Formula, 'Sin, Sickness and Death;'" "How to Understand the Bible Without the Use of the Christian Science Textbook;" Christian Science and the Christianity of Christ." Dr. Tyler is not making a fight upon Christian Science—he is to wise for that—but is making a fair and candid criticism of the movement. Many Christian Science people are among the immense audiences that are hearing him on these subjects.

Nelson Trimble, New Pastor at Gary, Ind.

Nelson H. Trimble who recently gave up the work with the Metropolitan Church Chicago, has been selected by the American Christian Missionary Society to open the work at Gary, Ind. Gary is the "magic city," where within three years a city of 20,000 people has been builded upon the sands of the shore of Lake Michigan. The city has every prospect of soon reaching twice the number. Business houses and residences now built in this wonder city are of the most substantial character, and the whole city is planned on the most approved lines. Mr. Trimble is already at work on the field and reports fine prospects for growth. All who know personally of Mr. Trimbles work in the past have no fear as to the success of the work at Gary under his direction.

At the annual meeting of the Christian Church, Bellefontaine, O., the following report was heard from the pastor, C. C. Wilson, of his seven and one-half months' ministry with the church: Additions to the church, 59—21 by letter and 38 by confession; 34 came under the preaching of Evangelist Lockhart and 25 under the ministry of Allen Wilson. Number lost to the church by letter, 11; by death, 3; total net increase in membership, 45. The congregation endorsed the recommendation of the official board to extend a call to the pastor for the ensuing year.

There have been 557 additions in the meeting held by Scoville and company at Spokane, Wash. A new church has been started at Hillyard, a suburb, where are located the railroad shops, and W. S. Lemon becomes pastor of the new flock. There were forty charter members. The campaign of the city continues, now on the North Side.

Breeden and Lintt have just closed a meeting with the church at Carthage, Mo., where the church is occupying a new $44,000.00 building, and one of the finest in the Southwest. All indebtedness of the church is provided for. There were 143 additions to the church in the meeting which lasted twenty-three days. "The meeting was ideal, and the future is bright" says the pastor, D. W. Moore

J. E. Pickett entered upon his tenth year of service with the Highlands Church, Denver, June first. A anniversary service was held Sunday morning, June fifth, when Mr. Pickett reviewed the work of the nine years. In the evening the service was in the nature of a platform meeting, when many members of the church spoke of the work of these years. In the time of Mr. Pickett's service with this church it has steadily grown in every department, and is now one of the strongest churches of that part of the city, and faces a future with perfect confidence and hope, for they have builded wisely and permanently.

P. H. Duncan, Latonia, Ky., has just concluded a few days meeting at Glencoe, Ky., in which there were seventeen accessions to the church. Of these fourteen were by immersion.

A plan for securing attenrance at the meetings of the Sunday-school of the Christian Church in Higginsville, Mo., recently perpetrated upon the inhabitants of the city, was at a set time to hang a "tag" with the words, "we tag you to come to the Bible-school, etc.," upon the knob of every door in the city. Henry W. Hunter, pastor of the church is making a great reputation for advertising his work. The people of Higginsville will know that he is there and at work.

The new pipe organ of the church at Iowa City, Iowa, was dedicated Sunday morning, June fifth. The sermon was preached by Rev. T. J. Dows, of Minneapolis, Minn., formerly pastor of the church. The organ was presented to the church by the W. M. B. Society of the church. This society had previously given the church: "The Kalsoming," "electric fixtures throughout the building," and "Choir Paneling." Last September the church set out to free itself from debt. They have during the year, with some assistance from friends, spent $2,800.00 for reparis, and paid $2,000.00 of indebtedness, besides keeping up all expenses. The church is entirely out of debt. This is a fine record under the leadership of C. C. Rowlison.

A new church has been organized at Englewood, a suburb of Denver, under the inspiring leadership of T. T. Thompson, pastor of the church at Elyria. A recognition service was held the first Sunday in June, when the Englewood congregation was formerly welcomed into the fellowship of the Denver sisterhood of churches. T. T. Thompson presided at the meeting. J. B. Haston of the East Side Church, gave an address on the "Day of Beginnings"; George B. Van Arsdall of the Central Church, gave an address on the "Duty of the Strong to the Weak"; J. A. Shoptaugh spoke on "Inter-Congregational Fellowship," and J. E. Pickett of the Highlands Church, spoke on the subject, "The Tie that Binds."

The annual meeting of the church at Liberty, Mo., was held the first Friday evening in June. After a half hour of song and praise Judge Sandusky was elected chairman of the meeting. The following budget was adopted for the year which begins July 1: Pastor's salary, $2.000; fuel, $125; lights, $75; janitor, $225; delegate to national convention, $50; insurance, $100; organist, $100; incidentals, $200; total, $2.875. Also the following missionary budget: Foreign missions, $550; American missions, $350. A beautiful picture of Dr. Paul Wakefield, the living link missionary of the church, was presented and a committee appointed to have it framed and placed in the church parlors.

The First Church, Evanston, Ill., under the energetic and intelligent leadership of O. F. Jordan, has added another to its list of activities. This too is best of all. In the section where the church is located there is no kindergarten work in the puplic schools, the building being too crowded. Children from these sections have gone long distances for the privilege of such training. The First Church feeling this need has employed Miss Ada Scott, of DesMoines, to conduct a kindergarten in its building during the summer, and perhaps through next year. Miss Scott is a graduate of the science department and the Normal department of Drake University, and has had some experience in the public schools of DesMoines.

A. J. Saunders, who recently received the degree of B. D. from the University of Chicago, and returned to his home in Australia, whose report of the West Australia Conference appears this week, has set his hand immediately to the task in his homeland. We have an announcement of a series of lectures he gave at Christian Chapel, Bagot Road, Subiago. The general theme of the lectures was "Christian Missions in Many Lands." The special topics were: "A Historical Survey of Christian Missions in the Eighteenth Century," "The Story of Missions in India," "China for Christ," "The Conquest of Japan," "The Enlightenment of the Dark Continent," "The Missionary Propaganda in the New Testament." Mr. Saunders is well equipped and will make his influence felt for the best things among the churches of Australia.

G. B. Baird, of Lu-chow-fu, via Wuhu, China, writes: "Last Sunday (May 8) we had 225 at Sunday-school. We have no regular church building in the city. Our meeting place is the crowded hospital, and the largest room is the patients' waiting room, built to accommodate about 100 persons. We must have money for a proper church building at once or stop trying to enlarge our work. We have 140 men and women enrolled as inquirers at present, but we have no place to take care of them. In Lu-chow-fu we enjoy the weekly visit of the Christian Century very much. You are making it a great paper. We hope that the spirit of your paper may grow stronger in the hearts of the people both at home and on the mission field."

The Missouri State Convention is now in in session at Jefferson City. The C. W. B. M. session is Friday evening and Saturday. Friday evening address by Vernon Stauffer, Angola, Indiana. Saturday addresses by Mrs. S. J. White, Chillicothe, President; Mrs. J. L. Moore, Palmyra; Mrs. M. S. McMahon, Auora; Mrs. St. Clair, Columbia; and Mrs. M. E. Harlan, Indianapolis. Sunday, June 19th, preaching in all offered pulpits. Monday Bible School session. Address by H. W. Hunter, president; L. J. Marshall, Independence; and P. H. Welshimer, Canton, Ohio. The State Missions period begins Tuesday. Convention sermon by R. G. Frank, Liberty. Forenoon and afternoon sessions given to business. Tuesday evening address by Peter Ainslie, Baltimore. Wednesday morning addresses by George H. Combs and G. W. Muckley. Wednesday afternoon, addresses by F. L. Moffett, Springfield; T. W. Grafton, Kansas City; W. A. Shullenberger, Trenton; J. T. Shreve, and C. M. Chilton, St. Joseph; and R. P. Shepherd, St. Louis.

Friday, June 10th, the new West Bluff Chapel, recently built in a day by the churches of Peoria, was dedicated by Arthur Holmes of Philadelphia. In the evening he gave at the Central Church his celebrated Pittsburg address. This building has attracted wide attention through the daily press. The Peoria Evening Journal thus describes the work of magic: "At 7:00 o'clock the foundation—the only preliminary work done—lay bare, just as the Rev. W. A. Price—the ministerial bricklayer of the Howett Street Church, had left it. At 9:00 o'clock the skeleton walls were up, the floor joists all laid and the skirmish fire of hammering had settled down into a continuous broadside of activity. Men swarmed all over the structure. At noon, when there was a brief lull for a Memorial Day service and dinner, the church had assumed shape., the gaunt framework was sheathed and the roof was well on toward completion. At 6:00 o'clock the chapel was finished. But the workers were still filled with zeal and they kept right on, erected a coal shed, ceiled and painted and graded, and the Rev. Price again got busy with the bricks and laid a walk from the front door to the sidewalk."

The Ohio State Convention was held May 31 to June 3, in Central Church Toledo. Prof. George P. Coler of Ann Arbor, Mich., gave Bible studies which were of greatest interest. Secretary Miller's report showed the total amount of money raised to be $13,948. Thirty-two men were supported all or part of their time. Ten missions became self-supporting during the year. President I. J. Cahill made a notable address on "The Disciples Contribution to the Religious Thought and Life of Our Time." Prof. E. I. Bosworth of Oberlin College gave three Bible studies that commanded the best attention of the convention. L. G. Batman, of Youngstown, made the Church Extension address. M. L. Bates made a great plea for Hiram, or the place of the church school. "The Unfinished Task of the Disciples" was the subject of a great address by Peter Ainslie, president of the American Christian Missionary Society. M. E. Chatley of Bowling Green, gave a stirring address on "The Possibilities of Ninety Thousand Active Disciples of Ohio." Of course there was the men's banquet. Three hundred men marched through the streets of the city and to the banquet hall, where speeches were made by some of Ohio's best talent. F. W. Burnham of Springfield, Ill., made the closing address of the convention on Friday evening. His subject was "The Brotherhood Practical."

Follow the International Lesson Committee

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine month or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

Children's Day Offering

The North Tonawanda Tabernacle, North Tonawanda, N. Y., through its Children's Day offering, becomes a living link in the Foreign Society. G. H. Stead is the pastor.

The Children's Day offering at the First Church, Marshall, Mo., where E. P. Wharton is pastor, was $650.00.

The first Sunday in June was a great day with the First Church North, Tonawanda, N. Y. Their offering for Foreign Missions was $421.00. V. W. Blair is pastor of this church.

At the Jackson Boulevard Church, Chicago, Austin Hunter, pastor, the Children's Day offering was $300.00.

F. M. Rains, secretary of the Foreign Society, sends the following word concerning the First Church, Akron, Ohio, George, Darsie, minister: "Great Children's Day. Over one thousand present at Sunday School. School becomes living link. Bethany Class raised one hundred dollars. Church growing in all good works.

Children's Day at Bowling Green, Ohio, was observed with an attendance of 326 in the morning. Audience of 1,000 for evening exercises. Offering for the day $80.43. M. E. Chatley is pastor.

Central Church, Denver, G. B. Van Arsdall, pastor. Missionary offering of the Sunday School, $1,030.00. The Missionary contribution of this church in March was $1,100.00. "This begins to look like a real 'Church of Christ,'" says B. B. Tyler.

South Broadway, Denever, B. B. Tyler, Missionary offering, $110.00.

Wichita, Kansas, Central Church, Walter Scott Priest, pastor. Great day, 714 present, and an offering of $250.00. About $2,000 will be given by this church to Foreign Missions during the year.

Moberly, Mo., Central, S. Boyd White, pastor. Children's Day offering, $175.00, attendance, 1,123.

Deer Creek, Ill., T. L. Reed, pastor. School gave P. H. Duncan's program, fine audience and good offering.

Our offering $230. The program was the best, and the audience the largest we ever had.—E. B. Barnes, Grand Rapids, Mich.

We have gone beyond our appointment this year and are glad.—T. H. Stone, Chapin, Ill.

Offering $120; will be $125.—Walter Mansell, Crawfordsville, Ind.

Our school observed Children's Day with an attendance in the morning of 326, and an audience in the evening to witness the exercises of 1,000. Offering $80.43.—M. C. Chatley, Bowling Green, Ohio.

The Sunday-school at Broadway, Lexington, Ky., raised $120 and expect to make it more.

The Sunday-school at Norwood, Ohio, went beyond $100 on Children's Day.

The first three days following Children's Day 234 Sunday-schools responded, a gain of eighty-two over the corresponding time last year. The schools sent $4,750, a gain of $1,-610. The prospects are bright for a great Children's Day offering.—F. M. Rains.

The Sunday-school at Lizton, Indiana, Roscoe R. Leak, superintendent, raised $126 on Children's Day. This is a good increase over last year.

The Sunday-school at Salem, Ohio, sends $125 to the office of the Foreign Society.

The First Sunday-school, Hannibal, Mo., comes forward promptly with $100.

Mexico, Mo., as usual, comes up with a good offering. This year it amounts to $125.

Mt. Auburn, Ill., Christian Sunday-school has already sent $50.00 as their Children's Day offering.

Gibson City, Ill., is in the procession with $50.00.

Lebanon, Mo., swells the volume of gifts with an offering of $50.00.

Clarinda, Iowa, Wm. Orr, superintendent, is one of the first to step forward with a gift of $135.52. This school has stood loyally by the work many, many years.

Bluff Creek, Indiana, had a great Children's Day offering. The amount was $57.70.

The Lathrop, Mo., Christian Sunday-school has taken an honorable position in the forward movement with a gift of $50.64.

Fruitvale, Cal., responds with $44.77.

Daleville, Indiana, takes a position among the good schools and responds with $50.00 to help evangelize the world.

The Fourth Christian Sunday-school, Indianapolis, Indiana, sends $50. E. H. Clifford is the minister. Henry Powell is the superintendent.

"Enclosed please find check for $355, for which give credit to the Canton, Ohio, Bible-school. This, I believe, completes our $600 for Mrs. Macklin for this year."—P. H. Welshimer, Canton, Ohio.

The Wellington, Kansas, Sunday-school sends us $50.00. This church and school will no doubt soon be in the Living-link rank.

Sixth (Illinois) District Convention

The Sixth District Convention of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society will met at Danville, Tuesday and Wednesday, June 21 and 22.

An interesting program has been prepared. Important business is to be transacted, and a good fellowship time is expected. The churches of Danville extend a hearty invitation to the churches of the district. W. E. Adams, minister of the First Church, will appreciate it if you will drop him a card, telling him how many to expect from your church. The convention will be brief. Please be on hand at the beginning and remain till the close. Every church should be well represented in the convention. Yours for a great convention.

J. Will Walters,
Sullivan, Ill., June 9, 1910. Secretary.

Home Missions

The month of May shows an increase in receipts to the American Christian Missionary Society of $1,166.44; total increase for the first eight months of the year, $14,012.78.

Many churches which failed to contribute last year are sending offerings. May this first year of our second century be the greatest in the history of our mother society.

Our Endeavvorers are planning to observe "Patriotic Day" on July 3. The offerings from these loyal bands of our young people will help greatly in winning our country for Christ and His Church.

Programs for July 3, furnished free of cost.

Jos. W. Helms, Corresponding Secretary of South Carolina reports as follows:

"Our work looks brighter than ever in its history, and the meetings going on at Sumter, Columbia and Laurens, and six meetings planned for July, there will be something to report.

The meeting in Greenwood was a success in every way; forty-three added."

D. C. Kratz, missionary pastor in Irvington, Neb., says:

"Our offering for Home Missions will be taken the third Lord's Day in June, when we expect to have a program. A special effort is being made to reach our apportionment. Our attendance at our services are increasing, and the outlook is more helpful than at any time since the meeting we held in the spring."

Milligan Earnest, North Birmingham, Ala., writes as follows:

"The work moves along nicely. Have just had a good meeting. Sunday-school good. Will send Home Mission offering soon.

An appeal from Winnipeg, Manitoba.

"I might say that $350 more has been pledged on our building fund. We have three meetings on Sundays. Our Sunday-school meets in the afternoon at three. We have the third largest Bible Class in the city. I am sending you a photograph of our church and school. We have a Prayer Meeting and Bible Study Class on Wednesday evenings.

There is much room for foreign mission effort here. To illustrate; in one public school in the north part of the city, there are 590 children, only forty-five Canadian morn. The rest are foreigners, who only go, as a rule, to the third grade. They never reach the seventh. There are great problems here to solve, and the Church of Christ holds the solution. It alone can unite and Christianize these foreigners. We need men and we need money.

we need money.

Missionary Pastor.

The Passing of E. W. Darst

The Disciples of Christ everywhere, and especially in Chicago, will learn with the keenest regret of the death of E. W. Darst. A telegram from Louisville, Ky., sent by Mrs. Darst reads as follows: "Release came to a brave spirit Thursday, June 3rd. at Tuscon, Ariz. We are taking his body to Dayton; enroute since Sunday. Arrive Thursday noon. Your letter meant much to him. Please announce his home-going in the Century, and tell our friends,—Minnie A. Darst." Bro. Darst worked on heroically to the very end. The last few weeks he has spent at Berkeley, Cal., first as pastor of the church there, and later as city evangelist of San Francisco and vicinity. He was tireless in his activities there, as he was in former years in the same work in Chicago. Under this strain his health gradually gave way. He was at Pittsburg at the centennial convention, but was scarcely able to keep his feet. Soon afterward he went to Arizona, hoping to find relief in that warm and dry climate. He was even courageous enough to accept the pastorate of the church in Tuscon. But the shadow was already across his pathway. He had scarcely begun his work there When the end came. Mrs. D.arst hurried from her labors as teacher in the kindergarten school at Berkeley, and was with him during the last days. As indicated in the telegram, the remains were taken to the old home in Dayton, Ohio. Few men have impressed the churches for which they have labored, with a finer sense of consecration, untiring activity and high courage than E. W. Darst. His name will be honored wherever he has been known.

Progress at Drake

I have been renewing my youth in the vitalizing atmosphere of Drake University in a three days' rest between my Nebraska and South Dakota campaigns for Equal Suffrage.

The present hour is a great one for the University. $150,000 has just been secured to preserve the Medical Department. This gratifying response to an urgent demand was made under the leadership of J. H. Stockham, who was recently elected Comptroller of the University. The major part of this large sum was raised in the city of Des Moines, more than $50,000 coming from the business and professional men of the city, together with $25,000 and $12,500 from the county and city governments respectively. As usual, the student boly, alumni and the different faculties were generous contributors.

Out of this home rally has come the determination to secure at once an additional endowment of half a million. $100,000 of this is already pledged on the condition that $400,000 more shall be raised.

This is the hour of destiny for Drake.

The confidence of its home city, the conviction of the Brotherhood that Drake is to be the great central university of the church, by reason of its location in this growing middle-west metropolis, where every tenth person is a Disciple, its eighteen hundred student enrollment, one-sixth of whom come from other states, and its loyalty to the program of the New Testament, all point the way to the immediate concretion of the dream of its founders and early day co-workers.

This attainment is certain. The Board is united and determined. The Administration is wise, able and wide-visioned. The one man in the Brotherhood best fitted by experience and devotion to talk a half million dollars has been found in Brother Stockham. The student body is loyal and keyed to the highest pitch of enthusiasm and the Alumni in a splendid mood for great endeavor.

The sacrifices of other years are giving birth to a greater university. It is coming into its own. The past, great as it is, will seem but the promiseful childhood of the enriched life just ahead. Drake has more than "ten thousand voices" in the nation: let them speak now. Many times ten thousands of lives have been blessed by the ministrations of those who have passed out of her doors. Many of these will not be silent.

Our only regret is that Chancellor Carpenter could not have lived to have seen this triumphal procession grow from that impoverished, straggling little band that camped and set stakes in the hickory forest less than thirty years ago. Their dream and their daring were heroic. They were in the wilderness then. Now beautiful parks and blocks of comfortable homes stretch far beyond University Place, while the one adequate campus is crowded with its nine commodious buildings—a center of Christian learning in the midst of a cultured and inspiring population. It is the ideal Mecca of the pilgrim student searching for the light that falls only where clear thought and service to men dwell together.

To withhold from Drake University at this engaging hour is to withhold from Opportunity.

Barton O. Aylesworth.

Statistics

Several of the State Provincial Secretaries have sent out their annual calls for statistics from all the churches. On many accounts it is of growing importance that these be made as complete and accurate as possible. A report, based on the results gathered from all the States and Provinces, will be made at the Topeka Convention. It ought to be a matter of interest and pride with every church clerk and every minister to assist in making this a trust-worthy statement of the Restoration Movement in the year 1910.

To avoid both repetition and omission, it is requested that each church report its membership according to its roll, including both non-resident and resident members. Anyone knowing of scattered Disciples who are not attached to any local congregation, will please report them separately, to the State Secretary.

W. R. WARREN,
International Statistical Sec'y. of the Disciples of Christ.

Germany's Compulsory Education Law.

Germany has a compulsory education law that works well. It is very simple, and there is no excuse for not understanding it. It reads that a child between the ages of six and fourteen must attend school during all the time school is in session. For every day the child is absent from school without a good, legitimate excuse (there are no more than five legitimate excuses), the parent must pay a sum of money equal in value to fifty cents. The list of unexcused children is handed by the head schoolmaster to the local truant officer, who goes around once every three months and collects the fines. As may well be supposed, the parents see to it that the children are in school. When the law is broken it is a case of pay or go to jail, so they much prefer to have the child in school rather than the old man in jail.

Texas Christian University

Fort Worth, Texas

Located for many years at Waco, Texas. Will remove to Ft. Worth, Texas, and open school in new quarters not later than October 1. The move has been made necessary because of loss by fire of $180,000.00, March 22. Elaborate equipment, liberal endowment, modern, up-to-date accommodations in the home department. Increased facilities for original work in laboratories and library. Increased number and strength in Faculty. Conservative business methods; unusual opportunities for pulpit engagements in the Bible College. Stronger courses in all departments and home influences in school and church are among the features to receive especial attention in the new T. C. U. Health and climatic conditions are unexcelled. We are on the border of a modern, aggressive city and will have the advantages of suburban surroundings, less the distractions to students.

The Soul of Education

Does Education Have Anything in Common with Religion?

There are those who set culture and spirituality over against each other as definitely hostile departments of our life.

A certain sort of scientist scorns religion, and a certain type of pietist scorns education. But a deep enough analysis of our intellectual interests and ideals will reveal the essential likeness of all true culture and all true religion. Our intellectual life is not the cold thing it is often conceived to be, but a warm, heartful experience in which are implicit the most ultimate interests of our religious faith.

One of the great philosophers of modern times, a man who has greatly influenced thinking throughout the English world, makes a confession of faith when he says, "The intellectual effort to understand the universe is a principal way of experiencing the Deity." Speaking of philosophers he says, "All of us are more or less led beyond the religion of ordinary fact. Some in one way, and some in others, we seem to touch and have communion with what is beyond the visible world. In various manners we find something higher, which both supports and humbles, both chastens and transports us."

The two realms of religion and of culture come together in the soul's attitude of reverence.

Reverence is the soul of education and the core of religion. Reverence is the soul of science and the soul of democracy and these two constitute our intellectual life.

Let us see first of all how reverence is the soul of science.

Our modern intellectual attitude is peculiarly characterized by its humility in the presence of a fact. The fact is sovereign. The first and great commandment of the man of science is, "Thou shalt walk humbly among the facts of thy world. Thou shalt reverence a fact with all the mind, and, cost what it may, thou shalt reckon with it."

The search for truth which has been made by modern thinkers has taken on the character of a religion to many of them. When it is understood through what suffering and sacrifice and heroism scholarship has passed in order to find Truth and lay itself upon her altar we cannot help the feeling that the intellectual life must have in it an essential religious quality.

What the intellect really thirsts for is God, though it states its quest in terms of truth.

The whole process of educating the young in the possession of the results and methods of scientific procedure, enabling them thus to add their own increment to the common fund of knowledge is a process whose tap root is reverence. If the teacher, first of all and through all, inspires in his pupil a sense of awe and wonder and inquiry as he stands in the midst of his world, he is a great teacher whether the palpable results of his pupil's efforts are great or small.

Our educational object is not to pass on a certain fixed deposit of truth to our boys and girls, but to develop in them a reverent attitude toward reality by means of which new truth may be revealed from generation to generation.

The second and higher aspect of education is that of one's feeling for one's fellows.

Our schools are not teaching science simply, but are opening the meanings of human life to their pupils. Life is the great word of our educational system, not things. As one passes from the study of the physical universe into the study of the more human disciplines, it becomes evident that the soul of education here is the same attitude of reverence which was of the essence of culture on its first level.

Reverence for personality is the soul of democracy; it is the secret support of every democratic institution. Until man's mind had learned to acknowledge the right and dignity of every other man, there could not be any democracy.

To have passed through the conventional disciplines of the school—history, literature, sociology, phychology— and not have learned to regard man with reverence, no matter what his external trappings might be, is to have missed the spirit and purpose of these studies.

Gone is the day of reverence toward the king, the priest, the sage. Gone the day of reverence toward aristocracy. Gone the day of the doctrine that God has chosen a certain set of men for eternal life, and another for eternal death. Gone the day of the privileged classes in industry, in politics, and in religion.

Our democracy is making us feel that God has no favorites, that nature has no favorites, and that society must have no favorites. The equal right of every man before God and the law is a settled conviction of every soul who is touched by the spirit of modern times. The common man has arisen into an importance which he did not hold in former times.

Education that is really education, culture that is not simply veneer but an earnest pursuit of the truth for the love of the truth, will result in the making of the democratic principle a fact in the conscious attitude of the educated man or woman. The big problem of our modern social constitutions is to get our men and women to take a democratic attitude, genuine and sincere, toward all other men and women.

And by a democratic attitude is meant three things: an imaginative understanding of the other's thought and experience; respect for that thought and experience, with the assumption that it may contain truth, if indeed it be not wholly true; and a willingness to co-operate with the other upon the basis of common purposes, despite divergencies of opinion.

Our public schools and colleges should be accomplishing this, whatever else they accomplish. Our literature and art and civil government and sociology and psychology should issue not in mere information but in a democratic sympathy and attitude.

It is easy for us to be interested in the great people of the world, the rulers, the courtiers, the sages, the heroes, but it is only when some Howells or Tolstoi or Kipling comes along that we are made to see the immense significance of the common man. For many centuries art has been steadily descending from the lofty height of the extraordinary people to the common level of the ordinary man. So that today the gorgeous robes and trappings of the great are regarded as of far less significance in our pictures than the interpretation of the warm human experience that goes on within every common breast.

It is only in modern times that nature has been seen through the artist's eye, only in modern times that the natural and essential man has been discovered by artistic sympathy. To read these works of literature, to seee these pictures and not to have one's own attitude bent toward all men, is to miss their greatest value.

Moreover, our sociology is teaching us that the motives and goals of the great mass of common people are, in substance, the same as those of the extraordinary. It is a wonderful and thrilling revelation, when one once feels its full force, to know that throughout all the ranks in which men have ranged themselves there runs one common set of motives and ends.

Psychology, too, comes in with its support to the democratic view of the world, asserting that all men from Plato to the denizen of Timbuctoo are cast from the same mold, that they are organized alike in powers of knowing and of feeling and of doing.

That an institution into whose curriculum these disciplines enter should turn out snobs or aristocrats or anything but democratic-minded citizens is a thing incredible. If such disciplines are of any value at all, their value can be stated no more essentially than in terms of that reverence toward other people which they create and nourish.

So it comes to pass that the really aristocratic soul, the really choice spirit, is the democratic one. The rare man, the man of spiritual blue-blood, is the man who has learned to value the personal worth of others who may be removed from him in those accidental matters of birth or breeding or success.

Sacrifice and Suffering

There is no magic in sacrifice and suffering. Their meaning is derived from the motives that prompt men to give up what is pleasant and to endure what is painful. A prominent educator found himself confronted with the alternatives of resigning his place at the head of the schools of a great city or of breaking down in health. He said: "If it would do any good I would stay at my post and take the consequences, but I could kill myself here and the situation would not be improved." He very wisely resigned. A man has no right to risk his health unless he has good reason to hope for results that are worth the sacrifice.

All men make sacrifices. Some sacrifice their intelligence, their integrity, their sympathy, the happiness and health of their families, and the joys of friendship upon the altar of appetite and passion. Others pay the same heavy tribute to greed and love or honor. The coward surrenders his self-respect and the respect of others that he may escape the danger of the moment. The liar sells the trust men impose in him for the advantage which he thinks his lie will yield. The malicious man chooses to get pleasure out of the discomfort and loss of others and he pays for his fun by closing his heart to the feelings that entitle him to the dignity of being recognized as a man.

If we were never under the necessity of sacrificing anything except that which is altogether evil the decisions of the sincere man would be easy to make. The hard problem is often that of choosing between the lesser and the greater good. At this point many of us fail. We are satisfied with little when we ought to pay the price for something of infinite value. It is the duty of a man to stay at home and provide for his wife and children, but he may have to leave his home to defend the government that gives protection to all the families of the land. For the sake of the kingdom of God disciples of Jesus may be under obligation to give up places of usefulness in churches in America and go to distant lands with the message of freedom.

All the self-denial, therefore, that is morally significant, accompanies self-assertion. We choose to assert the best there is in us and we are compelled to renounce all pleasure and ambitions that are at variance with the supreme motive of our lives. The bad man has the wrong motive, consequently he gives expression to the evil of his nature. It is more important to him that he have a drink than that his children have food, that he get money than that his state may have an honorable man to represent it in the senate of the United States. The good man finds his happiness in the happiness of his children and in the honor of his state. His individual pleasures are not allowed to interfere with his duty to his family and his country.

Power, then, comes from self-assertion, not from self-denial. Self-denial is only the removal of hindrances. Nothing positive comes of it. Jesus never denied himself; he denied all that was contrary to the life of a perfect man. He claimed for himself all that belongs to one who is in complete harmony with the will of God. He is the world's great example of self-assertion. He asserted his right to love men and do good to them. He asserted his right to live according to the requirements of Divine Fatherhood and human brotherhood and to reject the anti-religious and anti-moral legalism of his day. He taught the world the true meaning of self-realization. We debate about egoism and altruism, selfishness and unselfishness, and end our discussions where we begin. The real question has to do with the kind of self that is given the right of way. The bad man denies the rights of his intelligence and conscience and asserts the rights of appetite. The good man asserts the rights of his spiritual life and gives to bodily appetites their place in this higher life.

"They must hinder your work very much," I said to a mother busy about the kitchen, with a two-year-old clinging to her skirt. "I'd never get through my work without them," was the instant rejoinder, and in it lay the answer to much of our sentimental commiseration of hard-worked mothers. It may be hard to carry on the drudgery of daily life with the little ones clamoring around; it is ten times harder without, for sheer lack of something to make it worth while. This mother sacrifices freedom from certain petty annoyances that she might gratify her nobler affections. Other women have defied the demands of their hearts for the sake of ease, and they hve no moral power.

Biblical Problems

I have been greatly helped by the "Daily Altar" and am using it with great satisfaction in the family worship. I have wondered if you know of some brief form of prayer in which the family might join after the use of what is provided in your daily section. Of course we us the Lord's Prayer often, but I should like to have some other simple form that the children could use with equal interest. L. B. J.

Here is one that I have found valuable in family worship:

Father we thank Thee for the night,
And for the pleasant morning light.
For rest and food and loving care,
And all that makes this world so fair.
Help us to do the things we should,
To be to others kind and good;
In all we do, in work or play,
To grow more loving every day. Amen.

Here is another:

Heavenly Father, hear our prayer,
Keep us in Thy loving care.
Guard us through the livelong day,
In our work and in our play.
Keep us pure and sweet and true
In everything we say and do. Amen.

And one more:

For this now morning and its light,
For rest and shelter of the night,
For health and food, for love and friends,
For everybody His goodness sends
We thank Thee, Heavenly Father. Amen.

Perhaps some of our readers will suggest still others.

1. What are the conditions of Christian Union among Christians? Can a campaign for occupation be called a Union Movement in any sense?

2. What is your opinion of the intellectual and spiritual qualifications of a man, as well as his literary and scientific fitness to deal with the problems involved in a plea for Christian Union, who denies that any one that has not received baptism in the form of immersion is a Christian?

Aberdeen, Miss. L. H. Stine.

1. The definition of Christian Union as consisting in "benevolent assimulation" of other Christian bodies, is, of course, totally erroneous. No ideal of Christian unity that contemplates the absorption of the Christian world into "our church" has any foundation either in Scripture or in good judgment. Our effort must invariably be to so mould the thought of our generation, both of our own people and in other churches, as that mutual understanding shall lead to co-operation; co-operation to unity of spirit, and that, at last, into such visible fellowship as shall realize the Saviour's prayer.

2. It seems unlikely that such a person as is here described, could thrown any special light upon the character of Christian Union or even upon the spirit and teaching of Jesus. He has yet to discover the fact that our Lord was concerned far more vitally in righteousness than in any form of obedience, and that it is the task of spiritual religion to emancipate itself from the spirit of formalism and to put its emphasis upon vital relationship to the Master.

The Flag

One of the semi-national holidays, which is quite likely to escape attention, is Flag Day.

In 1894 the American Flag Day Association was incorporated under the laws of Illinois, and has since become a nation-wide organization.

As might have been expected, it was at first largely composed of members of the Grand Army of the Republic. These men were increasingly sensitive to the neglect of just and due reverence for the flag of the nation.

One of the first efforts made by the association was the lifting of the colors on all school buildings throughout the nation. Flag Day exercises are now held in most of the schools and in many churches.

The lessons of patriotism and love of the flag can be taught effectively in this way. The youth of other lands are taught such regard for the colors and the national symbols as instantly expresses itself in the presence of these revered objects.

This spring the city of Denver distributed 17,174 shade trees free to householders. It has been doing this for five years. The city forestry department reports that 60 per cent of the first year's setting lived and flourished, 70 per cent of the second year's, 75 per cent of the third, and 82 per cent of the fourth.

Vital statistics made public show a decrease in the birth rate in France. The births during 1900 were 770,000 against 792,000 in the preceding year. Since 1851 the population of the republic has been increased by 3,000,000 only, while the population of Germany in the same period has been increased by 30,000,000.

The May statement of the London board of trade shows increases of $52,073,000 in imports and $20,407,500 in exports over those of May, 1909. The principal increases of imports were $20,000,000 in food supplies and grain and $25,000,000 in raw materials, of which latter rubber receipts constituted $10,000,000. The increase of exports was furnished by manufactured products.

The Swedish government is sending Dr. Adrian Mailin to America to study labor and social conditions, and especially the position of the Swedish settlers here, with a view to discovering the heavy emigration from the old country. It is hoped that he will be enabled to suggest plans for the improvement of conditions at home, thus arresting the outflow to other countries.

All indications are that Congress will adjourn without passing the bill admitting New Mexico and Arizona to statehood. The bill has passed the House and there are enough votes behind it to secure its adoption by the Senate if the measure can be brought to a vote, but the House and Senate bills differ radically and friends of statehood have little hope of an agreement in conference, and it is expected that the bill will go over to the short session under the head of "unfinished business." The Republican platform, on which Taft was elected president, contained a plank favoring the immediate admission of the two territories into the Union as states.

The formation of large combinations to throttle competition still continues in the country. In New York a $100,000,000 combination is being formed which, if perfected, will doubtless be called the "bath tub trust." Already it has ordered a rise in the price of its products from 20 to 30 per cent, which will mean something like a $25,000,000 annual tax upon the people of the United States. It also purposes to put practically all the small jobbers out of business. Sixteen companies are involved in the deal. They manufacture not only tubs but almost every other kind of sanitary enameled device.

Exclusive of the millions spent in construction work, the United States Steel Corporation is now paying to its employes more than $8,000,000 annually in the Gary plant. For the fiscal month from May 10 to June 10 the Indiana Steel Company paid out $647,000 in wages to the steel workers. This does not include the monthly pay roll of the Universal Portland Cement Company at Buffington, $75,000; Elgin, Joliet and Eastern Railway, $147,000; American Sheet and Tin Plate Company, $10,000, and American Bridge Company, $28,000. The two latter plants are now under construction and their pay roll from this time will take enormous jumps.

—Rev. J. D. Jones, chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, announced on May 9, when he relinquished the chair, that one-half of the 250,000 pounds Central Fund had been promised. During his year of office Mr. Jones raised nearly 400 pounds a day for Congregationalism.

—The Illinois Prohibition Convention declared for state-wide prohibition. State Chairman Wilson of the Prohibition party in presenting his plan to the committee said that liquor makers and dealers and brewers of other states were getting ready to come into Illinois. A big St. Louis brewing company, he said had threatened to move into this state if Missouri went dry next fall. Plans are being made for holding 100 temperance Chautauquas in Illinois during the coming summer. These will run for twenty weeks and will be conducted five at a time. The campaign for prohibition, the leaders of the cause declare, is to be the most vigorous the state has ever known.

Coroner's juries in Chicago are beginning to weary of the same old routine, expressing grief at the death of people run over by automobiles in the big city and then dismissing the careless driver who caused the accident. Holding to the grand jury of two drivers of automobiles and the recommendation that a law should be passed exempting cities of over 1,000,000 population from the statute which prevents cities from regulating automobilists were the moves made by two coroner's juries last week to check the present era of speedomania and accidents in Chicago. A splendid move in behalf of humanity. Chauffeurs will not be so careless when they discover that something else besides a formal discharge awaits them when they get into trouble because of fast and reckless driving.

Advance estimates of the annual report of the state board of health and vital statistics show that one out of every eleven marriages in Wisconsin is a failure. The divorce evil is reported to be greatly on the increase in these figures, and cruelty comprises the cause of nearly half, or to be exact 48.2 per cent of the cases. Desertion furnishes another 33.6 per cent of the cases, drunkenness, 5.3; neglect to provide, 4.4; and infidelity, 2.6 per cent. Miscellaneous, 5.9. The wife in four out of five cases is the complainant. The number of divorces per 1,000 mariages for each has increased from fifty-one in 1892 to ninty-one in 1905. What is really back of about 75 per cent of the divorces in this country is the fact that people with small salaries want to live like millionaires. A man cannot spend more than he makes and keep out of jail, a thing that unfortunately a lot of wives, old and young, as well as the man himself, at times forget.

Judge Karl von Lewinsky, a prominent German jurist, told the International Association for Uniform Laws at a meeting in Berlin recently that other causes than lax laws were responsible for the fact that seventy-three divorces occurred in 1900 in the United States to every fifteen in Germany, two in England and Wales, twenty-three in France and thirty-two in Switzerland. "The underlying cause of this great disproportion," he said, "is not in the American laws which, taken all in all, are strict, but is due to economic conditions. The American of all classes marries uncommonly young. Lack of experience therefore after leads him to make a wrong choice of a life partner. The American woman sees no terror in a divorce. She is more independent than the European, usually has more ability and more opportunity to help herself, and is, therefore, more inclined to renounce the support of a husband."

The movement in favor of cremation in England continues to make slow but steady progress, writes the London correspondent of the New York Medical Journal. During 1909 the number of cremations caried out in Great Britain was 855, an advance of sixty as compared with 1908. The first crematorium in England was opened at Woking in 1885 and the total number of cremations since that time is 8,121. There are now altogether thirteen crematoria in Great Britain and this number will probably soon be increased. The Cremation Society of England has been very active in its propaganda work and public interest is slowly aroused. Recently a cremation society was formed in Edinburgh. The object of the society is to promote the practice of cremation and burial reform by means of meetings, lectures and publications or otherwise. There are already about 180 members, including many well known persons.

About ten million dollars' worth of diamonds are smuggled into the United States annually, according to a statement issued by the Importers' Protective Union. "An inspection of the returns of sales made by the large exporters in Paris, Vienna, Berlin and London shows that the amount of smuggling is enormous," declared the association's statement. "A good many of the precious stones pass the customs' lines in the possession of members of the steamships' crews, while at the smaller ports of entry, where there are not such expert appraisers as in New York, the government is cheated of a considerable sum of money by under valuation. The amount of smuggling by tourists is, of course, harder to estimate than even the professional smuggling. But it has been said that more has got through in the past without paying duty than was ever declared. But the really big smuggling—carefully organized and cleverly executed—is done by foreigners."

The Taft administration at Washington on June 10 gave out some statistics in defense of the Aldrich tariff law, which are supposed to show continually increasing imports and revenues and a reduced average rate of duty. The statements cover the nine months of operation of the law to April 30, and compare this period with the corresponding nine months of each year since 1890. Comparisons are thus secured with the Dingley law, the Democratic Wilson law, and the McKinley law. The figures show: That the customs receipts are greater than in any previous year. That the importations of free merchandise are greater than in any previous year. That the percentages of free merchandise is greater than any year under the Dingley tariff. That the average ad valorem duty is less than any previous year except 1896, when the Wilson law was in force. The dry figures of the bureau of statistics are unusually interesting, because they are the figures the president has had for the last few months, and upon which he has based his conclusions that the Aldrich law is fully justifying the claims made for it by him and its other friends. As an evidence that the increased importation of free and dutiable merchandise is not resulting disastrously to American manufacturers, figures also are given to show the state of various industries in the United States.

displayed, and rises to his feet the moment the first strains of "God Save the King" fall upon his ears. German and French sentiment are not less responsive to their national colors and music.

Yet it is not an unusual thing to see an American pass a building on which "Old Glory" is flying without even a glance at the colors. And whole audiences will sit in soggy indifference while "America" or "The Star Spangled Banner" is played, as if the tune were "Paddy Ryan" or "Old Black Joe."

But the worst abuse of the flag is its desecration by business houses in advertising their wares. Generally the more respectable forms of business are above this misuse of the colors. But of late, brands of whisky and tobacco have brazonly displayed the flag on their labels and advertisements, and in this city during the fight made against the saloon last spring, the United Societies, the liquor organization, had the effrontery to use the flag on the campaign buttons which they scattered all over the city.

Truly there is need of a Flag Day Association, of which every patriotic citizen shall, in his heart at least, be a member.

Dr. John Archibald Morrison, for seven years pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, of this city, has resigned his work to go abroad for study. Dr. Morrison says that he does not intend to return to the pastorate, because he wishes to devote his life to religious work. And while one is still wondering whether this is light humor or deadly sarcasm, Dr. Morrison goes on to explain that the qualities apparently most needed in a city pastorate are financial sagacity, banking experience, and the art of devoting one's time to an infinite number of trivial things, with which the minister who wishes to grow and to really help his people in the attainment of the higher life ought to have nothing to do. In a church whose membership includes bankers and business men of approved judgment and experience, the minister is left as the real burden-bearer in a domain for which his training has given him no preparation . The work of financial organization for the current expenses of the church and for the missionary funds, that the trained financiers of the church could so easily carry, is left to him, or goes without adequate attenton. And this puts upon the minister a burden which he is not able to bear, or which he must take up at the expense of his real work. One wonders how many ministers there are who share Dr. Morrison's view that one must secure a reconstruction of the present methods of church work or else leave the pulpit in order to devote themselves to religious work.

The long delayed report of the Centennial convention at Pittsburg has at length appeared. The first impression is one of surprise that such a report should have been committed by the centennial secretary to the hands of a company like the Standard Publishing Co. when the brotherhood is supposed to have a publishing house of its own. One is also humiliated by the shoddiness of the work done in the making of the book. The printing is poor, the illustrations are so imperfect as in many instances to be caricatures, and the binding is not even respectable. One wonders what inducement led the centennial secretary to accept a job of this kind as the final item in the history of the centennial convention. It is interesting to note the fact that the publisher has drawn special attention in a prefatory note to two addresses delivered in Pittsburg, those of Prof. Willett and of Mr. Rice, and has thus insured their reading at least. Mr. Church's paper is omitted entirely. It is understood that the missionary societies are to be asked to contribute the funds to mail the copies of this report to those who subscribed for it at Pittsburg.

The coming of summer brings with it the opportunity of rest and of study, neither of which falls to the lot of the average minister in any such proportion as he could wish, during the other parts of the year. It has become increasingly the custom to spend some time in study at one or another of the leading universities, several of which now offer courses of instruction during the usual vacation period. In some of these institutions a summer school of theology is conducted, while in others, as at the University of Chicago, the summer quarter is a regular part of the academic year, with even richer opportunities for study and attendance on public lectures than can be enjoyed at any other time. Ministers and teachers who can afford the time and the very modest expense involved, should not fail to take advantage of such opportunities for rest of body and renewal of spirit as these vacation periods offer.

On Tuesday, June 14, the Seventy-fifth Convocation of the University of Chicago was held, the ceremonies being more than usually important. At 10 a. m., the cornerstone of the great Harper Memorial Library was laid by Mrs. Harper, the widow of the late President William Rainey Harper. Addresses were made by Clement Walker Andrews, librarian of the James Crerar Library, of Chicago, and by Dr. Ernest DeWitt Burton, head of the Department of New Testament Literature and Interpretation, at the University. At 11 a. m., the ceremony of conferring the degrees took place, the Convocation address being delivered by Rev. F. W. Gunsaulus, D. D., LL. D., president of Armour Institute of Technology.

On Sunday, June 12, the Convocation sermon was preached by Rev. Charles Richmond Henderson, Chaplain of the University. The number of those receiving academic degrees and titles was 414, divided as follows: Ph.D., 17; J.D., 28; Ph.M., 14; S.M., 8; A.M., 22; D.M., 2; LL.B., 4; S.B., 44; Ph.B., 108; A.B., 27; Associate in Literature, 61; Associate in Arts, 15; Associate in Science, 26; Associate in Philosophy, 17; "Two-year certificate," 22.

Dr. Gunsaulus' subject was "The Great Library," and his address was an interpretation of the spirit and work of the late President Harper as the great enthusiastic student, interpreter and teacher of "the one book."

"Dr. Harper, whose ideal character we revere today, was a man of one book. From it he received compensiveness, prevision, and intellectual security. He was a man of large mindedness and many sidedness through his love for books, especially the Bible. Dr. Harper's great service was his lifting the Bible out of the sphere of metaphysics and making it a thing for and of humanity."

Dr. Gunsaulus' style is well known for its vividness and power. He was at his best in showing the relation of the new Bible to all other study and life.

"Church Work in State Universities" is the title of an attractive pamphlet of nearly one hundred pages containing a report of the Third Annual Conference of Church workers in State Universities, held at the University of Wisconsin, in Madison, February last. The work is carefully edited by Rev. C. J. Galpin, the Baptist University pastor of the University of Wisconsin, and Rev. R. H. Edwards, who occupies a similar position for the Congregational Church, these gentlemen being respectively secretary and president of the meetings reported. The pamphlet is an encouraging evidence that slowly but surely the free school system of America in its ultimate evolution will first enlist the confidence and then the co-operation of the friends of religion, and that the schools themselves, once having fully established their independence of priests and creeds, will welcome the frank and free co-operation of both priests and creeds, in shaping the ideals and directing the lives of the people. "I dip my pen in the blackest of ink because I am afraid of falling into the bottle," said Emerson. So Catholic and Protestant, agnostic and believer, heretic and orthodox, are learning to trust one another enough, and, what is better and harder, to trust free discussion and the frank application of the comparative method in the study of religion and religious systems, to welcome co-operative work and collateral studies. President Galpin in welcoming the guests said:

"We feel that you are for the churches of the United States, the special guardians of the religious life of 50,000 students of the state universities of the United States. So far as we furnish the weather and climate of this conference, it is one pre-eminently, I believe, of the open door. We have been engaged in door opening, and we have closed no door. We are not afraid of religious drafts. We have no strained relationships, no delicate situations, no curtained or tabooed topics. We will gladly provide the nest in which to incubate an open conference on the intricate relationships involved in the state university religious situation. We expect an epoch-making conference, and we welcome in you this same expectancy."

The discussions were of practical character, and the representatives of various denominations, including the heretical ones, took active part. The academic spirit prevailed throughout, and there was no evidence of denominational jealiusy or theological touchiness Among the "significant tendencies" noted are the following: 1. Credit allowed yb the University of Iowa for religious courses given outside the University on examination. 2. A school of religion at the University of Michigan, which brings together all the courses of religious instruction given by the various agencies at Ann Arbor, outside the University; a department catalogue being issued after the manner of a university. 3. A Biblical Institute at the University of Kansas, under the official direction of the university. Eminent religious leaders are the guests of the university. 4. At the University of Wisconsin a co-operative plan shared by the University Pastors' Association co-operating with the presidents and regents of the University, by which three or four men of national eminence in religious work are invited to address the student body. 5. New Roman Catholic chapels are being erected at the University of California and the University of Wisconsin. All of these represent not reactionary, but progressive methods. liberal and not dogmatic tendencies in religion and the education that is religious.

Drake University

Located in Des Moines, Iowa's Capital City

HILL M. BELL, PRESIDENT

Drake University with the commencement of 1910 closed one of the most successful years in her history. One thousand eight hundred and forty-three students were enrolled. Of these more than 600 were in the College of Liberal Arts. One hundred and seventy-eight young women were taking work in the various colleges of the university in preparation for the ministry or the mission field, ten to become medical missionaries.

Gifts Received.

During the year the university received gifts amounting to $237,763.13. It is possible that the final figures may be in excess of this. It was shown in President Bell's report to the board of trustees that during his eight years of service as head of the institution, the total assets had increased from $374,365.36 to $1,179,697.31. Of this nearly a half million consists of permanent funds invested for the support of the university. At the meeting of the board on June 14, a proposition from the General Education Board, making a gift of $100,000 to Drake University on condition that $300,000 more be raised by June 30, 1912, was accepted. This proposition carries with it the necessity of paying all the liabilities against the university by that time, and that the endowment shall be available exclusively for the College of Liberal Arts. A campaign was therefore begun on that date for $400,000.

Dr. Dugan Retires.

Announcement was made that a retiring allowance had been granted Dr. D. R. Duncan by the Carnegie Foundation and that he will retire from the chair of New and Old Testament History on January 1, 1911. Dr. Duncan asked this retirement upon the basis of failing health. He will make his future home in California. At the same time a retiring allowance from the foundation was announced for Professor Bruce E. Shepperd, he to retire at the end of the next school year, June, 1911. Professor Shepperd has been with the university from the time of the founding of the university, and this next year will round out a full thirty years of service. For nearly twenty years he has occupied the chair of philosophy. He retires owing to the necessity of seeking a milder climate for his family.

Addition to Faculty.

Some notable additions have been made to the faculty. Dr. Charles B. Newcomer, now of Transylvania University, and a graduate of the University of Berlin, will assume the Professorship of Romance Languages. Professor W. H. Heffner of the University of Pennsylvania will be Acting Professor of History, vice Professor O. B. Clark, who will be away next year on leave. Miss Jeannette Ezekiels, a graduate of Columbia University, has been chosen as Professor of Education. Dr. Arthur Steindler, a graduate of medicine at the University of Vienna, and a notable authority on orthopedic surgery, has been added to the faculty of the College of Medicine. Dr. Walter L. Bierring, at the present Professor of Medicine in the State University of Iowa, has been chosen for the same work on the faculty of the Medical College of Drake University. Miss Rae Stockham, who has for several years been peparing for library work, having spent this last year in the library school at Albany, N. Y., will in September assume the duties of University Librarian. Professor Sherman Kirk will become Dean of the Bible College, Dean Alfred Martin Haggard continuing his work as Professor of Church History. During the summer vacation additions will be made to the medical building and a new laboratory building on the campus will be planned, the erection to begin sometime during the autumn.

College of Medicine.

The College of Medicine has been placed upon a good basis by voluntary subscriptions covering its immediate needs and to provide a support for the next five years. Drake University now has the only standard medical college under the auspices of the Disciples of Christ. It would seem therefore that large numbers of our young people who expect to become medical missionaries would resort to this school for their prearation.

Taken altogether the university has a brighter outlook for the future than it has ever enjoyed in the past. Larger endowment is the one great need of the institution. We have faith that this will come through the beneficence of our friends in the next few years.

College of the Bible

Lexington, Kentucky

J. W. McGarvey, President.

The College of the Bible located in Lexington, Kentucky, was organized as one of the colleges in Kentucky (now Transylvania), University in eighteen hundred and sixty-five. Robert Milligan, of sainted memory, was its first president.

The college has just closed its forty-fifth year, which has been one of the most successful in its history. There has been in attendance this year one hundred and eighty young preachers and missionaries.

Six professors have given all their time to the teaching of branches of study which pertain specifically to ministerial and missionary education. The classes of Transylvania University are open to such of our students as desire to take studies other than those purely ministerial, and many of the students avail themselves of this excellent opportunity to train themselves more thoroughly in general culture studies.

President McGarvey has been a teacher in the College of the Bible since its beginning. He has been its highly honored and deeply-loved president since 1895. Under his wise and efficient leadership the college has grown greatly in every way.

Commencement day was June 17th. A brighter and prettier day never shown upon our fair city. At ten a. m., the large chapel was crowded with a cultured and appreciative audience. Many friends from surrounding towns were present to lend their interest to the occasion. President McGarvey presided, and never before with more grace and dignity. The speeches by the four young men who represented the classs were of an unusually high degree of excellence both as to matter and manner. The music by the University Orchestra was spirited and inspiring. The class, fourteen in number, while not so large as some former classes was composed of excellent material.

Already many new students have signified their intention of attending the college next year and letters of inquiry from others are coming in every day.

With thanks to our Divine Father for his continued blessings, and with love and good wishes to all her sister institutions, the College of the Bible enters her forty-sixth year.

HALL LAURIE CALHOUN,
Prof. of Hebrew and Old Testament.

Kentucky Female Orphan School

BY MARK COLLIS, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD.

The Orphan School at Midway, Ky., has recently closed a very successful session. Miss Ella Johnson, who has served as its principal since the resignation of Miss Lizzie Corbin, about ten years ago, has shown herself eminently fitted for this responsible position, the school continuing to grow in power and efficiency from year to year under her management.

This school is intended only for orphans, or for those with only one living parent, who are without the means to send them to any other institution of like standing. The aim of the school is to make self-sustaining Christian women. The course of study is strong, and requires five years to complete it. No girl is received under fourteen, and every applicant is expected to furnish a certificate of her physical and intellectual ability to do the required work.

The endowment is not sufficient it meet the running expenses of the school, and the friends of every girl are expected to pay according to their ability. The growth of our endowment not keeping pace with the increase of our enrollment and with the increased expense of maintaining the school, makes it necessary for us to ask that as liberal an amount as possible be promised with each application.

Application blanks may be secured by writing to the Orphan's School, Midway, Ky.

Plans are being prepared for the installing of a lighting and heating plant this summer. This is done in the interests of health, of safety, and of convenience. The improvements will cost about $25,000. We are entering upon the work trusting in God, and in the brethren to furnish the means. We cannot afford to take the funds needed for the support of our girls and put into this work, so we appeal to God's stewards to send the money. Surely they will not disappoint us. There is no investment more us than one in this noble school. We have no agent in the field, but trust to the good people who know of the work we are doing to send in their offerings. We shall be glad to receive contributions of any amount to help pay for these improvements. These contributions should be sent to Lexington, Ky.

Bona Thompson Memorial Library, Butler College, Indianapolis, Ind.

Butler College

T. C. Howe, President.

The fifty-fifth commencement at Butler marked the close of the best year in its history. The commencement address was delivered by Charles S. Medbury, pastor of the University Place Church, Des Moines, Ia., and was a delight to the people of Irvington and Indianapolis, as well as to the students of Butler College.

Since the increase of the endowment of the college to $250,000, three years ago, Butler has felt stronger than ever the possibilities of her future. This is now believed to be but the beginning of her growth. The college has always maintained the best educational ideals, not striving to be a "University" she has sought to do the best grade of college work. So it stands today and on this account commands the respect of the best educators of America. In addition to the courses leading to the A. B. and A. M. degrees, Butler offers special courses for ministerial students.

President Howe's administration is popular and vigorous and faculty, students and friends are enthusiastic in their hope for continued good work and growth of Butler.

Berkeley Bible Seminary

BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA

H. H. Guy, Dean.

Berkeley Bible Seminary finished its work for the year on the 28th of April. The total registration was fifty-eight. Of this number thirty were preparing for the ministry and twenty-eight for different kinds of religious activity in the churches, including missionary and Bible-school work.

The year has been a very successful one in every way. The men have acceptably filled the pulpits of churches in the vicinity of Berkeley while pursuing their work in the seminary. From the men holding regular appointments as pastors we hear splendid reports. It is gratifying to know that some of the leading pulpits of northern California and other positions of responsibility in the church are being successfully filled by graduates of the seminary. The class-room work has been highly pleasing. It has been our purpose to offer courses of study covering the theoretical and practical preparation for the ministry. Along with technical training has gone the alignment of that training with the needs and demands of our time. The new social movement in our churches, the great missionary appeal, the Bible-school reorganization and the work of evangelism have received all the emphasis it was possible to give.

Fortunate Location.

The seminary is fortunate in its location. Berkeley is the seat of one of America's great universities. There are facilities here for culture, wide and Christian, rarely to be found elsewhere. That the ministry of the future must be a ministry of the highest culture as well as the deepest consecration is the note everywhere. Then, too, California is the center of world-problems as no other place in the world. The immigration problem, the Oriental intellectual problem and the great race problem are here at our very doors. Our state is the laboratory for intimate original investigation of such problems. We have here the fact and not the theory with which to deal.

Helpful Affiliation.

Our seminary is closely affiliated with the Baptist and the Congregational Seminaries. Our coöperation is not only mutually helpful but is a practical demonstration of the plan for Christian union for which the Disciples have so long contended. The opportunity to come in touch with the faculties and students of these institutions has in it great possibilities for the thoughtful and ambitious minister.

The faculty of Berkeley Bible Seminary works in harmony to one end—the training of men for the ministry. And we are glad that we have on the faculty the men who by training and experience are well prepared to accomplish this purpose.

In a climate unsurpassed for intellectual pursuits with a faculty in sympathetic touch with modern life and problems and a loyal support from the churches of the state the future of Berkeley Bible Seminary is exceedingly bright.

Harvey H. Guy,
Dean of the Seminary.

The generous giving laymen of the Protestant Church have evidently made an impression upon the Catholic press of the country. The New World, Romanist weekly, says in its last issue: "It is so seldom one hears of the Catholic layman emulating the example of his dissenting brother, the Protestant layman, by making substantial donations to Catholic charities, that it affords us real pleasure to call attention to the munificent contribution of $85,000 devised by the late P. J. McCullagh of Lancaster, Pa., to the Little Sisters of the Poor at Philadelphia, Pa."

Christian College

Columbia, Mo.

MRS. LUELLA WILCOX ST. CLAIR, PRESIDENT

On the 24th Christian College closed its 59th session.

Early in May recitals for graduation were given by several students in the schools of Music and Expression. On the night of May 20, Bernard Shaw's "Candida" was cleverly given by the College Dramatic Club. Saturday afternoon and evening, reception hours were held by the teachers and students in the School of Art at their annual exhibit.

Sunday night Dean Charles M. Sharpe of the Missouri Bible College preached a strong sermon. The entire Baccalaureate service program was of a high order of excellence. The impressive processional by the college choir and full musical program were given by music students of the college.

Monday high noon witnessed a splendid gathering of the "old girls" at the college, and nearly 100 assembled about the tables at the alumnae luncheon. Many brilliant responses were made to the list of toasts, and at the close of the program a handsome electrolier was presented to Mr. St. Clair by the alumnae, an expression of their pleasure in her return to the college.

Monday night, May 22, occurred the annual concert, a highly artistic program of piano, violin, and vocal numbers, worthy of best conservatory standards.

Mrs. Luella Wilcox St. Clair.

Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock was held the Senior Class Day program, one of the most beautiful and interesting of the week. At night a large audience filled the college auditorium for the commencement exercises, and the masterly address, "The Test of Education," delivered by B. A. Jenkins of Kansas City, was given the closest attention. President Luella Wilcox St. Clair awarded a number of gold medals and delivered diplomas and certificates to fifteen graduates and one post-graduate.

Mrs. St. Clair in a closing address presented plans for the Home-coming Week to be held May 23-30, 1911, when the alumnae, now numbering over 700, are to be invited to return for a celebration of the 60th anniversary of the founding of the college.

At the annual meeting of the Board of Trustees which was held May 23 at 4 p. m., President St. Clair gave a splendid report of the year. Among other good things accomplished has been the paying off of all indebtedness on the college property, and the securing of the long-needed Academic Hall. This splendid building is now in process of construction and will be named The J. S. Dorsey Memorial Hall. Mr. R. H. Stockton of St. Louis gave $25,000 toward the building to commemorate Mr. Dorsey's services of more than thirty years as a trustee of the college.

Christian College expects to open the 60th session next September with the largest enrollment in its history.

MRS. BEAUFORT EVANS,
Secretary Christian College.

Commencement at Hamilton College

Lexington, Ky.

The forty-first annual session of Hamilton College closed on May 26, having enrolled during the year 269 students.

The graduating class numbered 46, the largest by 6 in the history of the Institution. The baccalaureate services were held Sunday evening, May 22, in the Broadway Christian Church. The minister, Mark Collis, assisted by Professor S. M. Jefferson, of the College of the Bible, conducted the service. The sermon was preached by Henry C. Garrison, of Danville. It was a clear call to scholarship and culture and spirituality for the sake of others, not of self.

Of the numerous social, literary, or musical functions of the week, perhaps none was more enjoyable than the Alumnae banquet, attended by 96 of Hamiltons loyal daughters, who came from Florida, from Illinois, from Texas, etc., to renew old ties of friendship. It was an occasion of good fellowship and enthusiasm. Hamilton's alumnae number 693, while during the past seven years 1789 students have been enrolled. Every year 100 or more of these return to this class runion and banquet.

President Shearin of Hamilton College, was toastmaster, and responses grave, witty or tender were made by Mesdames Frances C. Thomas, Florence D. Cantrill, Aimee T. Archer, Allie D. Dickson, Hayme S. Porter; by Misses Brilla M. Lloyd, Mary C. Gayle, and Mary F. Hutcheraft; and by president R. H. Crossfield, and Dr. T. B. Macartney, of Transylvania, and by Mr. J. W. Porter, long and honored professor, and now a worthy trustee of Hamilton.

The commencement exercises proper were held in the opera-house, the largest auditorium available in the city, on the evening of May 26. The boxes to left and right of the stage, decorated with smilax and lilies interwoven with white and gold of Hamilton and the Crimson of Transylvania University, were reserved for the trustees and faculties of the two co-ordinated institutions. On the rostrum sat the chorus of 40 voices and the senior class numbering 46, with the various speakers of the evening. Frederick W. Burnham, of Springfield, Illinois, delivered the graduating address, one of the most vital and compelling ever heard in Lexington.

It was a thoughtful address to the earnest and thoughtful class of nineteen ten, whose members have caught well the keynote of Hamilton, "Scholarship for Culture, and Culture for Christ." The young woman winning the annually offered prizes and scholarships to Transylvania were Misses Dazey M. Porter, Cedlai Amos, Stella Harned, Katie Troughtman, Mary H. Gocke, Ruth C. Miller, Katheryne B. Appleton, and Clara Belle Walton.

The year just closed has furnished another proof of the strength which comes from co-ordination and co-operation with Transylvania University. Inspired by the highest educational ideals, and guided in her finances by a wise board of trustees who see to it that every penny of the income and increment of Hamilton is expended for the good of the students attending, her growth has been a most natural one. In the pursuance of this policy, $66,000 has recently been spent on new buildings and fuller material equipment; and the salaries of the professors have been advanced so as to secure strong and experienced women, trained in the best universities of America and Europe. This has made possible a two year's extension of the curriculum, which went into effect for the first time this year, thus furnishing both for admission and for completion a full junior collegiate course, in exact co-ordination with that of Vassar, Wellesley, or with our own Transylvania.

And ever he raged at the futile force which is all that one man can exert,
And ever he passionate pleaded and eloquent sought to convert
Wealth from its present attitude of a tyrant selfish and base,
A despot cruel and deaf and blind, usurping
unlawful its place,
To that which it should be, a factor tremendous to multiply and increase
The sum of humanity's knowledge, its happiness, comfort and peace;
And ever he stirred with eternal protest, with indignation divine.
With the old crusading fury and zeal, a

Longing to hasten the halcyon time when God shall esteem it good
To melt and fuse all hatred and greed in a golden brotherhood.

—JULIA DITTO YOUNG.

Oklahoma Christian University

E. V. ZOLLARS, PRESIDENT

Oklahoma University has just closed its third session under most favorable conditions. The year through which we have just passed has been successful from almost every standpoint. We enrolled 326 different students, 82 of them being ministerial students. This places us fourth on the list in ministerial attendance among the schools of the disciples.

The personnel of the student body is exceedingly good, in which our ministerial students range all the way from twenty to forty years of age. The consequence is that they are a mature class of young men.

Forty-nine persons were graduated from the various schools and colleges of the university at our last commencement, June 1. They were distributed as follows:

College of Liberal Arts, degree of A. M..... 4
College of Liberal Arts, degree of A. B..... 4
School of Oratory and Expression, degree of B. O... 1
Preparatory School 12
College of Business.....22
College of Music (Piano Dept.) 4
Training School for Nurses (University Hospital) 2

Every department of work is well organized and is moving forward in a very successful and satisfactory manner. About forty of our ministerial students are making their way by preaching for churches within reach of Enid. Some sixty churches are being supplied in this way. These young men are doing satisfactory work and the churches are growing under their administrations.

The finances of the school are gradually property easily worth $150,000. We owe about $25,000, but we have an asset in the form of unpaid scholarships due us from the city of Enid to the amount of $30,000. Chancellor Roth and Judge J. N. Haymaker of Wichita, are at present engaged in an effort to raise a sufficient amount to liquidate the debt. This will leave the money that we receive for scholarships to be used for additional buildings or for endowment purposes.

E. V. Zollars, President.

Last fall, in a thirty days' campaign, we raised $50,000 for permanent endowment, and we have a temporary fund, amounting to about $7,000 or $8,000 a year, which will apply on current expenses for the next three years. By that time we hope to have our endowment so increased that the school will be on a self-supporting basis.

Recently citizens of Enid united in giving a historic concert, entitled "America," as a university benefit. The net proceeds of the concert amounted to between $500 and $600.

Oklahoma Christian University occupies a strategic position. Enid is one of the best rail-road centers in the Southwest, having railroads radiating out in ten or eleven different directions. We are about 400 miles from the nearest school of the Disciples, giving us four great states to draw from in which we have no school. There are at least 1,500 churches naturally tributary to the school, and barring accidents and mistakes, the institution is destined to become one of the greatest schools of the disciples of Christ.

The students have organized a "Boosters' Club," of 150 members, with the motto, "Each one win one or more every year." The prospects for the coming year seem to be very bright, and if conditions are favorable in the Southwest, we will probably open in September with a largely increased attendance.

G. J. Chapman, well known in Kansas, Oklahoma and Nebraska, has been engaged as a field secretary to work for the financial interests of the school in connection with Chancellor Roth. He will travel during the summer, giving stereopticon lectures, showing views of buildings, recitation rooms and student groups.

America and Japan

BY M. B. MADDEN

As the readers of the Christian Century have all heard more or less talk of war between Japan and America, it might be interesting to hear from the Japanese side from one who has lived in Japan for fifteen years. I have traveled in all parts of Japan, visiting nearly every province, coming in contact with civil, military and educational authorities, soldiers, students, business men, farmers, mechanics, Buddhist and Shinto priests. Also, reading their newspapers, books and magazines, so that I know what the people think and talk about. The thing the Japanese people covet above all things else is the respect, good-will, and, I may say, affection of the United States. They naturally rejoice that it was Commodore Perry, a representative of our nation, that opened Japan to the Western life and thought.

The "Bei-Yu-Kai."

There is in Japan today a great association known as the "Bei-Yu-Kai," which is by interpretation, "Friends of America Association." The main purpose of this great association is to interpret the United States to Japan. A large part of its membership is made up of students, officials, and travelers, who have visited and studied in the United States. The president of this institution is Baron Kaneko, a graduate of one of our American universities. At the time of the fifteen years of actual life in Japan, I can dore Perry to Japan, this association gathered funds and erected a beautiful monument to his memory. This monument can be seen as you enter the harbor at Yokohama. This was not only a memorial to Commodore Perry, but was in a real true sense a tribute of affection to the American nation. Would it not be well if we had amongst the disciples of Christ a "Friends of Japan Association?" After intimate contact, covering fifteen years oof actual life in Japan, I can truthfully say that the Japanese people are worthy of this, and every one of us ought to be so deeply interested in the welfare of this rising people that we would be glad to be known as a friend. Yea, even more! I earnestly desire that you may all sincerely love the Japanese people.

Attitude Toward Missionaries.

It might be interesting here to say that when Baron Kaneko heard that there was an anti-missionary spirit in some of the independent churches that might result in the withdrawal of the American missionaries, he went to a Christian preacher and stated that it was his conviction that Japan could not afford to lose the personal and home influence of the American missionaries. Perhaps some of the readers may have noticed in the metropolitan papers some time ago, a telegram from Japan reporting a public address by Baron Shibuzawa, the leader of the delegation of Japanese business men, that had just returned to Tokyo from the United States, in which he is reported to have said, "That although there is no question that the United States ranks as first among the nations in natural resources, yet two-thirds of the power and influence of the United States is in her men." Was not this a gracious tribute and sincere compliment to our American manhood, and could it really come from the representative of a nation that did not have a high regard for our people?

Unjust Criticism.

There are so many fault-finders and conscienceless critics in the world that it is to be expected that Japan's success in two foreign wars would bring down upon her head a great storm of mistaken and unjust criticism. Right here, I am led to say, that Japan won the war with Russia because of her absolute unity. I think it is true that the sun never shone on a more magnificent spectacle of national unity than that which was seen in Japan at the time of this war. Every bill for supplies, reinforcements, and even honors to their heroes, army and navy alike, was passed through the Imperial Parliament by a unanimous vote. Oh, for such unanimity in our response to our great Commander, to preach His Gospel to every creature.

Japan Grateful.

Japan is not ungrateful for the many contributions to her national life and success made by the United States. In fact, our country is the ideal of the Japanese people in many ways. The names of Washington, Lincoln, Garfield, and Roosevelt are living ideals of personal character, fidelity to principle and the power of accomplishing great things for humanity. In a great students' conference held in Tokyo last October, 1,200 students were given slips of paper upon which they were asked to write the name of their ideal man, and with the exception of a few scattering votes, they voted unanimously for Abraham Lincoln. In a most wonderful way our "Honest Abe" influenced this ancient nation in the beginning of its modern life. The Treaty of Portsmouth, that brought the Russo-Japanese war to a close, lifted our ex-president to a very lofty place in the thought and affection of the Japanese people and he would be given a great welcome if he should ever visit Japan. If you should ask the Japanese which men of those who have visited Japan within the past twenty-five years held before their people the highest ideal of personal character, fidelity to what they believed, and contributed most to the moral and religious life of the country, they would reply, William J. Bryan, John G. Wooley, and Charles Cuthbert Hall, all citizens of our great republic.

Admiration for America.

The Japanese admire the ability of the American business man to do great things and do them quickly. The great banks, steamship companies, insurance companies, and manufacturies, are modeled largely after those of our country.

In the famine relief work five years ago, the fact of America responding with large sums by cablegram, impressed the Japanese people that in our philanthropic work, our ideas of fraternity were wider than national or race boundaries and here also the American spirit led them to do big things and do them quickly.

In the field of education, without mentioning the strictly missionary contributions, the names of Griffis, Clark, and Verbeck, and what they did for the educational system of Japan will convince any one that America's contribution to Japan is not a small one.

A Field for Life Work.

I am very sorry to find that Japan does not appeal to young men and women as a field for their life work. In the volunteer bands of our colleges, those who indicate a desire for Japan as their chosen field are comparatively few. There may be several reasons for this. First, many think the work in Japan is about completed; others again, think the Japanese Christians are able now to do the work themselves; still others, may think that the Japanese are proud, overbearing, and hard to work with; and lastly some may think that the results are not as large as in other fields. All these reasons may be true, but when one sees that, practically speaking, forty-five out of the fifty millions of Japanese people have not yet heard the Gospel, they ought to lose weight with every follower of Christ.

In closing, I wish to bear the testimony of a brother, that our work among the Japanese people is deeply interesting, full of variety and that we are accomplishing greater things than missionary reports indicate. So I can confidently say to any young man or woman that they need not only never regret choosing Japan as their field, but that it will become the joy of their life if they do so. To supporters of foreign missions I also wish to say, that money invested in Japan does and will continue to bring splendid results. To the Disciples of Christ, which is an American movement, the appeal of the highways into the lives of the oriental nations open to the United States, ought to come with tremendous force. Oh, that we might meet these responsibilities now!

Two Golden Days

BY ROBERT J. BURDETTE.

There are two days in the week upon which and about which I never worry. Two carefree days, kept sacredly free from fear and apprehension.

One of these days is yesterday. Yesterday, with all its cares and frets, with all its pains and aches, all its faults, its mistakes and blunders, has passed forever beyond the reach of my recall. I can not undo an act that I wrought, I can not unsay a word that I said on yesterday. All that it holds of my life, of wrong, regret, and sorrow, is in the hands of the Mighty Love that can bring honey out of the rock, and sweet waters out of the bitterest desert—the love that can make the wrong things right, that can turn weeping into laughter, that can give beauty for ashes, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness, joy of the morning for the woe of the night.

Save for the beautiful memories, sweet and tender, that linger like the perfume of roses in the heart of the day that is gone, I have nothing to do with yesterday. It was mine; it is God's.

And the other day I do not worry about is to-morrow. To-morrow with all its possible adversities, its burdens, its perils, its large promise and poor performance, its failures and mistakes, is as far beyond the reach of my mastery as its dead sister, yesterday. It is a day of God's. Its sun will rise in roseate splendor, or behind a mask of weeping clouds. But it will rise. Until then, the same love and patience that hold yesterday hold to-morrow. Save for the star of hope that gleams forever on the brow of to-morrow, shining with tender promise into the heart of to-day, I have no possession in that unborn day of grace. All else is in the safe keeping of the Infinite Love that holds for me the treasures of yesterday. The love that is higher than the stars, wider than the skies, deeper than the seas. To-morrow—it is God's day. It will be mine.

There is left for myself, then, but one day of the week—to-day. Any man can fight the battles of to-day. Any woman can carry the burdens of just one day. Any man can resist the temptations of to-day. O friends, it is only when, to the burdens and cares of to-day, carefully measured out to us by the Infinite Wisdom and might that gives with them the promise, "As thy day, so shall thy strength be," we willfully add the burdens of those two awful eternities—yesterday and to-morrow—such burdens as only the mighty God can sustain—that we break down. It isn't the experience of to-day that drives men mad. It is the remorse for something that happened yesterday, the dread of what to-morrow may disclose.

These are God's days. Leave them with him.

Therefore, I think, and I do, and I journey but one day at a time. That is the easy day. That is the man's day. Nay, rather, that is our day—God's and mine. And while faithfully and dutifully I run my course, and work my appointed task on that day of ours, God the Almighty and the all-loving takes care of yesterday and tomorrow.—Los Angeles Times.

Bible College of Missouri

Charles M. Sharpe, Dean.

The year 1909-1910 has been a notable one in the history of this young institution. It increased its endowment resources by the amount of $100,000 and gained seventy per cent in attendance of ministerial students.

The university faculty granted two more important courses for which the university students may receive credit toward the A. B. degree, namely, "Christian Ethics" and "The Social Significance of Jesus' Teaching." A class of preparatory students has continued through the year pursuing courses of high school grade in "The Life of Christ" and in "The Apostolic History." There were no graduates this year and nearly all the students will return next year.

With increased resources all lines of work will be strengthened the coming year. A new chair has been established, devoted to "Social Service, Religious Education and Missions." This chair will be occupied by Prof. Alva W. Taylor. Prof. G. D. Edawrds has been granted leave of absence the coming year for study abroad. His work in the Old Testament department will be done by Prof. Charles E. Underwood, A. M., now of Yale University. The Bible College Library will be catalogued and put in first class working condition by the time school opens. It will be in charge of Miss Frances Gove, secretary and librarian. Thomas E. Breece will continue his work in the Preparatory. A Bible College Boarding Club is among the probabilities. Everything indicates a most prosperous year to come.

A delegation of Pittsburg ministers and church people appeared before the District Attorney last week and asked his aid in a war against Sunday baseball in the big "Smoky" city. It was plainly set forth by the delegation that either Sunday baseball games on back lots of the South Side of Pittsburg and on diamonds immediately outside the limits of that side of the city must be stopped or Sunday schools there must disband for the summer. It is estimated that 50,000 of the South Side young attend some ball game each nice Sunday. The church workers came to the district attorney, having the moral suport of every saloonkeeper in the suburbs south of Pittsburg, though the ministers had not asked such support.

A SERIAL STORY

Donald Graeme

CHAPTER VII.

Suspected.

If a bolt had fallen from the blue, Donald could not have been more thunder-struck. Mechanically he grasped the counter rail to steady himself, while he gazed, mute and wild-eyed into the stern, set face of James Douglas.

"If you know anything of this disgraceful crime, Donald, make a clean breast of it. It will be hard in any case for your father. But cowardice can only deepen guilt."

"Before heaven, James, I know nothing of this." Donald scarcely knew his own voice as he spoke.

"Your faither says what is perfectly true —only you and I hae onything tae dae wi' the office. Do ye think I hae forged the cheque, Donald?"

"James Douglas forge a cheque? Never." Poor Donald spoke through white, tremulous lips.

"Then who has?"

"It is impossible," muttered Donald.

"What is impossible? The thing is done. That fact cannot be denied." James in his sense of high integrity was forgetting the "quality of mercy." The stern words seemed to bring Donald to his senses.

"I was thinking of some one who might have been tempted," replied Donald.

"Who, Donald? And remember the apprentices never enter the office except when called in."

"Oh, I see, James. I see how black it looks. But I cannot tell you what I fear. Does father see me, do you think?"

"His back is toward the glass. But Mr. Sinclair has been watching us since you came in."

"I am sorry, terribly sorry he may misjudge me. But I cannot see father until I first see Jeanie."

"Donald Graeme, you are a brute—if you have no feeling for your sister, I have. You shall not tell her this thing." James uttered the words in low tones, but the passion in his voice was unmistakable.

"You don't know what you are saying, James. I would spare her if I could—but I must see her."

"And her friend, Miss Wallace, too? I suppose you will not mind if she knows that her friend's brother is—"

"Don't say it, James. You will be sorry."

"And it is nae matter if Jeanie gets a sair hert aboot it, I reckon."

"I'm sorry I told you—but I must see her before father speaks to me about this."

"You're ower late, Donald. You'r faither's standin' in the office door waitin' for ye." Donald pulled himself together with a mighty effort, and reeled rather than walked toward the office. One thought was burning in his brain and tearing at his very heartstrings. Was this where Jeanie had got the money to save him from open disgrace? Once he had thought that he might have been able to tempt her to borrow money from his father's safe. That time seemed an age away. Was he the same man now he had been then? No, no, he could see the thing now in all its hatefulness. A crime—a base crime. These thoughts flashed through his throbbing brain as a drowning man's life is said to pass before him in a few moments. Before he raised his eyes to look in his father's face, one resolution had settled itself in his mind. If Jeanie had done this thing he would bear the blame himself. The very thought seemed to give him courage. He did not look at Mr. Sinclair, but at his father, and though he felt and looked agitated, he managed to say brokenly:

"James has told me, father—and I don't know what to think."

"I suppose you know whether you are guilty or not." His father's voice had no ring of tenderness in it and Donald felt chilled to the heart.

"You seem to think me guilty, at any rate, father." Donald spoke slowly and a trifle bitterly.

"I want nae hedgin', sir," thundered David Graeme. "Did you do this thing or not?" The old man had lost self-control, and the son grew strong as the father grew weak.

"A judge and jury would give a prisoner the benefit of a doubt, father. You seem to have no doubts about my guilt. At least you might discuss this crime calmly."

"Donald is right, Mr. Graeme," said Mr. Sinclair firmly, "let us look at the cheque and its signature. It does not look like a disguised hand; does it Donald?" Donald took the cheque though his hand trembled so he could not hide his agitation.

"Richard Smith. It is a good plain hand," he said. "I believe I have seen it somewhere, but I cannot say whose it is."

"I wouldna' gie a straw for the signature," said his father. "Sae mony folks are able to copy ithers." Unfortunately for Donald he was very skillful in imitating handwriting.

"If I might advise, Mr. Graeme, it would be that we say nothing farther of this matter at the present—"

"I value yer advice aboov most, Mr. Sinclair, but I must depart from it this time. This is a maitter for the police."

"Father?" exclaimed Donald in tones of terror. Mr. Sinclair laid a kind hand on the unhappy young fellow's shoulder—

"Tell us everything." It was evident to Donald, that Mr. Sinclair also believed in his guilt. Strange as it may seem the man who, two months ago, had been ready to steal, in order to save himself from disgrace, was now indignant that a friend should suspect him of fraud. Donald drew himself up and with something of his once candid spirit shining in his eyes he said slowly:

"Father and you too, Mr. Sinclair. I see plainly that you both consider me guilty. At this, though it pains me, I do not wonder. Appearances are terribly against me. I cannot hide the fact that I am deeply distressed over this forgery. But my distress is not for myself—it is for another." Mr. Sinclair's face shone with hope—

"Who, Donald?—your father ought to know."

"I cannot give the name."

"What! not to clear your own?"

"Not even to clear my own."

"David Graeme's name was an honorable one till this day," said the old man, sternly.

"You forget, father, that nothing is yet proven."

"Except what is proved by your face, Donald." His father literally flung the words at him, his eyes flaming with passion.

"Men have been hanged in the wrong," replied Donald bitterly.

"Let me beg of you, Mr. Graeme, to preserve self-control and also the spirit of charity in this great trial. As Donald says nothing is proven yet. We must leave no stone unturned to find out who the guilty party is. It may turn out that we have been suspecting poor Donald here, in the wrong."

"I would give a' I'm worth, Mr. Sinclair, tae prove my ae son an honest man." Mr. Sinclair glanced at Donald and saw tears in the young man's eyes. Just then the tea bell sounded.

"Mrs. Graeme and the young ladies are waiting tea for us, Mr. Graeme. Let us put this sad affair out of our thoughts for a time, for their sakes."

"I'm no fit for company this evening, Mr. Sinclair. Tell the wife, will ye, that I'm too busy." Then he added, cuttingly, "Donald can take my place." Donald's anger blazed out furiously at the words.

"You are cruel father, and unjust," he exclaimed, and turned quickly to leave the office. But Mr. Sinclair was before him. He placed his back to the door and raised one hand.

"I have something to say to both of you," he said—

"First, Mr. Graeme, this unhappy occurrence need not be blazoned to the whole world. Your own family must necessarily be made acquainted with the painful fact that a forgery has been perpetuated here in your office. You have friends sojourning with you who need not know anything about it. If you absent yourself from table this evening think of how much pain you will give us all, especially Jeanie, for her friend's sake?"

"I had nae mind o' Miss Wallace nor o' Archie either. Yer richt, Mr. Sinclair; ye'll see hoo auld Dauvid can play the hypocrite, laughin' an' jestin' when his hert's black wi' grief." The minister grasped his hand.

"Thanks old friend. You were aye a brave man." Then looking steadily at Donald he continued:

"As for you, Donald, you will need to play the man this evening, by setting yourself aside and thinking of others. I want you to promise me that you will not spoil your sister's enjoyment of her friend's visit by mentioning this thing to her."

"Jeanie ought to know it, Mr. Sinclair. She has more judgment than most of us. Besides I want her to see that signature." He pointed towards the forged cheque as he spoke.

"Mr. Graeme, cannot you wait further investigations while Miss Wallace stays with you? When Mrs. Graeme and Jeanie hear of it, they cannot possibly put it out of their minds. Miss Wallace will naturally think she is not a welcome guest, and everything will be spoiled. You will let the matter rest for the present, sir?" Mr. Graeme had grown calm—the calmness of despair.

"Oh, ay, we can wait; there's nae haste. God grant that I may never hae tae ca' my son 'Ichabod.'"

Archie Monteith was the life and soul of the whole party that evening. His overflowing spirits seemed to be infectious too, as the conversation never flagged during supper. Mr. Sinclair also appeared in high spirits and told anecdote after anecdote in his own inimitable style. Mrs. Graeme's sweet face beamed with satisfaction as she noted how blithely her good man applauded the minister's stories.

The only pre-occupied, almost silent individual, in the company was Donald, who found himself seated by the side of bright, merry looking Elsie Wallace. Yet for the life of him, he could scarcely find a word to say to her except the merest commonplaces. Fortunately the unceasing flow of conversation all around concealed his distrait manner for a time. But at last Elsie in her own merry fashion rallied him on his pre-occupation.

"Mr. Donald," she said in an undertone, as she glanced mischievously up at him,

"may I ask if you are planning where to hide the apples before Jeanie and I get into the Manse garden?" He laughed in a quiet way.

"Some things cannot be hidden," he said.

"I suppose so. Are apples among the things one cannot hide?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"Because we have noses."

"Oh, of course," she laughed merrily. He looked into her large, dark eyes and the thought flashed suddenly through his weary brain: There is nothing to hide behind those eyes. Would God she could look into mine and say the same thing. He relapsed into moody silence again, and Elsie turned to Mr. Sinclair, who was seated on her right, and began chatting pleasantly.

"Jeanie was telling me that she takes the organ in your church, Mr. Sinclair."

"Yes. Were we not fortunate, Miss Elsie? Our organist is called suddenly away from us and a better than she is ready to take her place."

"Unless she was very good—a much better one, I should say. Jeanie just loves the organ."

"So do I," he said.

"And I too, Mr. Sinclair. I quite look forward to the choir practice. On Thursday afternoon, isn't it?"

"Yes. Thursday, Brigend has half a holiday. So it suits business people best."

"Are you a member of the choir?" she said turning to Donald. He felt his father's eyes on him and scarcely looking at her he said:

"Yes."

Archie Monteith sitting at the opposite side of the table had been silent for a short time, and had been intently listening to every word. He had noted Donald's embarrassment, too, from the moment he entered the room and imagining that it must have been due to the presence of Miss Elsie Wallace, he suddenly conceived the idea of giving the company a laugh at the unfortunate Donald's expense.

"I say, Donald, what has Mr. Sinclair been doing to you lately? Donald is a pupil of yours now, so Aunt Elizabeth has told me." Mr. Sinclair flushed to the very temples, while Donald wished he could vanish like Perseus under the cap of darkness.

"Donald and I have been studying natural history together, and I have enjoyed the study so thoroughly that I have just undertaken to instruct two new pupils, Miss Jeanie and Miss Elsie here." Mr. Sinclair was smiling again as he finished speaking.

"Well, I hope the study won't affect them as it has Donald. He looks as long-faced as if he were a parson himself."

"Our parson is not long-faced." Jeanie blushed most prettily as she spoke.

"Thanks, Miss Jeanie. Neither have I any reason to be long-faced."

"So far as I can see, Mr. Sinclair, gravity has fallen on Mr. Donald since he started off a-motoring with Mr. Monteith. Come, tell us what you were teaching him, Mr. Monteith. How to buy a motor car, and be happy ever after, I suppose." Elsie spoke in the most playful manner, but it was Archie's turn to look confused, yet he turned it off with a light laugh—

"The happiness-ever-after comes, Miss Elsie, when a fellow has some one to share the car with him." Archie just glanced merrily at Elsie as he spoke. Then his eyes rested meaningly on Jeanie Graeme's face. Mr. Sinclair sighed softly to himself as they all passed into the drawing room.

"Let us have some music, Miss Jeanie," he said, leading her to the piano. Jeanie was a musician of wonderful promise. The simplest pieces she played seemed to have a soul in them that ordinary players had never awakened. Murmuring waters, rushing torrents, singing birds, sweet trills and weird cadences followed each other at the player's will, till most of her listeners sat wondering and spellbound by the magic of her music.

Donald, who was passionately fond of music forgot his troubles while his sister played. When she rose from the piano he turned to Elsie who sat near him—

"Do you sing, Miss Wallace?"

"A little."

"Favor us, please," he said rising to conduct her to the piano. She looked at him, her beautiful dark eyes full of feeling.

"It is a pity to break the spell Jeanie has cast over us," she said.

"Jeanie plays beautifully, but often she makes me feel sad." Presently she was singing to a brilliant, rippling accompaniment, the quaint old song, "The Spinning Wheel." There was a sweetness and purity in her rich, well-trained voice that touched her hearers with keenest pleasure. Jeanie smiled to see the pleasure her friend's singing produced. Her father who was on the point of quitting the room paused at the door to hear the song. She slipped noiselessly to his side and whispered:

"Don't go yet, father. I'll get her to sing 'Auld Robin Gray' next."

"I cannot wait, dear," he whispered, and turned away while Elsie was still singing. silently turned to his desk and began to ar- "The way of transgressors is hard." He As she turned into the room, Archie Monof the truth of that sentence which runs: teith came forward to meet her.

"A word with you, Jeanie," he whispered. "Will you come into the moonlit garden?" She looked at him in undisguised surprise:

"No, Archie, I have other friends here besides you."

"I must see you alone, tonight."

"You cannot," she said, as the last notes of the song died away. Her face had flushed and her eyes fell as she spoke. Archie turned round quickly and looked full at Mr. Sinclair. The minister was gazing toward Jeanie, his very soul in his eyes.

A Barber Who Makes Violins

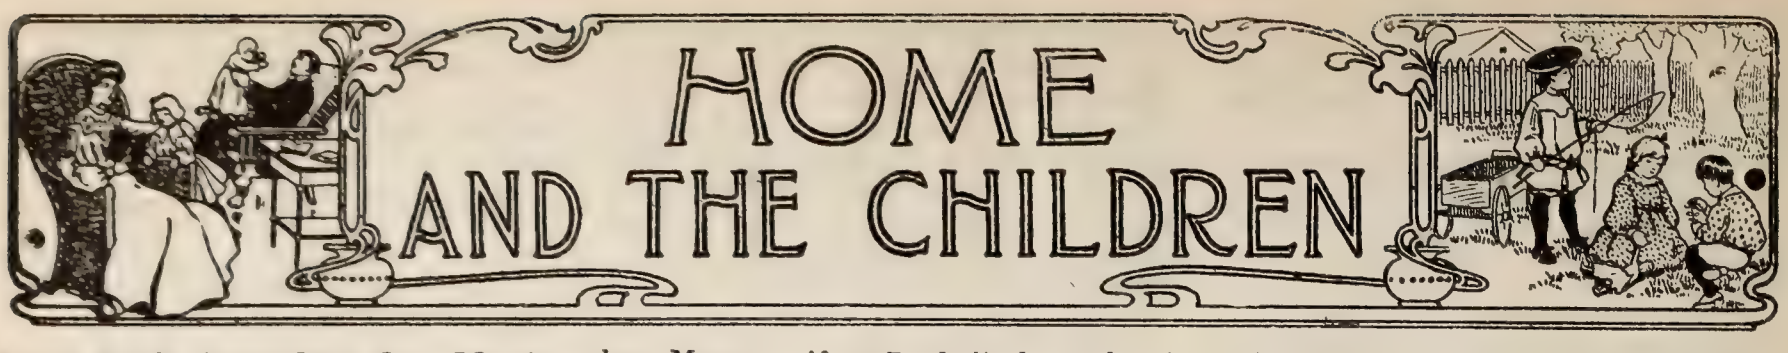
By Frances Kingdon.

To be recognized by the patrons of a barber shop out on Cottage Grove avenue and 49th street as a most excellent barber and be distinguished in musical circles as a maker of rare violins, is the unusual reputation that has been won by Joachim Bredall of Chicago.

Time was when the sensitive plodding soul of genius starved to death in an attic for an ideal, but in this materialistic age the question of food and raiment comes first, even with the very ambitious. "I am following the barber's trade," says Mr. Bredall, who looks like a young Norse god with his prematurely snow white hair and finely cut features, "because it is the only work in which I can earn the necessities of life and yet secure to myself enough leisure to make violins. I only have to be at the barber shop from five until eight in the evening and on Saturdays and Sundays, so you see I have plenty of time for the best work in my life. Some people may think that because I have learned to shave another man, cut his hair and massage his face that I could not possibly know anything about a violin, but to me it is human, the best friend I have in all the world and it is my greatest hope to make it perfect."

Inherits a Love of Music.

Mr. Bredall's father used to play the violin in his old home in Norway and many a time got a beating because he had neglected the sheep for his violin. He came to this country, settling in Minnesota, and forgot all about music in trying to be a good farmer. However, he named his fifth son Joachim, after the famous Hungarian teacher, but the lad was twelve years old before he ever heard the sound of a violin. It was Fourth of July and there was a dance going on in the town hall. Outside the door, barefoot and shy, stood a small boy who, when he suddenly heard the new sweet music of a violin, insisted on going inside and standing by the fiddler until the last dancer went home in the early morning hours. After that the boy tried to make violins out of paper, cardboard and shingles, until a neighbor finally gave him a poor broken one which he took apart and reassembled to some kind of satisfaction. Later when he was working in the Great Northern R. R. shops at Fergus Falls, he roomed with a barber who used to take his violin to his place of business and practice. Young Joachim decided to come to Chicago, learn to be a barber and then take up the study of the violin. He worked for ten years here with some of the best teachers and it was while practicing six hours a day that his hair turned white. His ambition was to become a celebrated violinist, so he sent back to the farm for his little sister, the pet and youngest of ten children, to come and study the piano. These young people were very happy together in their work and the sister was rapidly learning how to be "brother's accompanist" when she fell ill and died. The shock of her death almost broke young Joachim's heart and he felt that he could never play in public again, so gradually settled down to making violins.



Making Musical Instruments.

There is no question but that Joachim Bredall can make a very perfect violin. He manufactures all the tools with which he makes the instruments and uses only the best seasoned wood, the top and back being of spruce, and the sides of curly maple. The wood alone in these violins costs from $8.00 to $16.00, and the greatest care and skill has to be given to the vibrations in the different parts of the instrument. Ludwig Becker of the Thomas Orchestra says that Joachim Bredall's violins are masterpieces, and other violinists in the Orchestra who are using Bredall's instruments agree with him. A well known string quartet, many conservatory pupils and their teachers and several small orchestras are playing on the Bredall violin.

Mr. Bredall has just finished his first cello, on which he has worked several weeks, having spent many days on the bend in the instrument. It is carved out of one solid piece of wood and will become the property of a string quartet.

In his little workshop, where he also cooks his own meals, the busts of Beethoven and Mozart and the classical music of Chopin and Handel are all in close proximity to the frying pan and the soup kettle, but is not this confusion typical of the ways of solitary genius? For Joachim Bredall is a genius, it speaks through his work, and shines from his eyes. He has seen a beautiful vision which, by self-sacrifice, and a great patience, he has kept for his own.

Herbert Booth, youngest son of Gen. William Booth, has severed his connection with the Salvation Army after twenty-four years of active service in its behalf. He will, in the future, be engaged in "free lance" preachings throughout the world. In explaining the causes that led to his leaving the army, he said it was a personal affair, and that he did not care to discuss it. He denied that it was the result of a family quarrel, and inferred that differences in religious beliefs were at the bottom of his secession.

There Isn't Any One for Me to Play with Any More

(The last words of Mark Twain.)

BY JAMES TERRY WHITE.

The glow is fading from the western sky,
And one by one my comrades, as of yore,
Have given up their play and said good bye;
There isn't any one for me to play with any more.

Don't cry, dear heart! for I am worn and old;
No longer have I largess in my store;
E'en love's best gifts to me I could not hold;
There isn't any one for me to play with any more.

I miss the tender hand-clasp of old friends,—
The kisses of the loved ones gone before;
'Tis lonely, when the heart first comprehends,
There isn't any one for me to play with any more.

I need these loving hearts, so fond and leal;
I want them in my arms, as heretofore;
When they are reached,—I shall no longer feel,
There isn't any one for me to play with any more.

The Art of Living Together

BY MISS AMELIA H. BOTSFORD.

It is a common saying that no house is large enough for two families, but the pressure of events often brings two households under one roof, and still oftener an individual outsider comes into the family circle. Friction in these cases is often painful; the mother-in-law jokes of the newspapers have doubtless, truth at the bottom of their coarseness, but it is the general truth that it is not easy for people to live happily together.

It is women who have to bear the strain of constant intercourse of diverse natures. When the mother-in-law, the old-maid aunt, the fretful uncle or invalid cousin is taken into the home the housewife bears the burden hourly, while the husband has but little of the society of the new-comer. He escapes the constant pressure of an alien nature which may rasp his wife's nerves continually. In men's business relations there is no such wearing contact, for men's lives do not move in such narrow orbits; their lives may sometimes be tangent or even intersect; women's lives in the home are like a tangle of silk in crossing and recrossing.

So it is women who need most to understand the art of living happily together—and are not taught in any school or in any course on manners and minor morals.

When a dependent relative is brought into the home—where the presence of an outsider may prove as disastrous as that of the serpent in the first Eden—the housewife, no doubt, wishes to go through the ordeal creditably. How can it be done? Let us consider.

The first direction in the receipt for living together is: Don't do it too long at a time. What may be endured patiently for awhile becomes unendurable by uninterrupted continuance. The home is a small place, where one is brought into close association; faults and offensive peculiarities grow oppressive like tobacco smoke in a seven-by-nine room. One must have space to breathe.

Even in the case of husband and wife, a little absence may make the heart grow fonder. Many a wife will admit she prefers to have her husband leave the home for outside duties each day and give her a chance to get her own work done. Honestly, Madam Reader, would you like to have your husband, dearly beloved though he be, spend every moment of his waking hours in the same set of rooms with yourself? Yet a mother-in-law and daughter-in-law are together all day. Is it any wonder there is friction?

Men's friendships are not submitted to such strains. David and Jonathan did not spend their days and nights shut up in a city flat or in a lonely farmhouse beyond reach of neighbors. Jonathan's love might not have won the tribute that it was "passing the love of woman" if it had been subjected to woman's ordinary trials, not to speak of the extraordinary ones David's rightful wife must have endured.

Many Intermissions.

Then for the sake of peace and harmony in a family, let there be as many intermissions of close companionship as the purse and the home duties will permit. If the housewife herself cannot go away, persuade Aunt Melissa to visit Joe's wife for awhile or the difficult Cousin Peter to go down to the old farm; on the return the burden can be taken up with fresh vigor for the rest afforded. At any rate, it is possible in the home itself to have some sanctum where none may intrude, and flight to this refuge when vexations are worst, may give a needed respite. Every member of a family needs some spot free from intrusion, where her time and her belongings are absolutely her own. Respect for individual rights is as necessary in the family as elsewhere.

Gwendolen Harleth remarks to her suitor in "Daniel Deronda": "I think I dislike what I don't like more than I like what I like." And, under what appears a trivial speech, she touches a truth of human nature. The ordinary events of life do not give pleasure in proportion to the pain of the ordinary vexation. Perhaps it would be fair to say that sensibility to pain is usually keener than sensibility to pleasure. Anyway, to make a person comfortable, it is more important to avoid hurting their feelings than it is to make definite efforts for their pleasure. It is the time the corn was stepped on that is remembered, not the many times it was avoided. Every person has some sore spot, which must not be touched if harmony is desired. Unfortunately, some people seem to have a mental eczema, which necessitates their living wrapped in cotton wool and ointments. It is almost impossible to avoid hurting them, whatever you may do in the way of precautions.

In ordinary cases loving study of the guest will suffice to reveal the topics to be avoided. Religion and politics are often fruitful of dissension, and need special care in handling lest offense be given.

There are hereditary traits which must be taken into account. If the Comstock family have always been "close," she who takes a Comstock into her home must put up with that trait. If the Carter temper is proverbial, all allowance must be made for its lightning flashes. There are physical idiosyncrasies, too, which demand attention—weakness of body, dislikes to certain articles of food or certain odors—various little traits not usually held of much account, which, if not studied, are sure to make trouble in a home.

In general, it may be said that broadmindedness is especially required. The narrow person cannot conceive that others can have different likings, desires and beliefs from her own, and if they are obstinate about being so absurdly different, of course, they are wrong. Sometimes she makes it the business of her life to convert them to her own incontrovertably correct views; in other cases she simply makes life a burden to all who differ from her.

"I suppose we never quite understand why another dislikes what we like," said Mary Garth in "Middlemarch," when her mother wondered why she objected to teaching. It does seem to be difficult for the majority of women to enter sympathetically into the minds of others. Possibly they exercise their imaginations too little except about their own careers. When they see little outside of the home, it is not strange they are in danger of growing self-centered and narrow. The sympathetic imagination is a great gift, and its possessor is apt to be an agreeable person to live with. It may be unconsciously that one who lacks this gift makes herself the measure of all the inmates of her home and fits them all to her Procrustean bed, but the process is not the less painful to the victim.

Another thing which makes life difficult is an authoritative manner. Age, social superiority or the right as mistress of the house gives a tone to the speech, which is inwardly, if not outwardly, resented. To live a subordinate is the fate of many, yet it is doubtful if such a fate is ever desired or heartily enjoyed. The habit of authority grows insensibly on the head of the household, and she is usually quite unaware how she orders about the dependent within her gates. Her heart may be kindly enough, and she may wonder that she cannot make the outsider happy when she does so much for her comfort. Yet were their respective positions changed for a week, would she endure meekly that authoritative tone?

A Sense of Humor.

A sense of humor is a very good thing to help over the rough places in close companionship. She who can smile over oddities, instead of fretting her heart out in annoyance, is a fortunate woman. The things that make life unhappy are often such little things. Why not laugh over them and let them pass? It were far wiser. But do not laugh at the doer of the oddities; that were unpardonable. Ridicule is a bitter morsel to swallow, and no one has a right to serve it to a guest, especially a dependent, unfortunate guest. Indeed, kindly fun, meant in the best possible spirit, often grates, for tastes differ; so in jokes, that what is funny to one may be quite offensive to a more fastidious person. The habit of teasing, akin to the joking habit, is another strife-bringer in a mixed household. Straightforwardness works best in most cases, and is always safest.

It is evident that much unselfishness and much tact are required to live happily with others, for each must think of the other's tastes and desires and not seek her own happiness first. When one considers the rare qualities needed to make the relation a success, it is no wonder so many fail. A household saint is required, and they will never be numerous.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, JUNE 26.

Theme for the Day.—Faith and Prayer.

Scripture.—Fear not, only believe.—Mark 5:36.

All things are possible to him that believeth.—Mark 9:23.

Therefore I say unto you, all things whatsoever ye pray and ask for, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them.—Mark 11:24.

Let blow the trumpet strongly when I pray,
Till this embattled wall of unbelief,
My prison, not my fortress, fall away;
Then, if Thou willest, let my day be brief,
So Thou wilt strike Thy glory through the day.
—Tennyson ("Doubt and Prayer.")

Prayer.—Our Father, we lift our hearts to Thee in thankfulness for the abundance of Thy grace, that has given us so full and competent a revelation of Thy nature and the purposes Thou hast for us. Help us, we beseech thee, to have such faith in Thee and in our Lord Jesus Christ that all things that are best may become possible to us through him. We want such confidence as shall lead us to pray with full assurance of success. On this Thy holy day may our worship be full of sincerity, and bring us serenity of mind for all the work of the coming week. We ask in Jesus' name. Amen.

MONDAY. JUNE 27.

Theme for the Day.—For the Beloved Dead.

Scripture.—I shall go to him, but he will not return to me.—II. Sam. 12:23.

I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. God is not the God of the dead, but of the living.—Matt. 22:32.

How can I cease to pray for thee? Somewhere
In God's great universe thou art today;
Can he not reach thee with his tender care?
Can he not hear me when for thee I pray?
What matters it to him who holds within
The hollow of his hand all worlds, all space,
That thou art done with earthly pain and sin?
Somewhere within his ken thou hast a place.
—Julia C. R. Dorr ("Somewhere.")

Prayer.—Holy Father, into Thy tender mercy and love we have committed those who have gone on into the life beyond. Our hearts are often sore within us at their going. We miss them sadly, even after many days. We have no way to come to speech with them, but we know that they are in Thy keeping. Thou art not the God of the dead but of the living, and they are alive with Thee. We have always felt the joy of bearing them in our petitions to Thee. May we not do so now that we see them no more? Hold them safe in Thy good care, we pray Thee, till the night is over and the shadows flee away. Amen.

TUESDAY, JUNE 28.

Theme for the Day.—The Brevity of Time.

Scripture.—Oh, remember how short my time is.—Psa. 89:47.

But this I say, brethren, the time is short. Cor. 7:29.

We are minutes, use us well,
For how we are used we must one day tell.
Who uses minutes has hours to use,
Who loses minutes, whole years must lose.
—Park Benjamin ("Minutes.")

Prayer.—We bring to Thee, our Father, the praise of a new day. For the rest of the night we thank Thee. For the strength of body and of mind which we bring to our work we are grateful. Help us to count sacred the moments of this day. Thine they are, as we are Thine, and we would not misuse them. In all that engages our attention, our work, our study or our play, let us hold in mind the wonder of the time Thou givest us, and never send it on without some good and useful employment. This we ask in the name of Christ. Amen.

WEDNESDAY. JUNE 29.

Theme for the Day.—Beauty.

Scripture.—He hath made everything beautiful in its time.—Eccl. 3:11.

Sing unto Jehovah, and give praise in the beauty of holiness.—II. Chron. 20:21.

There is beauty in the forest
When the leaves are green and fair;
There is beauty in the meadow
Where the wild flowers scent the air:
There is beauty in the sunlight
And the soft blue sky above;
Oh, the world is full of beauty,
When the heart is full of love.
—W. L. Smith ("Beauty.")

Prayer.—O Thou who hast given us the love of all that is beautiful, and so much that satisfies this emotion, we praise Thee for Thy goodness to us. Every day brings us fresh proofs of Thy tenderness and generous bestowal of mercies upon us. May we be always ready to see the beauty in the world about us, and most of all in the lives of the men and women we know. May we understand that our happiness comes not from without but from within, and that the discovery of beauty in the world in which we live depends always upon that quality within our own souls. Grant us the beauty of holiness, in Jesus' name. Amen.

THURSDAY, JUNE 30.

Theme for the Day.—The Joy of Work.

Scripture.—And thou shalt teach them the work that they shall do.—Ex. 18:20.

And the men did the work faithfully.—II. Chron. 34:12.

Every man also to whom God hath given to rejoice in his labor; this is the gift of God.—Eccl. 5:19.

I am glad a task to me is given,
To labor at day by day,
For it bringeth me health and strength and hope,
And I cheerfully learn to say,
Head, you may think, Heart, you may feel,
But Hand, you shall work alway.
—Louise M. Alcott ("A Song from the Suds.")

Prayer.—We are once more confronted with our daily work, O God. We would not be ungrateful for this, among all Thy gifts to us. We are often weary, and think we should like to rest our tired bodies and minds. But we know how soon there comes back to us the need of the labor that keeps us in touch with all the world of effort and of hope. We thank Thee, dear Father, for our daily work. But we want always to do our work with the sense of Thy companionship. We should like to work with Thee at the good and great tasks of the kingdom of heaven. Make us co-laborers with God, and our lives shall be complete. Amen.

FRIDAY, JULY 1.

Theme for the Day.—The Nation's Reliance.

Scripture.—Thou hast the dew of thy youth.—Psa. 110:3.

When our sons shall be as plants grown up in their youth.—Psa. 144:12.

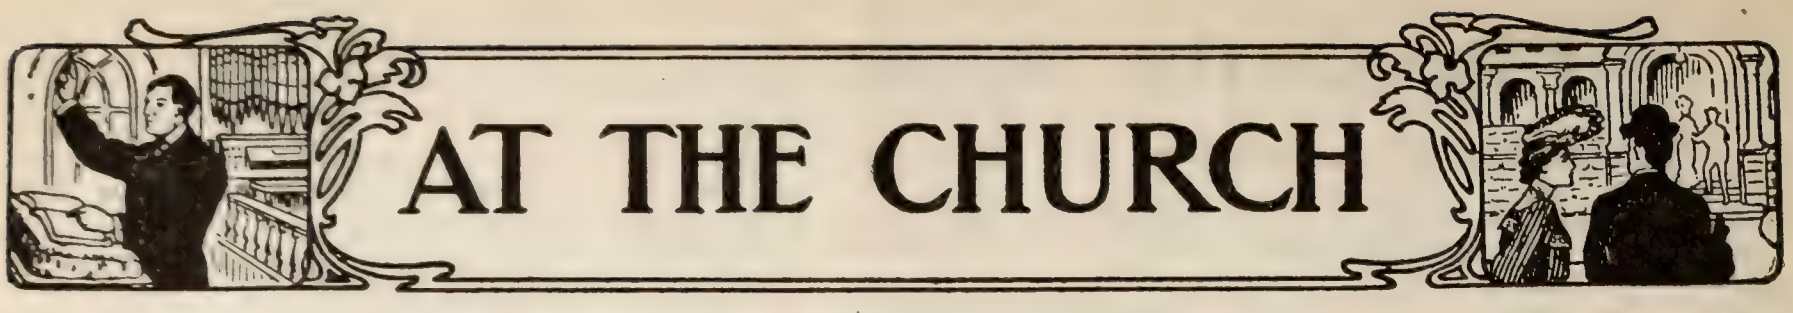
Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth.—Eccl. 12:1.

O boys who work with hand or brain
Be mindful what you do;
The nation's gain,
Her joy her pain,
Will soon depend on you.

For men who rule the world today—
Be they the false or true,
Must yield their sway
And pass away.
And leave their trust to you.

Prayer.—We praise Thee, our Father in heaven, for the land in which we live, and for all the hopes with which as its citizens we are inspired. In these days our minds are called more than at any other season of the year to the meaning of our history and the greatness of our heritage. In such a moment, O Father, we think of the boys who make up so impressive a part of the future life of our land. Help us to guard their lives from the dangers that we see about them. Keep them clean, pure of heart, generous in spirit, and lovers of whatever is honest and true. Then we shall have no fear for our land in days to come. Amen.

SATURDAY. JULY 2.



Theme for the Day.—The Lesson of the Lilies.

Scripture.—Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.—Matt. 6:28, 29.

Consider thou the lilies,
O heart of mine, today;
They neither toil nor spin to win
Their beautiful array;
I would that thou couldst live a life
So fearless sweet as they.
—Margaret S. Sangster ("Consider the Lilies.")

Prayer—O Thou in whom we live and move and have our being, teach us the lesson of calm and quiet trust that our Saviour taught the disciples of old. Save us, we beseech Thee, from the worry that disturbs and weakens our lives. May we gain more of the confidence in God which was the joy of Jesus' life, and has been the secret of so many noble and triumphant careers. We would not abandon effort, but we would count it part of a life of trust in God. May our faith grow stronger as we come nearer to Thee in love and prayer. We pray through Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

—Rev. F. M. Goodchild of New York told the Baptists in the recent convention in Chicago, that the Sunday-school in the churches of the United States is passing. He cited statistics, the fruit of twelve years' study of the subject, to substantiate his declaration and dwelt at length on the "inefficiency of the Sunday-schol teacher." He said: New York alone has lost 50,000 Sunday-school pupils in nine years. The Baptists are not alone losers, but the decrease has been felt by the Presbyterians, Methodists, Episcopalians, and the Congregationalists.

The Wonder of the Kingdom*

That is a great chapter, the thirteenth of Matthew. It has the value of illustrating Jesus' use of parables, and also of making clear the many-sidedness of the kingdom of God of which he was ever speaking. It gathers into its wide embrace a marvelous richness and variety of utterance regarding the sumpreme theme of our Savior's life. We must suppose that first and last Jesus spoke many parable that have not been recorded in the gospel narratives. But of those which have found preservation, these of this chapter are the most representative.

We have already studied two in our previous lessons, those relating to the soils and the tares. In this study five more are included. Four of the five come in pairs, two of them—the mustard seed and the leaven—referring to the expansive power of the kingdom, and two of them—the treasure and the pearl—emphasizing the preciousness of the kingdom. The last one —the net and the fish—might well be bracketed with the story of the tares, for both teach the lesson of the diverse sorts of people that make up the citizenship of the world in which the kingdom is working out its ideals.

Jesus' Little Stories.

What brief little stories these are, and yet how full of deep purpose. To one of the casual hearers of the Galilean group they may well have appeared trivial. But to us who are the heirs of twenty centuries of commentation upon them, there is no word to describe their full meaning. They put the realities of our holy faith into the most concrete and vivid forms. In them we have the facts of Christianity set forth in the most forceful and compact manner. No wonder they fastened themselves in the minds of Jesus' first interpreters, and have become the living illustration of the character of the Christian faith.

The first of these little thumb-nail sketches refers to the outward growth of the kingdom. In Jesus' day men might have questioned the truthfulness of these pictures, and of none more than this. Who could have believed in the days of the Son of Man that the little group which represented his teaching would ever become sufficiently large to attract the attention of the nations that were making history? Yet so rapid was its spread through the world that three centuries had not passed till Jesus had distanced Jupiter on the throne of the universe, and Constantine, a Christian emperor, was reigning where the Caesars had sat. And even more wonderful has been the growth of the church in the days since that. The little seed has become a mighty tree.

The Leaven.

But outward growth counts for little unless the inner life is also permeated. The story of the leaven makes this clear. Its simple and impressive point is the pervasive power of the Christian teaching. Once introduced into the mind of the world, it works till all is changed. It may be trusted so to do. There may be hindrances that retard its penetrating power, but in the end nothing can stop its transformation of the mass. This is true of nations, of communities, of individuals. The details of the picture are not essential. It is the central truth that is to be driven home.

Then come the two value parables. They both make evident the wonderful richness of the truth and life that the gospel brings. In the first a man comes by mere chance upon a treasure in a field. It may have been buried money, or a deposit of metal, or any other precious thing. Fearful that somone else should find it, he carefully covered it up again, and then bent every energy to get possession of that field. Jesus does not stop a moment to discuss trivial questions regarding this incident. Did anyone own the field ignorant of its value? What was the real duty of the finder of the treasure? A hundred such inquiries could be made. But the Master was concerned with one fact alone: the value of the treasure as estimated by the man who discovered it. So was the kingdom which he was bringing to men.

The Pearl of Price.

There is but little difference between this parable and that of the pearl. The latter was of course displayed in the open market. Everyone knew its worth. The man who longed to posses it made this the one aim of his life and sacrificed everything else that he might win the one coveted jewel. So must a man do who would win the prize of the kingdom. It is not to be compared with anything in the markets of the world. It is the pearl of greatest price. The singer of the Song of Songs says, "If a man would give all the wealth of his house for love, it would be utterly contemned." Even so of the friendship of God, which is the real secret of the kingdom.

The fifth of these little pictures is just such a scene as one may observe any morning on the shore of the Sea of Galilee. The fishing boats have taken the long nets out into the deep water, and left them to gather their prey. Then in the morning the ends of the nets are taken up by the boats and gradually pulled toward the land. On they come, slowly and carefully, dragging the heavy nets and all the spoil that they have taken. When they are as near the beach as the boats can come, the men leap out into the shallow water, still pulling the ends of the nets in from the depths.

Galilean Fishermen.

When at last the center of the net comes in, it contains a mass of leaping, squirming, frantic fish, of a dozen sorts. These the men quickly sort out. If you happen to take a fancy to any of the catch, they will probably give it to you with frank generosity, and with no thought of taking pay for it. But many of the fish are of no value. Some are too small, and some are of kinds that cannot be used. These are thrown back into the water, or cast out as refuse.

So in Jesus' picture of the kingdom of God. The same differences are there. The same careful sorting out must take place. The selection of usable material will be made at the time of final accounting. But it is also being made day by day. For the final reckoning is only the divine sanction of the choices that the individual has made through out his life.

The fish have no choice in the net. They are what they are by the law of nature. But every man definitely selects for himself the sort of character he will possess. The choice is his, not another's. Whatever be his lot in the great day, or any other day, he himself determines. The kingdom of God, which is the estate of friendship with God and with man, is made up of all such as are useful in the divine program of good will, and of no others. Every one is the arbiter of his own destiny in the day when the great net is drawn in.

The Right Sort of Teacher.

Many times in the course of his teaching Jesus must have asked his hearers if they understood clearly what was meant. He knew how new and strange these laws of the kingdom must be to men with the usual Jewish training. Even when they answered that they knew he must have seen how much instruction was needed before the ideals of his program in the world could be quite clear to them. All instruction of this sort must be slow and careful. As Isaiah of old said, it is "line upon line, precept upon precept," or else it will be but little comprehended.

So Jesus likened a teacher of truth, any one who should take up the task of instruction, to a householder, who accumulates all sorts of valuable things, and from his pos sessions is able to bring out whenever there is need just what is wanted to help in the good work of instruction. To no one is this truth clearer than to the teacher of the Word of God. Those who imagine that a brief and superficial study of what they call "the lesson" can satisfy the requirements of their work seriously misconceive their privilege and responsibility. Only the teacher who is willing to pay the price of a full and competent knowledge of child life, of the methods by which teaching can be successfully accomplished, and of the contents of the Bible, which is the great text-book, can ever be of much value in the serious business of giving young minds the knowledge of Jesus' ideals and demands. The old ground must be constantly gone over afresh to make sure that it is comprehended, and new truth must be added, so it can be made use of. Such a teacher as is effective will be like the competent scribe or teacher of the older time. rich in the possession of materials, and thus able to bring forth from the storehouse of the mind and heart things both new and old.

*International Sunday School Lesson for July 3, 1910: "Pictures of the Kingdom." Matt. 13:31-33; 44-52. Golden Text, "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit." Rom. 14:17. Memory verse, 44.

A committee, who have been making an investigation of conditions among the poor in Boston, report some striking facts in connection with the tenement districts of the city. There are sections in Boston where 427 persons are housed on a single acre, where fifteen to twenty-five adults live in one small dwelling or flat where kitchens are used as bedrooms, dining rooms, laundries and living rooms and all baths are taken in the kitchen sink. Only eight assembly districts in New York City had over 407 persons to the acre when the last census was taken. Boston's poor seem to be poorer than the unfortunates of New York.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

What is Christian Citizenship?
Ps. 24:1-8; Rev. 21:1-3.
(Consecration Meeting) Topic July 3.

Christian Citizenship is the application of the Christian standards and ideals to the functions of citizenship. That is to say, every Christian who is a citizen—and who is not a citizen in the moral sense?—must apply his Christian principles of honesty, of justice, of service, in the discharge of his duties to the state as they would in their personal lives. This concept which is so lately being sounded is new to our day. The old idea that life was composed of two rigidly separate compartments without mutual bearing, viz., the sacred and the secular, together with the attempt of our forefathers as they laid the foundations of our own government to forever escape the evils attendant upon the union of church and state, has so completely separated the two spheres of activity that we have almost lost sight of the obligation one to the other. It is not surprising that Christian men can do, and do as citizens, things, not only out of harmony with but absolutely antagonistic to their Christian ideals without the slightest compunction of conscience. This in large part accounted for the record of John E. Lee, Lieutenant Governor of Missouri under Dockery, and State Senator Holtslaw of Illinois both of whom though wearing the name Christian confessed to bribe taking while in office. On the same score we can account for the widely spread use by Christian men of dishonest methods in business transactions. While, of course, greed and selfishness, have also played a part, it has been this false conception which has allowed these men at the same time to retain honored and influential positions in the churches.

But if Christ be our judge this is all wrong. He calls for the whole life. He wants the heart from which all actions flow, all of which, too, are sacred. There are no secular things except those things which are devilish. The whole life of the Christian is sacred, and this, of course, includes his citizenship. The true Christian does not ask as he goes to cast his ballot is his party for or opposed? He seeks to know the issue and then tries through the ballot to uphold justice. He wants to uphold righteousness at all times. It may have been with the Democrats last time; it may be with the Republicans this year; it may be with the Prohibitionists or socialists next year. Party names or affiliations have little significance for him. He wants to know what the issues are and if the men who are on the right side, are honest, capable, and industrious. This is the ideal. How far Christian men fall short of the discharge of their Christian duty at this point an inventory of the personnel of our public officials reveals. But many Christian men are already in office, and if they were sensitive to their obligation of righteousness rather than to the political and economic bearing that their actions would have there would be vastly better laws on the statute books, laws protecting women and children, and insuring the workers against accidents, sickness, idleness, and old age. Laws already passed would be enforced. Many of the children in the factories would be in school. Dangerous machinery would be guarded, and factories now teaming with bacteria would be made sanitary. Men and women of course must become citizens and until that citizenship is made Christian the Kingdom will not have fully come.

The Indian's Side of the Summer War

BY ROSALIE T. SHELDON

"As long as grass grows and water runs this land shall be yours and your children's forever." "This," said Gall, a chief of the Sioux Indians, "was the treaty between the Great Father and my people after our removal from Minnesota to this country because of our outbreak in 1862."

The land to which the treaty refers was the reservation set off for the Sioux Indians in the territory of Dakota. It included the Black Hills, a section of country most desirable in the eyes of the Sioux because of its forests and hills, good for the hunt, and full of hiding places; a country essential to the well-being of a war-like Indian tribe.

As the 25th of June approaches, the anniversary of the awful tragedy of the Little Big Horn, those who were alive in 1876, and old enough to know the tragedy, will feel again the horror that spread over the country with the knowledge of the complete extermination of a detachment of United States troops in one short quarter of an hour. And so to a few comes back the story of the victors, told coolly and sadly by Chief Gall after an eight years' perspective on the event. Gall was the war-chief of the Dakotas or Sioux, the man who led in battle many years, cool in judgment, superior in intellect, of few words. He was a colleague of Sitting Bull, the orator of the tribe, the man who with his gift of speech instigated many outbreaks, worked his people to frenzy and urged them on to most unfortunate action which the better judgment of Gall would often have averted. When Sitting Bull's frenzied ranting had brought about the war fever, it was always Gall who planned and directed the campaign. Sitting Bull's power lay in speech and Gall's in action, and in character the men were to each other as black to white. Gall was a man with unusual breadth of vision, an understanding of human nature and an ability to control situations. He was cool and slow to act but powerful in action. He loved peace but was terrible in war. Certain United States officers who knew him said of him in his prime that he was "cut out to be one of the great generals of the world." This man honestly deplored the Custer war. In telling his side of the story he said, quoting the terms of the treaty, "When given this land for our own we were told that thereafter we were never to cross the boundaries into other territories, nor were white men, without government permits, to enter our reservation. When white prospectors first came out to the Black Hills looking for gold, they did so without such permits. Finding the land rich they flocked there in great numbers, and no expostulations on our part, no complaints to government officials did any good. They not only remained on some of our best lands, but they constantly molested us, even to dastardly affronts to our women. They found pleasure in frightening and tormenting those Dakotas with whom they came in contact. They drank liquor and were often ugly. We appealed to our agents; we pointed to our treaty; we begged the White Father to remember the terms to which we agreed, but the flood of miners pouring into the hills every day was not stopped, and matters grew worse and worse. We met them everywhere. Nowhere could we find peace, nor could we follow our accustomed life. Our game was shot or was frightened out of our reservation, and we were in a desperate condition. We retaliated. That made our life among the whites impossible, and so we crossed the border into Canada, unlawfully, perhaps, but knowing no alternative. The Great Father having broken his side of the treaty we felt that it held no longer for us. The Canadian government drove us back, and we tried to live peaceably on our lands, ignoring the whites, but it was not possible. Again we crossed into Canada. Three times in all we went over the border and three times we were driven back, and through it all we were pestered and irritated in every way known to the men who came for our gold.

"At last we saw no other way than to declare war. This we did, regretting the necessity as much as did the Great Father at Washington.

"Troops were sent out to fight us and we were hard pressed. Among us were the miners. Closing in on all sides were the United States troops. Our position was desperate. Our wives and children were ill with fright, and we saw nothing ahead of them but extermination after such distress as we dared not contemplate. We retreated. We were driven back and back, finally working our way into the valley of the Little Big Horn. There we had the first and only advantage, knowing the country as the troops did not know it, and we were able to hide our movements to some extent. But this meant to us only a little more time. Our final defeat seemed inevitable. There was no real escape possible, nowhere to go. We traveled heavily loaded with our families and all that we owned. We knew a section of the river valley, where, if we could reach it, we proposed to make a stand. It was a sort of pocket surrounded on all sides by high, wooded bluffs with sloping sides, the only entrance to which lay through a narrow defile at one end. Toward this we worked, keeping our families in front of us, watching every moment for a sudden attack. We reached the spot, secreted our women and children as well as we could, and hurriedly spread ourselves out over the hillsides, among the trees, leaving a few men only in the open in compact mass.

"It was not long before Custer's detachment reached us and followed into the pocket, supposing that our men in the open were all there were of us. And Custer's men were alone, though we looked for other detachments which we knew to be close at hand. This is probably why we won the battle.

"It was over in a very short time.

"We did what even dogs would have done; we fought to protect our own."

(This story was told the writer by Chief Gall himself.)

The ninety-fourth annual report of the American Bible society shows that during the last year the total issue of publications at home and abroad was 2,826,831, of which 1,427,247 came from the Bible house in New York and 1,399,384 from the society's agencies abroad, being printed on mission and other presses in Turkey, Syria, Siam, China and Japan. These issues consist of 327,636 Bibles, 545,743 New Testaments and 1,953,452 pamphlets. The total output of Bibles by the society in ninety-four years reaches 87,296,182 volumes.

* * *

The conventions of the churches of Missouri were held last week in Jefferson City.

E. L. Mitchell is just closing a successful year with the church at New Holland, Ohio.

J. C. Hanna has resigned the pastorate at DeSoto, Iowa, and accepted a call to Ulyses, Nebraska.

Dr. George H. Combs of Kansas City delivered the commencement address at the Washington University, St. Louis, Mo.

C. H. Winders, Irvington, Indiana, preached the baccalaureate sermon for the high school at Bowling Green, Mo.

Texas has chosen as its Bible school superintendent, Edwards Owers, pastor of the church at Graham. Texas.

W. G. Conley has resigned as pastor of the church at Cavina, Calif., after four years' service.

J. E. Lynn, pastor of the church at Pueblo, Colo., is teaching a men's class which is studying the history of the Hebrew people.

Guy B. Williamson preached the memorial sermon for the Grand Army and Odd Fellows at Geuda Springs, Kansas.

W. M. Mayfield, Butler, Mo., reports three additions to the church there during the month of May.

Chas. S. Medbury, Pastor University Church, Des Moines, delivered the commencement address at Butler College this year.

Mrs. D. N. Wetzel, wife of the pastor of the church at Mattoon, Ill., has been seriously ill of blood poisoning, but is reported to be rapidly improving in health at present.

The following churches near Pittsburg are without pastors: Belmar, Bellevue, Homestead, McKees Rocks. They all have out their line for the men they think will fill the bill.

The East End Church, Pittsburg, has practically raised its $1,200 for foreign missions and will thus have two representatives on the foreign field.

C. D. Hedges, Eureka, Ill., reports a visit to the Smyrna Church in North West, Mo., the twelfth of June. The offering for children's day was taken, amounting to $8.57.

Children's Day exercise yesterday. Nearly $200 raised. Assures us in the support of Mrs. Wilson as our Living-link. Everybody happy.—Ray O. Miller, Fresno, Cal.

Fred M. Lindenmeyer goes from Des Moines to Pickering, Mo., where he locates as pastor of the church. This church will give $175 to all missionary work this year.

H. O. Breeden has been secured by the West Side Church, San Francisco, as supply pastor for the remainder of the summer, and until evangelistic work opens up again in the autumn.

The West Texas Convention was held at Pecos. Jasper T. Moses was chosen president, Mrs. C. L. Heath secretary. It is said that the convention was accounted very successful by all who attended.

Homer L. Magee, pastor of the church at Pecos, where the West Texas Convention was held this year, has led the small band of Disciples in that place to the erection of a new $15,000 church building.

L. S. Harrington, who has just graduated from Eureka College, has accepted a call to the church at Belleflower, Ill., where he is already at work, and will move to the field about the middle of July.

What was designated as "Home Coming Day" was celebrated on a recent Sunday at the Central Christian Church, Pueblo, Colo., where J. E. Lynn has recently been installed as pastor, going from Warren, Ohio.

The Central Church of Pueblo was founded in 1882; its history covering a period of twenty-eight years. There is a splendid spirit in the church and the promise for the present pastorate is bright.

The Children's Day Offering of the Central Church of Pueblo is already more than double that of any previous year in the history of the school and the offering is not yet completed.

A new pipe organ is being installed in the church at Colorado Springs, Colorado, where George B. Stewart is pastor. The work of the church here is making fine progress and Mr. Saewart has been given an indefinite call to remain with the church.

Irving S. Chenoweth is now in charge of the Union Ave. Church, St. Louis, Mo., serving as acting pastor until September, when B. A. Abbott will enter upon his duties as pastor of the church.

Madison A. Hart, Columbia, Mo.; P. W. Harding, Columbus, Ind.; Grant A. Robbins, pastor of the M. E. Church, Sedalia, Mo., and A. W. Kokkendorfer are to leave New York, July 7, for a short trip to Europe.

Frank E. Mallory, pastor of the First Church, Parsons, Kansas, preaches the memorial sermon in the afternoon to a crowded house. The sermon as highly commended by the local press.

J. B. Jones, pastor of the church at Marion, Ind., gave the memorial day address to a large audience; indeed, it is said that Mr. Jones is preaching to that sort of audiences every Sunday.

S. G. Fisher, pastor of the church at Walla Walla, Wash., reports that the offering of this church on children's day was $410 for home missions and $125 for foreign missions. This in spite of the prevailing financial depression in that section of the country.

The Portland Ave. Church, Minneapolis, Minn., is making a canvass of its membership tryiyng to bring the annual budget of the church for current expenses up to $4,500. John G. Slayter, who took charge of this work but a few months ago, already has the situation well in hand.

The offerings from the Sunday schools from June 6 to 16 amounted to $18,096, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $5,000, or nearly 40 per cent. We have reason now to hope that there will be a gain of at least $10,000 from the Sunday schools.

John A. Jayne, pastor of the church at Hampton, Va., is preaching to large and growing audiences. He recently gave a lecture on "Ben Hur" which netted over fifty dollars for the ladies' society of the church. Mr. Jayne teaches a Bible class of men which is growing rapidly.

Sunday, June the fifth, marked the twentieth anniversary of George B. Van Arsdall's ordination to the ministry, and he celebrated the event by preaching in the Central Church, Denver, of which he is pastor, a sermon on "Things that Twenty Years' Service in the Ministry Have Convinced Me Are True."

The Sunday-svhool at Ann Arbor, Mich., secured over $500 on Children's Day. This was indeed a great victory for the school is not large. The most significant Children's Day offering of which we have heard is that of New Washington, Ohio, where the attendance was only twelve and the offering $30.90. We extend congratulations.

The church at Crystal Lake, Ill., observed children's day June 12. T. F. Weaver of the University of Chicago has been supplying for this church of mornings for the last few weeks, and in the evenings he preaches for the Metropolitan Church, Chicago. It is expected that C. R. Scoville will be with the Metropolitan Church after the first of July.

The Minnesota churches met in convention at Rochester last week. The program consisted of addresses by a number of the preachers of the state on up-to-date social and educational problems, and addresses of the secretaries of the various missionary boards and Mr. Shellenberger of the brotherhood.

George G. Ritchey, Newberg, Ore., says: "Why not have a Perpetual Living-link, a $10,000 cash gift to bear interest at 6 per cent like annuity money, thus making a Living-link every year, a memorial Perpetual Perpetual Living-link. Many rich people might perpetuate their memory and usefulness in that way. Others might give in the name of a departed loved one." Splendid idea. Who will be the first to give $10,000?

R. E. Elmore has been pastor of the First Church, Roanoke, Va., for the past four years. He began at a salary of $900 per year and so greatly has the church grown that they now reward their pastor with $1500 per year. During this time the missionary offerings of the church have grown constantly, the audiences have increased, and a new $15,000 building erected and the church entirely freed from debt.

"A four-months' contest with Virginia, our county seat, and Literbury Sunday Schools closed in which we won by a small majority, the contest having been close enough all the way through to bring desired results to each school. In the four months the attendance gradually increased from 117 to 439, on the last day. The collection from $2.25 to $209.87. Men and women, who had not been in Sunday-school for 20 years, caught the spirit of the times and came in such crowds that the church would not hold them. Some classes had to meet out in the yard and even standing room was at a premium inside. Personal work of the Superintendent and teachers did it. Greatest Sunday-school in history of the church. I. A. Engle, Minister.

The Tabernacle Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., G. H. Steed, pastor, becomes a Living-link in the Foreign Society. This makes thirty-two new Livivng-links this year, tne largest number in any one year.

Professor Austin P. Finley, acting Dean of the Biblical Department of Drury College, Springfield, Mo., will spend the summer in Chicago University and can be had for pulpit supply on Sundays for churches in reach. Address him, 135 S. Divinity Hall, Chicago University.

The First Church, Oakland, Calif., is building a beautiful new church. Until the new house is completed they will meet in the First Baptist Church. The pastor of the Baptist Church is absent for a time, and the pastor of the Christian church will preach to both congregations.

E. A. Cole, who will become pastor of the First Church, St. Louis, Mo., the first of September, has just closed a successful pastorate of nine years in Washington, Pa. Mr. Cole is nearly fifty years of age, has a fine record for accomplishment in the pastorate, and may reasonably be expected to make the work at St. Louis the most glorious of his life.

June 12 was a great day in the history of the church at Dixon, Ill. The pastor, S. Ellwood Fisher, who recently took charge of this work, led in the services of rededication of the church, which had been painted, papered, and the auditorium rearranged and reseated so as to better accommodate the audiences and the Sunday school.

The Wednesday evening lectures on biblical subjects presented to the audiences at the mid-week meeting of th Central Church, Denver, have proven so helpful and popular that the church has requested that they be continued again in the autumn. Until the summer vacation Mr. Van Arsdall will lead the audiences in the study of the Psalms, and in the autumn will take up again the biblical lectures.

Children's Day at S. Geddes St. Church of Christ, Syracuse, N. Y., greatest in the history of school. Offering of $86 for mission. School has averaged 178 since moving into new building in January. Church recently closed prosperous year nearly $4,000 raised for all purposes. 57 added during year. C. R. Stauffer is pastor.

F. D. Ferrall sent the following good report of the work at Bloomfield, Iowa:

"Four added since last report. Splendid Children's Day program the evening of June 12. Morning sermon devoted to the children who filled the front rows of pews in the main auditorium. I will close my work with the Bloomfield congregation the middle of September, completing five years of service. Have not yet arranged definitely for future field of labor.

"A Flower within a Flower," was subject of a recent sermon by W. H. Bagby, of Missoula, Montana. The sermon was fully reported in a paper of the city. The first words of the discourse give the thought:

"This fine passage suggests to the imagination the picture of a flower within a flower. The first is the flower of creation, the second the flower of personality. Men devote their lives to the study of the flowers that spring up in the morning and in the evening are cut down and cast into the oven. The flowers we are to study this morning will never fade nor fail."

The Sunday school of the church at Jefferson St., Buffalo, B. S. Ferrall, pastor, gives a combined offering for all missions of $660. Children's day was a happy occasion with the school. The next great event is the annual excursion to Crystal Lake, fifty miles from the city. Mr. Ferrall thinks there will be from 1,000 to 1,200 people take advantage of the trip to the beautiful resort.

The church at Lilly Creek, Ind., observed children's day on June 5. Twenty-four dollars was raised, an increase of eight dollars over last year. This offering is very encouraging, as the school has only a membership of thirty; also, the church had just completed papering their building. The pastor, W. H. Smith, will spend his vacation in Port Stanley, Ontario.

The General Education Board of New York has made a grant of $50,000 to Transylvania University on condition that the university raise $150,000 additional to be added to the permanent endowment. The College of the Bible has directed its financial secretary to join in securing the amount necessary to claim the grant. W. T. Donaldson and J. W. Hardy are now in the field. President Crossfield will devote most of the vacation to securing funds.

B. H. Hayden, in a good letter, tells us of the good things that have recently come to the Disciples of London, Ontario. In May, A. Martin of Morgantown, W. Va., visited the church, giving a lecture. During the Ontario annual convention, June 1-6, I. N. McCash, Stephen J. Corey and R. P Shepherd of St Louis, Mo. Other speakers heard by the church there recently have been Dr. W. E. Macklin of China, Miss Bertha Clawson of Japan, and Mrs. Linton of South America.

J. H. Gilliland has resigned the pastorate of the Centennial Church, Bloomington, Ill., which so recently dedicated its beautiful new house of worship. Mr. Gilliland says that he regards this the crowning achievement of his twenty years' ministry in Bloomington. He will not take up fuurther pastoral work in Bloomington, but for a time may be had for dedications and a few meetings. It is possible that Mr. Gilliland may be induced to accept a pastorate again, if a real opportunity for service presents itself.

The adult Bible classes of three different churches in Trenton, Mo., are to co-operate in the establishment of a lecture course during the coming year. Last year the lecture course was under the direction of the ministerial association and money was lost which the preachers individually had to make up. Three classes are composed of business men and it is a fine way of practicing the religion of the Christ in united service of the community.

Elster M. Haile, president of Hereford, reports encouraging progress for the college. The citizens of Hereford have raised $25,000, payable in five yearly installments, as a temporary endowment for the college. The friends of the College outside Hereford are to raise an equal amount. This will enable the college to a much greater work in the future. Mr. Haile expects to be in Chicago during the summer in attendance upon the summer school at the University of Chicago.

Mark Williams, who has been compelled to return to America after eight years in England, has accepted a call to the new East Side Church, Milwaukee, Wis., where he will rejoice in the co-operation of his old Drake class-mate, Mr. Robert Nourse, who has so faithfully supported the work of this new church. Mr. Williams feels sure of the support of the people of the church and exceedingly hopeful over the future of the work.

Sunday, June the fifth, marked the dedication of the First Church, Pomona, Calif. The new building was erected at a cost of $62,000, and is the best Christian church in the west. A remarkable event occurred at the morning service. The church soloist, Miss Whipp, who possesses a notable voice, sang, and so pleased the audience that a wealthy man, not a member of the church, presented a $100 bill toward the payment of the church, and said he would double that if the soloist would sing again. This she did and an offering was taken amounting to $28,000.

A rally of the Christian Endeavor Societies of our own churches was held at the Jackson Blvd. Church, Chicago, Monday, June 13. Most of the societies of the city sent delegations; the largest was from the Ashland Ave. Church. Claude E. Hill, of Valparaiso, Ind., National Superintendent of C. E., among our own people was present and made the address of the evening. It was a very thoughtful address. Mr. Hill departed from the conventional style of Christian Endeavor address and interpreted the movement in the light of present day religious tendencies. The part of his address dealing with the problem of Christian union was the most significant. The sentiment for Christian union has come and is strong. What is needed is a program. The problem of union is old with us and comparatively new to other people. We have worked at the program and through Christian Endeavor will be able to make valuable contribution to its solution. He quoted John Temple Graves who declared that the position of the Disciples of Christ is the position of ultimate Protestantism. This address should be delivered extensively over the country. It was voted to reorganize our city Christian Endeavor union and a committee was appointed to nominate officers and report at a subsequent meeting to be held in the near future.

A New School With a Phenomenal Record: Third Session Just Closed.

The fourth school in our brotherhood in ministerial attendance. Eighty-two ministerial students enrolled last year, including five pastoral helpers. Forty-nine graduates from all departments. The following schools and colleges in successful operation:

1. College of Liberal Arts.
2. The College of the Bible.
3. Teachers' College.
4. University High School.
5. College of Business.
6. College of Music.
7. School of Oratory and Expression.
8. School of Fine Art.
9. University Hospital and Training School for Nurses.
10. Post Graduate School.

Splendid Ladies' Home, modern in all its appointments. Board at actual cost. Sixty pulpits in Oklahoma and Kansas now being filled by ministerial students. Room for as many more within easy reach of the school. Young men wanting preaching points to pay expenses, address C. C. Taylor. Send for catalog to Miss Emma F. Hartshorn, Registrar. All communications should be addressed: University Station, Enid, Okla.

Important Statement.

If young men who can preach acceptably, and wish to make further preparation for their work, would have faith enough to come here and enter school, they would be able to get preaching points in a short time. There are a hundred churches or more within reach of the school that are now ready, or could be worked up by a little effort, to support ministerial students.

The Memorial Church, Chicago, observed "Flag Day," June 12. Dr. Willetts' sermon was "The Colors." A male quartet sang, "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean," and "Tenting on the Old Camp Ground." The Abraham Lincoln Post of the Grand Army were guests of the church for the day.

G. B. Baird, Lu-chow-fu, China, says: "When can we expect the money for our church building? Last Sunday 225 in Sunday school. In the very crowded hospital we have to find room for ten large classes. Our largest meeting place in the city is the hospital patients' waiting room built to accommodate one hundred persons. We have 140 enrolled who are asking the way of life and we have no place to care for them. We must have a new church building at once or stop tring to enlarge our work."

Thst first anniversary of the South Side Church, Hannibal, Mo., has just been held. It has been a great year with the church and the anniversary service was a time of great rejoicing. During the last year the average attendance of the Sunday school has been 212. The church was organized with 145 members. During the year there have been added to the membership 101, with a present membership of 242. Already the $20,000 building is proven inadequate for the needs of the church. The pastor, Clarence E. Wagner, says that frequently on Sunday evenings it is necessary to turn people from the door. Think of it!

William Price, minister Howett Street Church, Peoria, sends the following note: Children's Day, second Sunday in June, A great day in all three of our Bible schools. Howett Street Bible school had an attendance of 310 and an offering of $135.00 Central Bible school an attendance of 360 and an offering of $160.00. West Bluff Bible school held its opening session with 202 present, offering $8.75. Total attendance in our three schools, 872. Total offering for missions, $303.75. We are now assured of becoming a Living-link in the foreign field by our united efforts.

One of our young pastors, Joseph L. Garvin of Seattle, has just been signally honored by being elected president of the Seattle Ministerial Federation for a second term. This body is composed of the ministers of all the Protestant churches in the city. Previous to the present election it has been the rule that no president shall succeed himself in office, a rule which has been heretofore rigidly adhered to. During Mr. Garvin's first term as president, which has just expired, his administration was one of such unusual efficiency that he was re-elected unanimously despite his unwillingness to accept the office. He will serve as president of the general ministerial body made up of the ministers of about 135 churches in Seattle from the present time until September, 1911.

The following note, clipped from the school notes of the Southern Christian Institute will have interest to our readers: "The first shipment of lumber from our sawmill went out on the 9:50 mail last Thursday night to President Lehman, who spoke at Eureka, Ill., the following Sunday, and to Elder Charles S. Medbury, whose Sunday school class made the gift of the sawmill to the institution. It was almost supper time Thursday evening, June 9, before the great log began to make its journey on the carrier toward the saw. The engine was snorting and puffing and anxious to be about its newfound mission. Slab after slab came off, and the prayers of more than a decade became a fact before our eyes. None was happier in it all than Professor Prout and his boys, who had worked so faithfully to get the machinery in working order. This institution at Edwards, Miss., is one of our most fruitful educational interests.

The Central Church, Des Moines, Iowa, made a great appeal to the people of the church and the community in the campaign for children's day. This appeal was made strong by the fact that this church supports four living link missionaries who are doing great service. Mrs. Ada McNeil Gordon represents the C. W. B. M. in Mahoba, India. She has been supported by this society for twelve years. Mrs. Herbert Smith, who, with her husband, went to Bolenge, Africa, about a year and a half ago, is supported by the church through the Foreign Society. E. W. Finkle represents the church in his service as pastor of the Chesterfield church, Des Moines; C. N. Biglow labors in the same capacity for the church at Ninth and Shaw. Finis Idleman is pushing all departments of the work at Central with vigor.

Our churches at Galesburg and Knoxville, Ill., co-operated in a rally and field day Tuesday, June 7. The Galesburg Bible school chartered a special train on the Interurban line which connects the two cities and took the children free of charge to Gilbert's Park Knoxville where the rally and picnic was held. About a dozen congregations of that section of the state were represented, there being a thousand people in attendance. The great feature for the children and young people was the athletic contest between the two schools under whose auspices the rally was held, the honors being about equally distributed. Stephen J. Corey spoke in the afternoon representing the Foreign Society. Arthur Holmes delivered two masterly addresses along Brotherhood lines. P. C. MacFarlane spoke at night at the Brother-session which was largely attended by the men. The addresses were of the highest order and the work in the various communities represented in the rally is greatly strengthened.

VALPARAISO UNIVERSITY

(Accredited)

Valparaiso, Indiana

One of the Largest Institutions of Learning in the United States.

Thirty-Eighth Year Will Open September 20, 1910

In 1873 the school had 3 Departments, 4 Instructors and an annual enrollment of 210 different students. Now there are—

25 DEPARTMENTS
187 INSTRUCTORS
and an annual enrollment last year of 5437 Different Students
Excellent Equipments

The reason for this remarkable growth is in the fact that the Institution is constantly increasing its facilities, strengthening its courses of study and offering additional advantages, without making the expense to the student any greater.

DEPARTMENTS.

Preparatory, Teachers', Kindergarten, Primary, Pedagogy, Manual Training, Scientific, Biology, Civil Engineering, Classical, Higher English, German, French, Spanish, Italian, Elocution and Oratory, Music, Fine Art, Law, Pharmacy, Medical, Dental, Commercial, Penmanship, Phonography and Typewriting, Review.

THE DENTAL DEPARTMENT
recently acquired by the University is the well-known Chicago College of Dental Surgery, one of the oldest and best equipped dental schools in the country, Dr. Truman W. Brophy, Dean, Chicago, Illinois.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.
The course of study in the Medical Department is the same as that of the best medical schools. The University owns its college and hospital buildings both in Chicago and Valparaiso. Two years of the work may be done in Valparaiso, thus reducing the expenses, or the entire four years may be done in Chicago.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL
enables the School now to accommodate all who wish work in music.

CIVIL ENGINEERING.
The Revised Course in Civil Engineering is worthy of careful consideration.

The expenses are made so low that anyone can meet them.

Tuition, $18 per quarter of 12 weeks.

Summer Conferences of the Young People's Missionary Movement

Anyone who has ever attended one of these delightful and instructive conferences will never forget the experience. The aim is to train leaders of mission study classes and all other forms of missionary activity in connection with Sunday-schools, young people's societies, and other church organizations. The inspirational and practical are combined so that the training may be well rounded and wholesome. These conferences are held at delightful places so that it is possible to combine vacation and edification.

Seven of these summer conferences will be held during the summer of 1910. Besides the Southern conference to be held at Nashville, July 1-10, the following conference meeting places and dates are announced: Lake Geneva, Conference Point, Williams Bay, Wis., July 1-10; Whitby, Ontario, July 1-8; Knowlton, Quebec, July 12-19; Sunday-school, Silver Bay, New York, July 14-21; General conference, Silver Bay, New York, July 23-31; Rocky Mountain, Cascade, Colorado, August 3-12.

It is hoped that many of our pastors and young people may attend some of these conferences. Address all inquiries to Stephen J. Corey, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Wonderful Opening in Tibet

These stirring words come from Dr. Shelton, on the Tibetan border: "We are exceedingly glad to know of Dr. Hardy's appointment, and shall be so glad to see him. We not only need Brother Hardy but several more. The country is open for five hundred miles farther than it ever has been, now. I have just returned from a trip over the border where we've never been allowed to go before, and so soon as my purpose of doctoring the sick was known I was welcome to go where I pleased and when I pleased. I was urged to stay, and when I couldn't, urged to return as soon as possible. I treated some five hundred or six hundred patients, nearly half of whom were people who had never seen a white man before, and the painless removal of fingers, toes and other minor operations were miracles to them. The Lord is blessing us and causing the work to grow beyond our fondest hopes. Mr. Ogden is busy night and day with his part of the work, and—Oh! we need some more good men and women so badly."

Hopeful Progress

This word of brief survey is noted on June 15, after eight and one-half months of the current missionary year has passed into history. The receipts so far encourage us. There has been a gain of more than $20,000. It will be remembered that last year, the Centennial year, there was a total gain of about $76,000. It is but frank to say that some friends have feared a decline this year. True, this might come yet before September 30, but we certainly hope not. During September last year the receipts reached the magnificent sum of $83,416.26!

There has been a great gain in annuity gifts, the largest in our history. The Children's Day offering starts off with a gain of about $5,000 or almost 40 per cent from June 7 to June 15. Again we are reminded that little children lead us. A large number of new Living-links has been enrolled. However, the churches as churches are somewhat tardy in forwarding their gifts. This is a surprise. All the signs indicate that they will give more this year than ever before, but up to the present date they are some $3,000 short of the offering for the corresponding time last year. We have confidence that they will yet make a very considerable increase before the year closes.

Lt us remind the friends that some heroic tasks await us before the close of the year if we are saved from a discouraging loss. We beseech the churches everywhere to gird themselves for a final assault. We hope to witness very large returns during July. True, the vacation season is upon us, but we cannot afford to neglect our missionary army, more than eight hundred strong? Their work must go on without hindrance or any kind of embarrassment. We are under the most solemn obligations to meet their every material need.

Walter M. White's Work at Mexico, Mo.

Having been instrumental in bringing Walter White to Missouri, and having known somewhat intimately of his phenomenal work at Mexico, I feel moved to say a word of appreciation of him and his work, and to express a regret which we all here in Missouri feel over his leaving our state. His two years in Mexico resulted in bringing that al-

Cook in Comfort

You no longer need wear yourself out with the weakening heat of an intensely hot kitchen. You can cook in comfort.

Here is a stove that gives no outside heat. All its heat is concentrated at the burners. An intense blue flame (hotter than either white or red) is thrown upwards but not around. All the heat is utilized in cooking — none in outside heating.

New Perfection
WICK BLUE FLAME
Oil Cook-stove

entirely removes the discomfort of cooking. Apply a match and immediately the stove is ready. Instantly an intense heat is projected upwards against the pot, pan, kettle or boiler, and yet there is no surrounding heat — no smell — no smoke.

Cautionary Note: Be sure you get this stove—see that the name-plate reads "New Perfection."

Why? Because The New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove is scientifically and practically perfect. You cannot use too much wick — it is automatically controlled. You get the maximum heat — no smoke. The burner is simple. One wipe with a cloth cleans it — consequently there is no smell.

The New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove is wonderful for year-round use, but especially in summer. Its heat operates upward to pan, pot, or kettle, but not beyond or around. It is useless for heating a room.

It has a Cabinet Top with shelf for keeping plates and food hot.

It has long turquoise-blue enamel chimneys. The nickel finish, with the bright blue of the chimneys, makes the stove ornamental and attractive. Made with 1, 2 and 3 burners; the 2 and 3-burner stoves can be had with or without Cabinet.

FOR THE SUMMER QUARTER

Now is the time to send your order for the Bethany Graded Sunday School Lessons for the Summer Quarter, beginning July 1.

Many schools will install the Graded Lessons in the Summer so as to "get used" to them by the opening of the new season in October.

In October there will be four new courses added to the three that have been running the past year.

Next year will be a rich year for the Graded Schools. Get ready for it by introducing the Bethany Lessons July 1.

ready splendid church to a degree of efficiency which it had hardly dared to think it possible to reach. The Board and church stood loyally by him, and were willing to be led into larger life and wider activities. The church became a Living-Link in both Home and Foreign work, and greatly increased its offerings to all other missionary work. But it was in the Sunday-school that the greatest growth was sustained. Going from a school of about 200 to a great, world-known school of over 1,800, in two years, is certainly "going some." Brother White was prominently and helpfully identified with all our interests in Missouri. A committee of which I was chairman urged him to accept a call to our state secretaryship, but he did not see his way to do so.

We are all proud of him and of the splendid work he has accomplished in Mexico. We hoped he would spend the rest of his life in Missouri. But now that he has gone to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, we commend him to the brotherhood of our sister state, and assure them and the Cedar Rapids church that in Walter White they have a man who is "worthy of all acceptation," one who will spend his full power in making both his local work and the general work reach its full limit of efficiency. We give him up with great reluctance, and shall rejoice in every success that shall be his in his new field.

GRAHAM FRANK.

Front Rank Certificates

The first Front Rank Certificates are issued! Number One goes to the splendid school at South Broadway, Denver, Colo., of which Brother Chas. L. Mason is superintendent. It is a great school and its report indicates its excellency along all lines. The second goes to Lamar, also in Colorado, who by telegram announced the completion of the last essential requirement. It speaks well for the Colorado State Superintendent, E. M. Cosner, that this state gets not only the first certificate, but also the second. In a personal letter he says he has many more about ready to send it. At any rate, Colorado is now leading the nation. Let the other states get busy. With many schools the sending of the foreign missionary offering last Sunday made them "Front Rank."

The question has come as to what constitutes "missions at home?" In the minds of those who framed this standard at Pittsburg, this meant some offering to the American Christian Missionary Society. The regular time for this offering was last November, but of course it may be sent at any time. Some states have included with this an offering for state work, but that is optional with the state workers entirely.

A Visit to the Fields

Secretary F. M. Rains of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society will sail for the East early in August to visit the mission fields. He will go first to Australia at the urgent invitation of the Australian brethren and will spend three or four weeks there, visiting the churches and conventions in the interests of Foreign Missions. From Australia he will go to India spending about two months visiting the mission stations, studying the work, and planning with the missionaries. His next point will be the Philippines, where our young and growing work will be visited. A month or so will be taken for the work and workers there. After the Philippines he will cross over to China. This is our largest mission, but fortunately the stations are all close together and easily reached. Probably six weeks will be needed for a thorough visitation of this important and rapidly changing field. After crossing over to Japan a month will be spent in visiting the four main stations there. Then Mr. Rains will take the Trans Siberian Railroad across Russia to Europe, from whence he will sail for the Congo, West Africa. After reaching Matadi at the mouth of the Congo, he will proceed up that great river to Bolenge, our chief African station. After studying the work there and meeting with the All Congo Convention of Protestant Missionaries, he will probably visit the new stations of Longa and Monieka. From the Congo he will return to America.

A complete visit to our mission fields has never been made by a representative of the Foreign Society. President McLean visited, Japan, China and India in 1895 and nine years ago Secretary Rains made a brief visit to Japan and China. Africa and the Philippines will be visited for the first time and India for the first time in fifteen years.

A visit to the fields is greatly needed at the present time. The work has grown to such proportions, the needs of the various fields are so diversified, and the call for reinforcements and prosecution of plans for the future so urgent, that such a tour is imperative. Again and again have the missionaries urged it.

There are many things in the growth of a great Foreign Missionary work that demand better understanding on the part of the Executive Committee than can be secured through correspondence with the missionaries. The proper distribution of funds; the comparative need and importance of various fields; the opening of new stations; the planting of schools, colleges and hospitals. Because of these problems and needs visitation is not only necessary, but a matter of economy and good business policy. Mr. Rain's visit to Japan in 1901, resulted directly in the building of the two colleges in Tokyo.

The friends of the work will be enabled to keep in touch with the itinerary of Secretary Rains through his letters to the various papers and the Missionary Intelligencer.

THE BETHANY GRADED SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

INTERNATIONAL COURSE

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR

Purpose—The purpose of the Graded Lessons is: To meet the spiritual needs of the pupil in each stage of his development. The spiritual needs broadly stated are these:
1. To know God as he has revealed himself to us in nature, in the heart of man, and in Christ..... 2. To exercise toward God, the Father, and his Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, trust, obedience, and worship..... 3. To know and to do our duty to others..... 4. The Curriculum Outlined Above Furnishes a Comprehensive Course of Religious Instruction

Comprising as it does not only the biographies, history, literature, and teachings of the Bible, but also lessons on the history and heroes of the Christian Church, of missionary enterprises, philanthropic movements, and moral reforms.

In order that the truths taught may be assimilated and the spirit and qualities of Christian character developed, various forms of self-expression are suggested, beginning with simple hand-work done by the little child, and culminating in important lines of Christian service possible to young men and women.

The series of lessons for each year begins in October, and the work that is essential to the completion of the aim and the integrity of the course as a whole, is found in the nine months corresponding to the public school year—October to June. The lessons for the remaining three months of each year are valuable in themselves, and either supplement the work of the preceding months, or prepare for that of the following year.

The courses for each grade or year are permanent and will be available for use in the same grade with successive classes each year.

The Lessons for the Summer Quarter beginning July 3, will prepare the school for the greatly enriched course beginning October 1. Send today for order blanks and samples.

—Gov. James N. Gillett, who has directed the attorney general of California to take steps to prevent the proposed Jeffries-Johnson prize fight, began life on the Pacific slope as a day laborer at Seattle, although he had been admitted to the bar in Wisconsin, his native state. He has served two terms in congress. A republican, he sided with President Roosevelt in the controversy over admitting the Japanese to the public schools. He has made his campaigns largely on the claim that he was once a laboring man and is a champion of labor, though his opponents have accused him of having acted against the interests of organized labor.

The Coming of the Lord

Have We Understood the Teachings of Jesus and the Early Church?

From time to time attention is attracted to the subject of the second coming of Christ by the utterances of some preacher or teacher. There are individuals who make much of this theme in their public statements. There are groups of Christian people who regard themselves as set for the vindication of the doctrine.

Now and then there arises some school of thought that links this thesis with other elements in the gospel, and puts emphasis upon the near return of the Lord. This is not a new or strange phenomenon in the history of the church. It has occurred in every century. Scarcely a generation has gone by that has not witnessed the proclamation of the second coming of Christ as near at hand.

The teachings of the New Testament on this subject are not easily understood. Every different school of thought has been able to get together a set of texts which it regarded as completely satisfactory. If one goes at the matter in a convinced and painstaking way, it is easy to prove that the particular period in which one is living is the very time in which Christ is to return to earth.

On the other hand it is just as easy to prove from the New Testament that the teachings which bear on this question had to do with the first century of Christian history, and have no bearing on the times in which we live, save as general warnings to be in readiness for whatever emergency might occur.

In precisely the same way it is possible to show that all of our Lord's teachings on the theme are referable solely to some distant period, known as the end of the world, the time of final judgment, the consummation of the ages. Which of these three views is correct? Is any of them exclusively correct? What constitutes a reasonable theory in reference to this much discussed New Testament doctrine?

Because the subject is one which certainly has a place in any satisfactory body of New Testament beliefs, and because it is so capable of misuse, it seems worth while to give it some attention. The pathetic examples of people who have wrested the doctrine of the second coming of Christ to its own destruction and largely to their own, warns us that the most sacred things can be turned to trivial or fatal uses.

A fully satisfactory statement would require consideration of the question whether the Gospel records as we have them contain the actual teachings of Jesus on this theme. We are at once face to face with the contention of two distinct bodies of scholarly opinions in this field. One contends that the apocalyptic elements in the discourse of Jesus, recorded in Matt. 24 and the parallel passages, are wholly later and local elements, with which Jesus had nothing to do. It is the contention of this school that our Lord's discourse on the Final Things dealt with the issues of character and not with eschatalogical expectations. This view would exclude from our Savior's statement all these references to imminent or ultimate revolutionary changes, wars, tumults, sufferings and martyrdoms.

On the other hand, a different school of thought, perhaps even more urgent in its claims, insists that Jesus accepted all the current Messianism of his time, and fully expected that the kingdom of God would be set up in connection with startling disclosures of divine power, to which there are such frequent references in the Great Discourses. The literature of this subject is abundant for those who wish greater familiarity with the arguments of the two schools.

For the present purpose we have no reason to decide between the two views. There are elements of strength and weakness in each. It seems not unreasonable to suppose that Jesus' discourse took practically the form in which it has come to us. This does not exclude the probability that some changes have been made in the text. It would be strange if a discourse on a theme so significant for Jewish hearers of that age should not take over to itself some of the current ideas of which the air was full.

The lines of our Savior's teaching on this theme seem fairly consistent and recoverable. He taught his disciples that it was necessary for him to leave them. He saw that as long as he remained they would watch for him and wait for his initiative. He told them therefore that he would go away, but would send them the Spirit, the Comforter. He also told them that he would come again. This promise of his return was made so frequently and clearly that it became the fixed conviction of the early church.

Almost every New Testament document reveals this belief. Paul's message to the Thessalonians shows that he expected to survive until the Lord's return. Peter refers to the taunt that the enemies of the church uttered, who made capital of the fact that the sincere and oft-repeated beliefs of the Christian community that the Lord was about to appear had never been fulfilled. Where then, said these skeptics, was the promise of his coming?

From the standpoint of the early church the promise of Jesus seemed perfectly explicit, but its fulfillment was unaccountably delayed. The angels proclaimed at the time of his ascension that he would return as certainly (not "in like manner") as they had seen him go.

When the Master spoke of the impending changes that should attend his coming, he said clearly that the generation then living should not pass away until all his predictions then made in reference of the future should be fulfilled. No attempt to torture these words out of their legitimate and simple meaning has ever proved successful. It is clar that whatever Jesus said on that occasion referred to the immediate future and not to the ages ahead.

When Jesus stood before the high priest and was asked by him the truth of his claim to be the Son of God, he responded that he was, and that from that day forth they should behold him seated at the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven. If language has any significance, these words refer to the immediate establishment of the kingdom of God in the world, and Christ's continuous and increasing rule. The language is apocalyptic or figurative, as was much of the language in that closing age of Judaism, but the meaning is not to be missed.

It is clear then that Jesus taught to his disciples his return in the near future. This return it is equally clear he conceived as a spiritual coming, in the power of the kingdom, in the work of the Holy Spirit, the diffusion of his purposes throughout the world, and in the trans-transformation of human institutions into likeness with the divine ideal.

That Jesus did not imply a physical and visible coming is shown by the fact that no such event took place. The fact that he did not mean a physical and visible appearance at some future period in the history of the church is clear from his insistence upon the nearness of the event and the accompanying signs, which were manifestly the downfall of Jerusalem and the persecution of the disciples in Palestine, Rome and elsewhere.

But the early church expected a different sort of return. They looked for the coming of Jesus in a physical, visible form. They looked for the re-establishment of those relations with themselves which Jesus felt to be wholly needless limitations upon the work of the kingdom. They were disappointed that he did not come as they expected him, and their disappointment is written on the pages of the New Testament too clearly for any misreading.

Yet Jesus came just as he said he would do, not in the visible form of loving expectation, but in the invisible strength of his kingdom, as he had persistently taught. The Jewish people looked for a different Messiah from the one who came. The early Christians expected a different return from the one that occurred. The church in various ages has gone on predicting the realization of these same external hopes.

At times definite dates have been set and the pathway of the church is strewn with the wrecks of such chronologies. The books of Daniel and the Revelation have been searched for fantastic proofs of dozens of conflicting theories regarding the time and manner of the Lord's return.

Meantime he is here, for all of those who with humble mind and eyes made clear by faith and love are able to discern the Lord who has ever kept us with his blessed promise, "Lo, I am with you alway."

It is probable that Christian people will go on setting dates for the coming of Christ for centuries and milleniums yet to come. Those who unsatisfied with the real coming of Christ in the hearts of his people will look still for some external and mechanical coming, even as the Jewish people looked for a Messiah born in the purple and wielding the sword of empire.

If in some future time the interests of the kingdom of God demand a visible manifestitation of Jesus, no one need deny that such an experience may come. But the duty of the church is not the heavenward look to discover the descending Christ, but the clarified vision which discerns his presence in the world today, working out through his church to the gracious ministries of the Gospel.

There is the higher duty of discovering the Christ who is here, of coming into such relations of friendship and obedience to him that we know him beyond all mistaking, and the glorious privilege of interpreting him to a world not even conscious of his presence, much less eager for any visible manifestation.

The work of the local Federal Council of Churches continues to grow in importance. Some months ago Professor B. L. Hobson, of McCormick Theological Seminary, who has been active in the movement from the first, was elected executive secretary pro tem, it being the intention to secure a permanent secretary with the opening of the autumn. Offices have now been secured in the down-town district, and the work is being organized with a view to aggressive action in the fall. In the meantime a secretary has been chosen for the central district of the Federal Council, embracing Illinois and several adjacent states. His office will also be in Chicago, and the two secretaries, the one for the district and the other for the city, will be able to co-operate efficiently.

No man has rendered more effective service in the cause of public safety and moral uplift than Clifford G. Roe of Chicago. As a rising young attorney he attracted such notice by his ability as to be appointed Assistant States Attorney. In this position his attention was attracted by the numerous indications of a widespread and unscrupulous traffic in women for immoral purposes. With unceasing vigilance he followed the clews that were obtainable, and was soon the means not only of making public the deadly nature of this traffic in white slaves, but of bringing many of the offenders to punishment. So concerned has he become regarding the situation that he has undertaken a propaganda of publicity, visiting many parts of the country, and addressing many groups of interested and influential people in behalf of the cusade. His time was so fully absorbed in this work that he resigned his official position to give himself completely to the hunting down of the men and women who are the leaders in the vile business. To the other weapons which Mr. Roe has put into the hands of the public with which to fight the white slave traffic, he has just added a book of peculiar and pathetic interest, "Panderers and their White Slaves" (Revell, $1 net). The book is not pleasant reading, but it is full of the facts which every teacher, parent and young woman should know about the dangers that beset the way of even the purest and most high-minded youth. The fact that Mr. Roe is a Disciple, an efficient worker in the Hyde Park Church, makes his public service all the more interesting to readers of the Christian Century.

During the past few days Judge Charles Sumner Lobingier of Manila has been visiting in Chicago. He is one of the occupants of the federal bench in the Philippine Islands. He is judge of the Court of First Instance, as it is known in the islands, a member of the commission to revise and edit the Philippine codes, a member of the National Conference of Commissions on Uniform Laws, a member of the bar of the Unites States Supreme Court, formerly member of the Nebraska Supreme Court and Professor of Law in the University of Nebraska. Judge Lobingier has recently completed a work on "The People's Law, or Popular Participation in Law Making" (Macmillan). As a member of the Christian Church, and a near relative of the lamented Henry Schell Lobingier, he is greatly interested in the work of the Disciples, especially in the forward movement in education among our ministers, and in the serious attempt many of our people are making to realize the ideals to which our history has committed us. He speaks in high terms of the work accomplished by Professor MacClintock in the Philippines two years ago, when he went out as commissioner representing the government in the interest of education. The Judge is on a five months' furlough and will leave for Europe in a few days.

Patriotism Against Liquors

Virtue and happiness are the primary objects of patriotic solicitude. These depend largely upon physical and social inheritance and individual choice. Whatever deprives a child of the right to be well born and to be taught how to care for itself and how to live in right relations to others is an evil that patriotic citizens will endeavor to destroy.

At the Twelfth Congress against Alcoholism, which met in London in the summer of 1909, Dr. Taav. Laitinen, professor of hygiene at the University of Helsingfors, reported studies in human families "which confirmed his long and careful observations upon animals, and which showed that the birth weight and subsequent eight months' development of children of drinkers averaged less in a group of over 20,000 families than in the case of children of non-drinkers." Dr. Karl Graeter, a nerve specialist of Basle, Switzerland, "gave statistics showing that from nine per cent up of the children of moderate drinkers investigated were mentally defective or tuberculous, and from seventeen per cent up of the children of heavy drinkers, as against five per cent of the children of abstainers."

Drink is a cause of poverty. A good authority states that "the working people of England swallow in drink every year the value of every inch of land in the whole island." In these days of high prices the average man's income is exhausted by the time he buys what is demanded for the health and comfort of himself and his family. Any money spent for drink lowers his efficiency and injures the state. Dr. C. W. Saleeby says that no less than 12,500 widows are drink made in Great Britain every year, or, taking an average of 3.6 children to a family, a total of 45,445 widows and children are deprived of the one who should support the family. At the National Conference of Charities and Correction in St. Louis, May 19-26, 1910, there was more consideration given to the causes of widowhood than to the best way to help widows. Along with industrial accidents and occupational diseases drink will have to be reckoned a destroyer of the bread winner.

Patriotism studies not only the records of the courts in order to find out what crimes are committed and what punishments are decreed for criminals; it also studies the causes of crime. Why do men steal and murder? The lord chief justice of England, Lord Alverstone, declares that drink is a factor in ninety per cent of the crime of England. He has had an experience of forty years at the bar and ten as a judge. In Scotland, in 1907, there were 90,000 cases of public disorder due to drink. Why alcohol produces crime is explained by Dr. Legrain of Paris: "Alcohol produces an intoxication which is only a brief attack of lunacy. There is no other term which describes the almost instantaneous disorders which follow the taking of alcohol, disorders which impair the judgment, the reason and exactitude of sensation and which destroy the will only to install brute impulse in its place."

It is inevitable that drink should be a source of political corruption. A business that cannot make a successful appeal to the conscience will resort to the use of money to influence legislation. The conscience of the United States is deserting the liquor traffic. Some of our citizens still believe in the divine right to get drunk and make fools of themselves, but the number of such is diminishing rapidly. The appeal of the liquor advocate must be based upon the assumption that appetites and dollars control our actions. Men who accept this assumption do not have very strong reasons for declining the offered bribe.

The way to deal with the drink problem is to educate ourselves as to the perils involved in the use of intoxicating liquors and in the liquor traffic. In former days men thought the drunk man was inspired of the gods. Remnants of this superstition are found among civilized peoples. It is hard for the human race to look a fact squarely in the face when that fact is in opposition to long established custom. We denounce the man who gives us truth which we have been ignoring in our conduct. But we can be taught. Even the notion that whiskey warms a man in winter and cools him in summer will at last give place to a theory based upon the facts. We may even dare to hope that a majority of the citizens will cease to believe that a town is more prosperous when its working men spend their money for liquors than it is when they spend it for food and clothing.

Midweek Service, July 6. Heb. 2:12-17.

Social Survey

The Annual Fourth of July Killing.

It may surprise many a citizen to know that a very rational and earnest movement against the use of fireworks on Independence Day is now in its seventh year; nor is it universally realized among us how many of our children have, by reason of these yearly celebrations, suffered the most cruel death known to medical science. Were any such emotion possible in the English breast, that of satisfaction for the loss and humiliation endured by England in the war for Independence,—at least so far as human life is concerned,—could hardly be more thoroughly justified; for, taking no account whatever of our national losses of many decades past, but only of those incurred in the last three yearly celebrations and in the metropolis alone, we find that 1,339 have been killed and injured,—more than the casualties in the Revolutionary battles of Lexington, Bunker Hill, Fort Moultrie, White Plains, Fort Washington, Monmouth, and Cowpens combined. Nor have these losses been among fighting men, but rather among little children; and of the latter wounded on Independence Day, many that have not died have nevertheless been dreadfully maimed and disfigured for life.—American Review of Reviews.

Sanitary Dwellings in Austria.

The Austrian Parliament has voted $1,200,000 yearly for ten years to create a fund for aiding local authorities and building associations to erect cheap and sanitary dwellings for wage earners. This is regarded as the first step toward reducing the intolerably high cost of living for the poorer people, who are compelled to pay exorbitant rents for miserably inadequate accommodations. It is shown by the latest returns that half the dwellings in Vienna consist of one room, sometimes with a kitchen, but usually without, and that 43 per cent of the population live in one-room homes. Single-room apartments, in some cases, are occupied by six or more persons, and the effect of this scandalous overcrowding is shown in the mortality returns. From these it appears that 296 deaths in 10,000 population are recorded in the workingmen's quarter, as against 120 in other districts.

Cost of Ballinger-Pinchot Trial.

Less than $15,000 has been spent by the Ballinger-Pinchot committee in investigating the interior department and the forestry service. The cost of printing the record of the case does not come out of the $25,000 appropriated to defray the expenses of conducting the inquiry, however. The bulk of the money expended went toward the employment of stenographers and the payment of the per diem and mileage of witnesses. All witnesses have been paid and discharged, and the expense of finishing up the work of the committee will be nominal. Carl Rasch, who assisted John J. Vertrees in conducting the "defense," as the Ballinger side has been known, has taken up his duties as federal judge in Montana. He was recently appointed to this position by President Taft.

Help to Build Cathedrals.

By the will of the late John A. Kasson, the veteran diplomat who died a few days ago, the Protestant Episcopal Cathedral Foundation of the District of Columbia will receive the bulk of his estate, or between $500,000 and $600,000. The principal is to be invested and the interest devoted to educational and other work for which the foundation is designed. It will become available immediately, and help to carry on religious teaching without awaiting the building of the cathedral itself. The cathedral when completed will represent a total money outlay of between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000. There has thus far been raised for the purchase of the ground and the beginning of the work on the building about $1,100,000.

Department of Public Works.

One of the most important governmental projects the President will be asked to consider during his summer vacation will be the creation of a new executive branch of the government to be known as the Department of Public Works. The proposed plan contemplates the abolition of the Interior Department. Support for the proposition is found among the President's political advisers and the leading business men of the country. The main feature of the new department, as they have already been explained to Mr. Taft, are, in brief, as follows: It shall have charge of the Panama Canal and all the work incidental to that project, its upkeep and support. It shall look after the irrigation projects throughout the country. It shall take over all the conservation and forestry work now being done by different departments of the government. It shall have the control of such minor work as is contemplated in the proposed bureau of public health and such activities as are now found in the various movements for the protection of water supplies and water power sites. It shall have under it, as subordinate bureau, a branch to look after the small area of public lands which now remain in possession of the government.

Retirement Pensions.

An aggressive campaign, conducted with the support and approval of President Taft and his cabinet, is to be directed to secure a civil service retirement pension for the benefit of aged and decrepit government clerks. Secretary MacVeagh has led all the cabinet officers of the administration in urging such a system, but Congress has shown no disposition to pass such a law. The President has consented to permit all government clerks to join in a memorial to Congress, and it is expected that at least 25,000 signatures will quickly be obtained. The general plan which meets with the support of the administration contemplates contributions from the clerks to be added to any appropriation from Congress to be available to pension clerks who have complied with the qualifications for retirement. Inasmuch as the United States is practically the only civilized nation which makes no provision for the retirement of its superannuated civil employes, it is hoped that Congress may be persuaded to enact a retirement law.

Uniform Currency.

Although it may be years before the edict of the Chinese government establishing a national decimal coinage is put into effect, the action of the central authorities in formally decreeing the adoption of a uniform currency system is looked upon by bankers in New York and by commercial houses doing business with China, as a long stride forward in the march of the celestial empire towards civilization, as typified by modern Western commercial standards. The new statutory standard of seven mace two candereens to the dollar will give a uniform value to all Chinese dollars. For centuries confusion has existed throughout China in regard to both international and external commerce, owing to the many distinct standards of value in the various provinces.

Patisodes Park Bill.

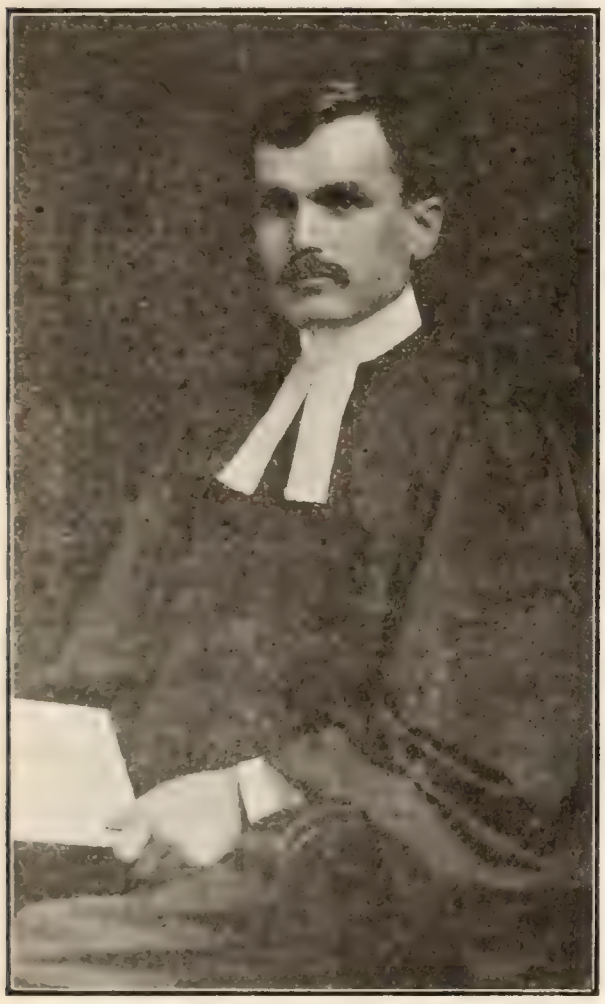
Governor Hughes of New York has signed the Palisades Park bill, and this assures a magnificent reservation of picturesque country for the people. The palisades form a basaltic bluff from 300 to 500 feet high along the west bank of the Hudson, beginning near the northern limit of New York City and extending north about eighteen miles, in Hudson and Bergen counties, New Jersey, and Rockland county, New York. The palisades were being destroyed by quarrymen when the two states took the matter up a few years ago. It was proposed to buy up not only the quarry holdings, but also the title to a strip of land fourteen miles wide all the way. This required several million dollars, and the money has been raised. Both states made liberal appropriations, and the amount still lacking was made up by wealthy people like Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Morgan, Mrs. Harriman, Mrs. Sage, Mr. Perkins and others. The largest contribution was from Mrs. Harriman—$1,000,000 and 10,000 acres of land in Rockland county. A park eighteen miles long and fourteen miles wide, 252 square miles, covering 161,280 acres—that is what it means if the plans are carried out.

Women in English Factories.

There are said to be 867,000 women and girls in textile industries in England, most of them in cotton mills. A writer who visited these factories recently reports that a sight of the women and girls is a depressing spectacle. Most of the women are languid and anaemic. Many of the girls are mere children. Nearly 40 per cent of the women are married. All look cheerless and sad, and as if in need of good food and fresh air. Yet England has good factory laws. The trouble is they are not well enforced. The work is not excessively hard, and the conditions are not particularly unhealthy. If care were taken to secure proper ventilation, if the floors were kept clean, and if some method of collecting and removing the dust were adopted, all of which the law contemplates, the conditions would be fairly good. The women are careless about their food, their clothes and their health, of course. That is perfectly natural under the circumstances. They need instruction along these lines. But when would they ever get time to listen to it? They have to work 55 1-2 horus a week, not counting time for meals.

The Possibilities of Texas.

The state of Texas, with an area of 262,398 square miles, has a population of about 3,800,000, including the cities. That is an average of about fifteen persons to the square mile. The state of Illinois, outside of Chicago, not counting the other cities, has an average of about 100 people to the square mile. Germany's population averages about 290 to the square mile. If Texas had a population equal to the average of Illinois outside of Chicago, her total population would be more than 26,000,000. If she were as densely peopled as Germany, she would have a population of 76,000,000. It is not likely that she would support such a dense population, but the estimate that she could take care of 36,000,000 does not seem unreasonable. There is room for a good many more immigrants—of the right sort—in this country.



Tolstoy, the Luther of Russia

An Interpretation of Tolstoy's Relation to Russia

BY DANIEL PROTOFF.

What Martin Luther was to Germany, Tolstoy is to Russia, and much more; for Luther took but one step, that for religious freedom; and Tolstoy has taken that step also and the farther step for economic and social freedom.

Born in 1828, some 130 miles south of Moscow, in the heart of Russia, the proper birthplace for a man destined to become the great spokesman of the Slavic race to the world. He was a sensitive, impressionable child. Even in his boyhood he displayed a morbid attempt at a philosophic understanding of life. In youth he never lost his sense of duty, and had a desire to be a noble man.

After his school days in Moscow he went to the University of Kasan, where he studied science and philosophy; here the old students taught him that there was no God, and he became a vague atheist. After college he lived on his estates for a few years and then enlisted in the army, and was given command of a battery in the time of war at Sebastopol. Tolstoy's experience at the war affected his whole life. There he saw the misery, the cruelty. After the war was over, Tolstoy went to St. Petersburg, to live there as a rich, fashionable and brilliant member of the polite world. There he acquired distinction by the publication of his "Sebastopol Sketches."

Travel and Study.

He spent about two years in travel, and seems to have mastered English, French and German.

In 1862 he married the daughter of an army surgeon. Their family life was always most happy.

He and his wife lived in the country on his estates, where he devoted himself to improving the conditions of the peasantry.

Religious Experience and Teaching.

While yet a boy, when reading the Four Gospels, the doctrine which teaches love, humility, meekness, self-denial, and returning good for evil, was the doctrine which touched him most. Now, as a man, he begins to inquire, "Why have I never been happy?

He runs over his life in his mind, and suddenly the light bursts upon him. "Happiness," he cries, "happiness consists in living for others, that is clear." In his book, "My Confession" he tells us how he tried to grasp the meaning of his life. "We have reason and conscience ('the light which lighteth every man') to guide us forward. We did not originate these. Their source lies outside ourselves."

On Life—to transfer our interest from the lower to the higher nature is to be born again, to lay hold of eternal life, this is the root of religion. "Only when I believe in God, I can live; when I do not believe, I feel as if I must die. God is life." "Only when I yield myself," said he, "to that intuition of love which demands obedience to His law, is my own heart happy and at rest."

"Live to seek God and life will not be without him. After my conversion, life rose up within me and around me, and the light that then shone forth never left me afterwards."

What is Life?—"A part of an infinite whole." Here was the answer to his problem; and faith which defines our relation to the whole world is the deepest source of human wisdom.

He studied the lives of the peasantry, and found that they had a true faith, a solid foundation for their lives.

Tolstoy and the Church.

"The church was founded upon the Gospels and any truth which the church possesses must be contained in the Gospels." He has always been outspoken upon society, upon the state, upon the church. "However strange the statement may appear, every church, as a church, has always been and always must be, an institution not only foreign, but absolutely hostile to the doctrine of Christ. "For the Church of Christ is known by its meekness, repentance, submission, activity and life."

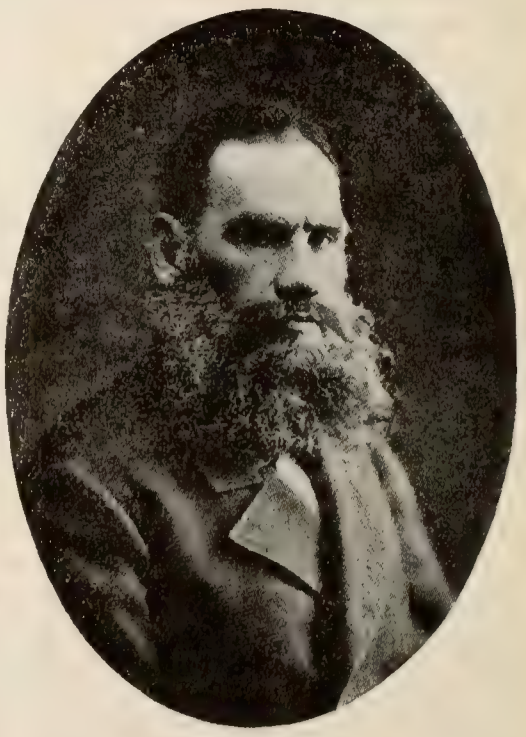
Before he was fifty, Tolstoy had dedicated his life to his religious ideals. He had then fully acquired his faith, and he girded himself to lead his people across the deserts of disbelief into the land of promise.

Every man must ask himself, "What does God command me to do?"

His writings, after conversion, always speak with a voice of the preacher. "My Confession." "The Four Gospels," "My Religion," "What Must We Do Then?" "The Kingdom of God Within You," "What is Art?" and "Resurrection" followed during the next twenty years.

After his conversion, he looked into the tomb in which the truth, freedom and liberty were buried for 900 years. Over the tomb a heavy stone was rolled, and a strong army with its laws was whacking over it day and night, saying, "There is no resurrection for thee." But Tolstoy quotes the words of Napoleon, "I establish my kingdom by force but Christ establishes His by love; and yet there are millions who are ready to die for Him."

After his conversion he said, "My reputation has fallen, and I have been much grieved inwardly; but now I am at peace, now I have something to say, and it is necessary to work conscientiously." He stood on the highway and talked to the pilgrims as a brother, saying, "Self-abnegation does not consist in saying, 'Take from me what you like,' but in laboring and thinking in concert with others, so as to give oneself to them."



If you live in love, then do not live in love for a certain person, but for all human beings. If the church is wrong, it does not mean that I have to be wrong, but I must find the truth for myself—which I did find in the New Testament. If the church is practicing Old Testament teachings which are condemned by the code of the New Testament, it does not mean that I should practice the same thing. "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," or Samuel's words to Saul were, "Spare no Amelekite; slay men, women and children." This same spirit came into the Christian church, which has shed blood nearly every century since Christianity began.

Christ comes with the message, "Love your enemies." Paul's message, "If thine enemy hunger, feed him." Like a Messiah he drew to himself a large number of thinking Jews and many of them became Chrisitans; but many of his followers were considered ripe for the lunatic asylum, others were declared insane, while others were sent to prison and into exile.

He had been always a reformer, and ever before the ukase of emancipation, he had been the first nobleman to liberate his serfs.

War and Peace.

At once Tolstoy starts to work, preparing himself five years for the first work, "War and Peace." He said, "It is a hard preparation, the deep plowing of the soil upon which I am driven to cast my seed." Then he said, "I have to consider and reconsider what will happen to those human beings of my story." And from 1865 to 1869 the work was completed and the greatest novel of the nineteenth century was published, "War and Peace." (His wife copied this novel no less than seven times, again and again). Tolstoy always likes to get a step nearer perfection.

Now Tolstoy is followed by other reapers, and will still be followed in those fields ripe for the harvest. There are many wealthy merchants of Moscow and St. Petersburg who are nerolled among his disciples.

To all the Earth.

Tolstoy's conversion was carried into all corners of the earth. Russia has been waiting for a man who would not only interpret the Gospel rationally, but live it radically. Pilgrims kept coming to him by thousands, to hear the story of his conversion. Prince Chilykoff was converted and sacrificed his millions for the poor; so was Vladimir Tstertkoff. Both of them are living in exile.

The Stundists were progressive, for the work of Tolstoy has served as a link between the rogressive elements of the common people and of the reformers and radicals of the "Intelliguenzia." The 2,000,000 Stundists are the strongest social organization working for the salvation of their country. Brotherhoods are also being founded all over Russia. Tolstoy's literature is published in foreign countries only. For that reason a great desire was created amongst the people in Russia who could read. Many a time it was carried to Russia inside of a loaf of bread. Those who read it used to say, "After I read it, I kiss it and press it on my heart to treasure it there."

From the lowest to the highest degree, people have been reading his writings; sometimes people have paid $5 for a book which costs only fifty cents. Those who could not get his books in Russia, went to Europe to spend a few months in order to read his books.

Most of the people who have read his books have no use for the Russian Orthodox Church. Even Protestant missionaries in Bulgaria were not able to make any progress until Tolstoy's books were translated into the Bulgarian language.

The Russian-Japanese War had a great effect on the people; it drove them out of that great superstition. Every man who went to war was provided with one of those so-called "Tkona," a wooden or paper image for protection; but the soldiers lost confidence in these images, for they saw how the Japanese took thousands of images and made a fire of them by which to warm their hands. After the war religious freedom prevailed, but every one was supposed to believe in one God. At the same time many new sects sprung up and many people were led astray.

The Russian people, of whom there are millions upon millions who read no books and no newspapers, write and receive no letters, must be helpless victims of superstition. Yet it is natural to the Russian peasant to take the scripture literally. "If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out." (Mark 5:29). John Plotnikoff of Karkov in May, 1902, was admitted to the hospital, having chopped off his hand with an ax, after failing to gouge out his eye.

Peasants get wildly drunk at Easter for the joy of thinking that Christ is risen; at other times for no reason at all. The message of the Lord comes to us saying, "I have set before thee an open door." Though the Lutheran Church is working in Russia, yet there is only one pastor to seventeen churches, and it takes him four months to see each church once. Baptists have about 30,000 converts, and Methodists have nine churches, but only three pastors. There are also 5,000 men and women converted under Baptists' and Methodists' preaching, but the people refuse to join them because they do not find their names in the New Testament. It is an astonishing fact that according to statistics, more than 50,000 Russians left the Russian Orthodox Church and became Mohammedans between April 1, 1902 and January 1, 1909. This should stir the heart of every Christian who loves the cause of truth and liberty and we should lose no more time in consecrating men and money to carry the saving power of the Gospel especially to Siberia, where thousands of the disciples of Tolstoy are waiting for some one to come and help them there.

Those people have been wrapped in midnight gloom, covered with the dark mantle of superstition, or blasted beneath the withering influence of a form of godliness without power.

Our Church Men

Does the Church Care?—A Protest and a Program

BY JOHN RAY EWERS.

"I don't give a d——if it is," said a certain New York tenement house owner when told that typhoid fever was raging in his buildings. It so happened, by the irony of fate, that his own beautiful daughter died from typhoid which was traced unmistakably to her father's tenements. This was fifteen years ago. Meanwhile social consciousness has been growing. Hardly any man would say a thing like that today, although the indifference is appalling. We are coming to see, however, that we are all tied up together and that our own safety depends upon the integrity of all.

But what about the church? Does she care? Now I am not a knocker. I am not going to join the cynics who are playing their merry chorus upon the anvils. The cynic is a sinner. Any man who has made a failure of his own life can grasp a hammer and play his little tune. The test of genius is constructive work. A gorilla can devastate an art gallery. A goat can block the road. A wrecking crew can tear down a building, but it takes an architect to build it. On the other hand we need not be blind to existing conditions. Two classes of people are equally reprehensible: the snarling cynic and the lazy optimist. The first says the church is an obsolete institution and is fast passing away, the second says the church is perfect and that God will care for his own.

Preaching That Goes Up but Not Out.

The sane man is he who, while believing that the church is a divine institution, sees plainly that men must adjust the membership to conditions. The church at present is not a bride without spot or blemish. There are spots, both black and red, on the white garments, and the lines of selfishness wrinkle the fair face.

Look at the average church. What does it do for the community at large? In the pulpit, perhaps, is a man who never studied sociology half as much as he did theology. His religion goes straight up—it does not go out toward men. Minister and laymen are trying to build up a great plant. They glory in numbers, trying to beat out some other neighboring church. The desire is not so much really to save men as to make a great appearance. The big missionary offering is boasted of. The thought and prayer is not so much for the poor heathen as for the aggrandizement of the local church.

Ministers boast of their aristocratic members, of their big salaries, of their great buildings, of their large Sunday-schools, as a suddenly enriched millionaire might boast of his possessions. Is that the true idea—to build up a great, selfish, contented, sleek, fat and useless organization? Is the local church a thing in itself? A thing to be built up even by destroying a smaller neighbor, as a greedy corporation absorbs a weaker competitor? Or rather is not the kingdom of God advanced when all Christians feel themselves a part of a common, conquering army, all fighting evil, and all working together.

J. R. Ewers, East End Church, Pittsburg. Editor of "Our Church Men."

The point is this: too many churches are trying to build themselves up with never a thought for the other church, much less for foreigners, civic righteousness, or social betterment.

How many ministers, in Pittsburg, are working as hard in broad social causes as they are to build up their own plants? They may say that their particular church is all the field that they can cultivate—then they should make way for larger men with broader vision and more capacity. A man who is only big enough for his own parish is too small even for that. His duty is to resign and get out of the way. Thank God, there are some shining lights among our ministers who are doing great things in social ways.

Some Valiant Men are in the Fight.

This much must be said, that the church is doing about all that is being done for social betterment, and that is not much. The men, ministers and laymen, who have fought the battles for righteousness in Pittsburg, have been for the most part rugged churchmen. They got their inspiration from religion. Let us say this with emphasis. The church has done practically all that has been done. How pitiful that is, however, in comparison with what might have been accomplished which should have been worked out!

The average church is a self-centered proposition where the preacher is trying to build up his own reputation, and incidentally his salary, and where the laymen glory in their pomp and circumstance. Meanwhile the city goes to the devil.

What we must have is a fine brotherliness which boasteth not against the neighbor, and a warm social consciousness which actively works for the uplift of all.

According to pure religion, life is the supreme thing. Not only is a man of more value than a sheep, he is of more value than an institution. In one hand, the religionist held the Sabbath and in the other a man. The man in those divine scales out-weighed the institution and, it was said, "The Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath." That was a wonderful pronouncement. Our business is to actually save life.

How can we do it when wages are below a living standard? How can we do it when the rotten housing conditions prevail? How can we do it when saloons and houses of ill-repute are wide open? How can we do it when mills, mines and railroads grind up human flesh into dividends and squeeze out the blood into the cup of aristocracy? How can we do it when a man has not leisure to see his family? How can we do it when little children have no place to play?

What would the lash-of-the-temple do in Pittsburgh? I do not advocate reform of the hatchet variety, neither do I endorse, on the other hand, the fat, flabby and feeble optimism that gorges itself while the beggar lies sick at the very gate. God will smash to powder that institution which selfishly builds itself up while neglecting the poor people who are largely the products and victims of damnable civic conditions.

With fiery eloquence, our ministers should rise as one man and plead for social betterment. As a great host the mighty laymen of this noble city should assert themselves. Why leave a few discouraged, heart-broken men, the over-heavy burden? This is the crucial hour. Can you not see it? Some valiant men are rushing into the thick of the fight. Will you loll in the lap of luxury while they are slain and your cause defeated? Will you continue to build your palace while the conflagration rages in the city, threatening even your work?

Making Big Business Fit for Men.

I tell you the churches are handicapped unless they assert their power. The forces of evil are this moment sending men, women and children to hell faster than we are saving them. Are we selfish fools? How much longer will we wrangle over petty doctrines that divide us? How much longer will we knife each other in our pitiful pride?

But some timid soul will say, "What can the churches do?" It is not a question of "can we," rather it is "will we." We have never sufficiently estimated the unlimited power of the church of the Living God. There is dynamite enough in our churches to blow the earth to atoms. We are sitting around like a lot of rag dolls when we should be up and doing the tasks of giants and be pounding away at the rocking ramparts of sin with the hammers of Thor. We can do it if we will.

This seems to be the day of the laymen. The day of benches, babies and bonnets" is passing in our churches, and the men are asserting themselves. Witness the colossal and magnificent achievement of the laymen's missionary movement. That is helping the world at large. The very bigness of the enterprise challenged men of power. You can't entertain a Jim Jeffries with a pink tea and a lace handkerchief sale. We must give the big men big tasks. The man who handles many men and thousands of dollars every week doesn't want to be in the peanut business on Sunday. The timid tasks and spineless efforts of many churches make a man with red blood in his veins laugh with scorn. We need the temper of the brave Jesus. We need the fire of the early disciples and the nerve of the martyrs. We are degenerates in these featherbed days of lazy peace.

What Can the Church Do?

Well, here are a few definite things which the church can and ought to do:

A brainy and courageous committee of laymen should name good men for office. That is first,—and don't tell me that it is not a man's job. Some of you fellows who have been waiting for a task worthy of your mettle, come on! Stop talking and scorning and show us.

Then, in the very next place, we must federate all our church men to support these men We have the balance of power if we will use it. The average politician laughs to scorn your church constituency because he knows it is not dependable and that if it votes one way once it will forget all about it by the next election. We are a poor lot politically.

Then we should have first-hand information about conditions.

Ignorance, base and crass, is at the bottom of inaction.

Get Facts.

It does very little good to read about these things in the "Survey." Men must see for themselves. Let a representative group of good men go and study at first hand the vice situation. If we are living in the best city of the land, as some would have us believe, let us know it so that we may all rejoice together. But if conditions are "rottten in Denmark" then let us face the facts courageously.

Let us have the truth about the saloons and gambling. Let the federated men of the churches know precisely how things are here in Pittsburg. Let another group visit the mills and mines; let them investigate the railraods and stores and report conditions in the laboring world. Let us know about accidents and the conditions of families after the breadwinner has been killed or maimed for life. Let another group study first-hand the tenements and housing conditions. Let them consider the sanitation. Let them report back their findings. What is the chance for the Sunday-school where eight people live in the same room? That's practical.

Let another committee go to Chicago and study their recreation parks and then come back and look over Pittsburg. Have another committee of broad-minded men study the administration of charity in our city and see how much over-lapping there is. Can a fake get help from more than one agency? Then there is the whole big problem of city government. What do you know about the Commission plan? The church that loves folks must show her interest in all of these practical activities.

I know that there are ministers who say that all the Lord called them to do was to "preach the gospel" and that they must not meddle with these "secular" concerns. What possible good comes of your preaching unless your men, your laymen, go out and live out that gospel? Perhaps you are not preaching the gospel at all. Now Jesus loved men. He helped men on the spot. He cleansed the temple. Do not forget that. He was not afraid of losing his job, nor offending some of those who paid his salary. Oh, for an outpouring of His spirit. Oh, for a church of lovers of men.

Need of a Prophet.

An aroused, informed group of churchmen would turn this town upside down. Or, rather, right side up with care. Would that some great prophet might arise who could lead the people of Pittsburg on to victory. I do not believe that a finer body of church people can be found on this earth than here. There is genuine devotion, there is a spirit of sacrifice, there is unusual intelligence, there is dormant, potential courage in our superb churches. We wait for our leader.

On a broad, business-like, united basis we must tackle our problem of city building. We must expect and intend to do great things. It is ours to hit the devil squarely between the eyes and to make straight the highway. The difficulties challenge us. The emperor demands the impossible.

Oh, the church of Almighty God must arise and put her armor on! In this day of battle we must not rest idly in the tent. Some of our sons are suffering at the front. The forces of evil are in array. Certain victory awaits our coming. Arise and smite!

Manhood in the Ministry

BY ALFRED CHAN FAY.

The Rev. Charles Stokes arrived in the town of T——, state of Maine, some time in the month of February, 1880. The good minister was of tall and stately appearance, of very devout temperament and strong parts. He preached several good sermons at the outset, and people were very favorably impressed with him. "Christ and Him Crucified" seemed to be his main theme, and he appeared alike to the cultured and the uneducated of the society. He had a big heart, and his hand was often likened to the "Hand of Providence." The sight of the gentleman, too, was enough to make anyone think of his sins and shortcomings. The Rev. Stokes had also an eye for the business side of his profession, which appealed strongly to the business men of the community.

Hardly before he had unpacked his things and had become at all settled, he looked over the church records, and as many another good minister has found, there were several members of this church who had not paid their dues for some months, or even years. He determined to make calls on these people and ascertain the cause of this and see what could be done toward putting the society on a better financial footing. Looking down the alphabetical list of church members, he came across the name, Robert Bidwell and wife, who had been members of the church some ten or twelve years, but had not attended church, nor contributed to its support for some four or five years. He decided to call on the Bidwell family one afternoon right after dinner, when people are apt to be susceptible to calls for contributions, and ascertain the cause of the infelicity which had evidently clouded the household.

The day fixed for the call had been an unfortunate one for the Bidwell family. It was a bitter cold day, and the night before the water pipes in the house had burst, and all the forenoon the water was dripping from the ceilings all over the furniture and upholstery in a manner to bring out the Christian qualities of the most stalwart. The plumber had been summoned, and had arrived on the scene with one or two apprentices, and the house was being thoroughly upset. I need not remind the reader of the fact that plumbers, though no doubt well-meaning men, seem to act as though they had "carte blanche" to upset and tear to pieces everything in the discharge of their work. On the dressing case in one room could be seen a canteen of gasoline; on a bed lay a large monkey-wrench covered with grease, which of course the plumber had forgotten to wipe off before beginning his work. In the kitchen on the floor stood the charcoal stove, from which dripped momentarily a copious supply of smut and dirt which added nothing to the general appearance of the floor.

About ten o'clock the sheriff arrived on the scene. It seems that a piano had been purchased on the installment plan, and through some miscarriage in the mails the remittances for several months past had not been received by the firm, and the sheriff had been directed to go to the Bidwell house and take the piano. The expressman had already backed up to the side door and four strong men were entering to remove the instrument. This episode of course, added to the family's experience with the plumbers, did not serve to heighten the felicity of the good household, but caused more or less of a strain on "what few fruits of the spirit" yet lodged in their hearts.

But this was not all. The night before the servant girl, a prolific source of infelicity in many households, had eloped with one of the barn hands, both taking with them things which did not belong to them. The more Mrs. Bidwell looked about the house, the more things she missed—underwear, table linen, cutlery, silver, and other things too numerous to mention. Mr. Bidwell's search in the barn too showed that hoes and shovels were missing. A further search brought to light a note which had been left on the piano cover, stating that the two servants had decided, after mature deliberation, to go to Providence to make a few calls.

It had now become about dinner time, and Mr. and Mrs. Bidwell sat down to a table of "plain living and high thinking." The "Good Book," as you remember, states (Prov. 15:17): "Better a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith"; but here was a case where there was a dinner of herbs with no particular love in the atmosphere. For some reason or other, the blessing was not asked at that meal, and Mrs. Bidwell, after a few mouthfuls, concluded to make the most of the situation and see what could be done to set things to rights.

Now there came a knock at the front door, and instead of directing the visitor to step around to the side door, as had been the custom for a number of years, Mrs. Bidwell insisted that this clergical gentleman must be admitted by the front door, which had not been opened for some time. Mr. Bidwell undertook to remonstrate and stated that it would be impossible to open the door which had become firmly stuck in its casing by this time; but Mrs. Bidwell insisted, and Mr. Bidwell knew better than hesitate before the admonition of his good wife.

A hammer was found which the farm hand, through some oversight, had not taken with him the night before, and the door was pounded and the casing strained with no apparent result. Finally Mr. Bidwell placed his left foot strongly against the casing, and taking hold of the knob with both hands, made one Herculean effort and the door came open with a crash, Mr. Bidwell falling back suddenly against the staircase, thereby dislocating his right shoulder. Throwing himself together, in spite of his shoulder, and in spite of his Christian reputation, he said, "And who in h—— are you, sir?" Mrs. Bidwell tapped him on the shoulder and told him that he must control himself; but upon learning that his shoulder had been dislocated, she arranged for his removal to a bed in the next room, where he was made as comfortable as possible until a doctor could be summoned. Rev. Stokes was, of course, invited in, and everything done for his entertainment. A mug of cider was brought up from the callar and the remnants of a dish of popcorn was placed before him, while the conversation followed lines of both home and foreign missions, the higher criticisms, etc. After a while Mrs. Bidwell with one of the children took the clergyman out to the barn and showed him the stock—a cow or two, a goat, and the pigs in the cellar, calling attention incidentally to the absence of various implements which had been removed the night before. Time wore on until supper came, and the good minister, Mrs. Bidwell, and the children sat down to tea. Here was a meal where love prevailed. The blessing was asked in which the good Lord was petitioned to reflect his benevolent and long-suffering countenance upon the unfortunate household.

Hereupon the Rev. Stokes took his hat to leave, not having courage to say anything about the arrears in the church contributions, or the failure of the good man and his wife to attend church services.

Just as he was leaving, however, Mr. Bidwell called to him from his bed, and putting out his course warm hand from underneath the clothes he shook hands and said: "I out his coarse, warm hand from underneath language upon your arrival. How long since we have contributed anything to the church expenses?" "The records show four years and a half." "What did we contribute before that time?" "The records show eight dollars a year." "Well, Maria," said Mr. Bidwell, calling to his wife, "bring my check book." The check book was brought, and Mr. Bidwell wrote out a check for $36, which he handed to the Rev. Stokes, with the remark that he regretted exceedingly the non-attendance of the household at church services, and assured him that now that the society had a "man behind the guns," he could depend upon regular contributions for all church expenses, including any benevolences which might arise from time to time.

The story goes that after Mr. Bidwell's recovery he, his wife and the children were regular attendants at church, and the parishioners were all convinced that God still reigned in Israel.

Butler College

T. C. HOWE, President.

The fifty-fifth annual session of Butler College closed on June 16. The exercises of the commencement season began with the last chapel service of the year, on the preceding Friday morning. In keeping with the custom of the institution, this service took the form of a farewell to the seniors. Professor Jabez Hall led the devotional service. Interspersed among the musical numbers were speeches by Miss Blanche Ryker and Mr. G. F. Powers of the senior class, and Prof. E. T. Paine and Miss Clara McIntyre of the faculty. President Howe's farewell talk to the class was earnest, thoughtful, practical and helpful.

The Rev. A. W. Fortune of the Walnut Hills Church of Cincinnati, delivered the baccalaureate in the college chapel on Sunday afternoon. His address on "Obedience to Life's Vision," was greatly appreciated both by the class and by the large audience. The reception given on Tuesday evening, by President and Mrs. Howe proved one of the most enjoyable events of the entire week. Practically the entire student body and their friends thronged the house and the spacious lawn till a late hour. Wednesday was set apart principally to the students and alumni. Picnic luncheons were held on the campus by the students, alumni, faculty and friends. In the afternoon the senior class gave two short plays before a large and appreciative audience. The out-door staging amidst the campus scenery added much to the effectiveness of the plays. In the evening a well attended alumni dinner was held at the banquet hall of the Denison Hotel. The after-dinner speeches showed that the students of other days are still interested in the welfare of their alma mater. Steps were taken to more effectively organize the alumni.

The commencement address on "The Final Test of Democracy" delivered on Thursday morning by the Rev. Charles S. Medbury of the University Place Church, Des Moines, Iowa, was a master-piece and was delivered to an audience which packed the chapel to its full capacity. At the conclusion of the address President Howe conferred the degree of bachelor of arts on the eighteen members of the graduating class, and the degree of arts on two of the graduate students, Clay Trusty of the class of 1908. and Carl A. Burkhardt of the class of 1909.

The year just closed has been one of the best in the history of the college. In point of attendance the past year showed a substantial increase over previous years, and that in spite of the fact that the preparatory department, which was put in process of extinction four years ago, has been entirely abolished and the rigorous entrance requirements of recent years have been retained. As a result the students compare favorably with those of any of the other leading colleges of the state. The affiliation with the University of Chicago has been terminated.

Financially the institution is in the best condition it has ever known. The additional $250,000 of endowment recently subscribed has all been paid and is now productive. The president and the board of directors, however, are planning larger things for the near future. Already the Reeves Chair of Biblical Literature and an instructorship in physics have been added to the instructional facilities. In order to provide for further enlargements to improve the buildings and grounds, and to more adequately remunerate the members of the faculty, a further increase in the endowment is contemplated.

Some new faces will be seen in the faculty at the opening of the next scholastic year in September. Owing to the pressure of administrative duties, President Howe has resigned the Armstrong professorship of German, which he has held for twenty years. Dr. George Henry Danton. for the last three years acting assistant professor of German at Leland Stanford Jr. University, has been chosen to the professorship. Dr. Arthur Kenyon Rogers, who has held the professorship of philosophy and education in the college since 1900, has accepted the headship of the department of philosophy at the University of Missouri. Dr. Edmund Howard Hollands of Cornell University has been appointed as his successor. Prof Edward Martin Greene of the University of Wisconsin, has accepted the assistant professorhip of French, and Dr. Henry Mills Gelston of the University of Michigan will be acting professor of Latin language and literature in place of Professor E. T. Paine, who will spend next year on a leave of absence.

The prospects for next year are good. The number of high school graduates who have already indicated their intention of entering the college next September is gratifying and the number of rooms reserved in the college residence for next year is unusually large.

Eureka College

A. C. GRAY, PRESIDENT.

The commencement of Eureka College, June 5-10, was well attended by visitors and very encouraging to all participating, and to the friends of the college. Russell F. Thrapp, of Jacksonville, Ill., an alumnus of the college, preached the baccalaureate sermon. His address, "The Greatest Conquest," was inspiring. The annual meeting of the board of trustees re-elected Dr. N. B. Crawford chairman of the board. It is fitting that this saintly and self-sacrificing man shall lead Eureka College to victory in the present campaign for larger usefulness. A. C. Gray was requested by the trustees to continue another year as acting president. The commencement address of Dr. Herbert Martin, New York City, was clear-cut and scholarly. Many in their enthusiasm and appreciation pronounced it the best address they ever heard. Dr. Martin's subject was "Attitudes." He dealt with the proper attitude to truth, self, society, and the world at large.

Eureka College considers itself most fortunate in adding to its staff of teachers for the ensuing year, Mr. Emory Ross, business manager of the Southern Christian Institute, who will have charge of the Commercial department; and Ralph Goodale, of Ann Arbor, Mich. Mr. Goodale is a graduate of the Tri-State Normal, Angola, Ind., and of the University of Michigan, and has had considerable experience in teaching.

Lida's Wood, Eureka College.

Our courses of study have been materially changed this year. A distinctly Biblical course is to be offered hereafter; and three courses leading to a Bachelor of Arts degree, in which predominates respectively mathematics and science, language and literature, and philosophy, social science and history.

Nine of our teachers are pursuing graduate studies in universities this summer—one in the Universty of Michigan, four in the University of Wisconsin, and four in the University of Chicago.

The spirit and enthusiasm among students, faculty, and friends of the college is all that could be desired.

college and its surroundings, the trustees recently purchased five lots with three dwelling houses contiguous to the entrance of the grounds. This property will later be improved and kept in harmony with the improvements of the college generally.

Most of the faculty of last year will remain. Prof. Philip Johnson, who has been in attendance at the German universities on a year's leave of absence, will return and fill the chair of philosophy. By recent enactment of the legislature of West Virginia, graduates of the Normal department of Bethany are given, without examinations, first grade teachers' certificates for West Virginia. Twelve young ladies and gentlemen graduated in this department in our recent class of fifty-two. To maintain this department, a thoroughly competent teacher of education and supervisor of teacher training has been procured.

Nineteen members of this year's class have chosen the ministry, or the mission field, for their life work. Two of these, Mr. and Mrs. James P. McLeod, will sail for India in September. The others will either attend Yale University, or have accepted calls to important pastorates. It is a matter of great regret that the number is not one hundred, instead of nineteen. So many, and pressing, are the calls from the churches, that we are sure this larger number could quickly be located. Six of our graduates have arranged to enter Yale University. Nine Bethany graduates were in Yale last session.

At the commencement exercises addresses were delivered by chosen members of the graduating class, and by Hon. Stewart F. Reed, secretary of state of West Virginia, Hon. M. M. Cochran, Judge L. T. Parr, George E. Anderson, Campbell Jones, and W. R. Trrett, also spoke briefly.

Three new trustees were elected to serve the college for three years. Judge L. T. Parr, Lisbon, Ohio, David P. Larimore, West Newton, Pa., and O. H. Sala, Minerva, Ohio.

Bethany College

T. E. CRAMBLETT, PRESIDENT.

The sixty-ninth session of Bethany College closed with the annual commencement Thursday, June 9. The attendance at the commencement exercises, and the enthusiasm of the large number of visitors present, was most gratifying. The year just closing has been, in many respects, the most successful in the long and honored history of the institution. The enrollment of different students for the college year, including the summer school, reached 342.

The campaign for endowment conducted during the past year was crowned with success. More than $160,000 has been subscribed. The treasurer's report showed that of this sum $91,000 has already been received, and is interest bearing. Within the last two weeks a generous friend has subscribed $5,000 to the endowment fund.

At the meeting of the board of trustees, Hon. M. M. Cochran, Uniontown, Pa., a life long friend of the college, and one of its most generous supporters, announced that he was ready to contribute $20,000 for the erection of a modern hall for young men. Mr. Cochran gave about $12,000 in cash during the past year. This $20,000 which he now gives for a hall is to be a memorial to his son, Percy H. Cochran, an honored graduate of the college, who died a year and a half ago. A building committee was appointed, and this new memorial hall will be erected at once.

Friends of the college will be glad to know that Thomas W. Phillips, of New Castle, Pa., who agreed some time ago to give $30,000 to endow the Thomas W. Phillips Bible Chair, has made good his promise, and that since April 1, this money has been earning the usual interest. We are in search of a competent man for this professorship, and hope that he may be found and secured to begin work when the next session opens, September 21. Mr. Phillips stipulates as a condition of his gift, that this chair shall never be filled by one who disbelieves in the miraculous birth, the divinity, or the actual resurrection of Jesus.

Extensive improvements are being made on the college campus. Mr. Earl W. Oglesby, of Cleveland, Ohio, is giving $5,000 for this work. The Woman's Association is raising and expending $1,000 additional. Most of the campus has been plowed, graded, and reset in blue grass. Entrance gates, with columns built of Bedford, Ind., sand stone, and pressed brick, are being constructed. This will add much to the appearance of Bethany's beautiful campus.

To carry out the scheme of beautifying the

Texas Christian University

Clinton Lockhart, President.

In the fire which consumed the main building last March the university lost about $180,000, less $30,000 insurance. After the fire the regular work of the university was continued in the remaining buildings on the university grounds in Waco to the close of the session in June. While the work of the spring term was embarrassed with many inconveniences, it was remarkably successful. The attendance during the spring was as great as in other spring terms heretofore, and the graduating classes completed their work in full, and presented a series of splendid entertainments during the commencement week. The baccalaureate sermon was delivered by C. G. Brelos of Galveston, and was highly appreciated. It breathed the spirit of evangelism supported by the noblest principles of manhood and womanhood. The commencement address by Addison Clark, one of the founders of the university, recalled memories of the earlier days of educational work in the southwest. The address gave very worthy advice to the graduating class, and reflected the spirit of the speaker that has always been the admiration of the students of the university. Father F. E. Clark is not more popular with Endeavor workers than Father Addison Clark with T. C. U. students.

After the fire there was a long delay in determining the future location of the school, and various cities were in competition in their effort to make the most liberal donation to secure the university. It was apparent from the first that it was impossible for Waco to raise $150,000 to restore the losses that had been sustained by fire. The proposition of Fort Worth offering fifty acres of land valued at $100,000 and a donation of $200,000 in cash was finally accepted. This is probably the largest single gift that has been made to any one of our church schools. It will require several months to erect buildings as planned by the trustees; for they desire to put up only fireproof structures and to make them strictly modern in every respect. While the money at hand will not enable them to erect many buildings, they desire to construct only the best as far as the means will extend.

As the new buildings will not be ready by the opening of school in September, the university will have choice of continuing its work in its present buildings with adequate temporary structures for class-rooms, or leasing a group of well adapted buildings now available in the city of Fort Worth. At the time of this writing decision has not been made on this point. In either case, the school will open on time and have very satisfactory conditions under which to work. Every department will be carried at its full strength. The faculty for next year is much stronger than heretofore; and already the university has acquired in the southwest a reputation for having one of the most scholarly faculties in this part of the United States.

The future greatness of the school is strictly in the hands of the brotherhood. A large sum of money will be required to equip buildings after they are erected and to put up additional buildings as the needs of the school may demand. It is probable that next year will also bring a deficit for running expenses, and there will be a necessary outlay for the removal of the school from one city to the other. The brethren of the state will readily see the necessity of their meeting this unusually large expense by very liberal donations. If some wealthy persons could see their way to start a large donation on conditions that the rest be raised, there would be now an opportunity to make this one of the best universities among our people. It has a vast territory to reach, and the future will reveal how immense will be the population of this southwestern country. This university must be the educational representative of the Disciples in all this territory.

The Temple Seminary Commencement

PETER AINSLIE, DEAN.

The sixth commencement exercises of the Christian Temple Seminary were held June 12-18. On the 12th was the baccalaureate services with the sermon by the dean; on the evening of the 14th was "Seminary Night," in which all the classes—freshmen, juniors, and seniors, and former graduated classes—made interesting contributions to the program; on the 15th was "Class Day," when all the graduates delivered orations or read essays; on the 16th the diplomas were conferred on eight graduates and Dr. George R. Grose, of Grace M. E. Church, Baltimore, made the address; on the 17th the Seminary banquet was held down town in Guth's picturesque dining rooms, where appropriate toasts and addresses were made; on the 18th was "Field Day," and the Seminary students and their friends took a trip down the Chesapeake Bay.

Temple Seminary.

The whole commencement was full of interest. Reports were made from twelve students in various colleges, preparing for the ministry and missionary field, announced ments were made of six other Seminary students who will enter several of our colleges in the fall in preparation for the same service. Our enrollment last session was close to 100 and the three years' course of Bible study in the Scriptures and Christian Evidences is proving more and more profitable. It not only makes a congregation intelligent in the Scriptures, but lays a foundation for spiritual growth. Church activity is not spiritual growth. There must be intelligent study of the Word. Neither the pulpit nor the Sunday-school can do the work of teaching the Scriptures in that larger sense that both the commission of Jesus and these times call for.

The indications are that we will open next fall with a larger enrollment than at any time in our history. We have been using rooms in the Temple for our teaching, but to do better work we should have a separate building and it is hoped that those who are interested in education, especially in the education of the Scriptures, will be interested enough to make an investment to that end. There is no greater need in this great Roman Catholic city than to establish a school for the teaching of the Scriptures; and the Lord's blessing upon us in the past with many hindrances assures us that with larger plans and that same great blessing we will go forward into a larger service.

Commencement at Cotner

Cotner University held her commencement exercises the second week in June. The program began with the baccalaureate sermon, preached by Chancellor Aylesworth, in the University Church, on Lord's Day morning, June 5. It ended with the alumnae entertainment on the evening of June 9.

The commencement exercises, as a whole, were the best in the history of the institution. The events which deserve special mention are: The baccalaureate sermon, the oratorio rendered by the musical department, the play presented by the department of expression, the commencement address and the alumnae program. Each of these was all that could be wished.

Chancellor Aylesworth preached a truly great sermon to the graduating class. His messages are always of a high order, but this one was especially so. The sermon was grouped around that familiar passage in the fourth chapter of Philippians: "Finally brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, etc." The text was treated in a new and refreshing manner that made it a delight to hear. Chancellor Aylesworth has given twenty years of his life to Cotner University. He has not given it in vain, for he has left the impress of his splendid personality on everything connected with the school, and it would be difficult to imagine how any man could be held in higher regard by all who know him.

The commencement address was delivered by A. D. Harmon of St. Paul, Minn., pastor of our largest church in that city. Mr. Harmon is an alumnus of Cotner and his good wife enjoys the same distinction. The theme of the address was—the spirit of our age and the man needed by our age. It was a classical production both as to thought and style. Brother Harmon is a great preacher and he gave full evidence of the fact in this address. It had the distinct note of the prophetic in it—a note based on a keen observation of the present age spirit and existing world movements. He characterized the spirit of our age as commercialism and gave reasons for his characterization, that were illuminating and convincing. He prophesied that we were entering into an age when our commercial spirit would be consecrated to the extension of the Kingdom of God. The following is an excerpt from that part of his address which abounds in the prophetic:

"The year just closed has been the best one in Cotner's history. There were more students enrolled than in any previous year. Cotner now stands third of all our schools in the number of students. The work along all lines of the school's activities has advanced.

"The great need of the school, as it is of nearly every school in our brotherhood, is an ample endowment. A campaign has been carried on for some months to the end of securing one hundred thousand dollars for endowment. Progress is being made. Over thirty thousand has been secured and the remaining seventy is the aim for the next year. At the alumnae banquet, held during commencement, ten thousand of this remaining seventy was promised. The future is hopeful, and a better day is coming.

"But, oh, how long! How long! is it going to take our brotherhood to awake to the fact that back of every enterprise stands our educational institutions? Back of every man that has gone to the foreign field is a college. Cotner now has forty volunteers for the foreign field. What institution can surpass that record? Back of the men on the home field are our colleges. Back of Church Extension, publishing houses and every other enterprise among us is our educational centers. And oh, the shame of the way in which we have neglected them.

'Lord of hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget; lest we forget.'"

A SERIAL STORY

Donald Graeme

CHAPTER VIII.

A Heavy Sentence.

Donald pale and haggard after a restless night, entered the office at the usual hour in the morning. He was surprised and not his father's anger most keenly, and was also conscious, for the first time in his life.

"Put down thae papers an' listen." His father's voice bore the unmistakable tone of command. Donald obeyed instantly. Dropping the papers on the desk he turned round and looked into his father's stern face, with anxious, troubled eyes.

"I hae spent lang hours, last nicht an' this morn, over the books. A' seems richt here. We hae naethin' tae bother aboot now, but the forgery. Hae ye gotten onything new tae say aboot it since yestreen?"

"Nothing more, father. I—I made no inquiries. Mr. Sinclair and you both said there should be no investigation while Miss Wallace is with us." Donald spoke humbly. He did not blame his father for believing him guilty. He was keenly conscious of the fact that everything seemed dead against him. If Jeanie had done this thing, it was her love for him that had dragged her down. The blame was all his. He deserved to suffer for it. And he would, too. Jeanie should never bear the blame of it—never, come what might. So he stood with downcast face and guilty look, waiting to hear what more his stern-voiced father might say to him. There was silence for a brief space. Then David Graeme spoke in a cold, hard voice words that his unhappy son would remember to his dying day—

"Donald Graeme, I set ye free from duty in this office, as well as in the shop. Sae lang as this crime is unconfessed, ye hae nae part wi' me. If it wasna for yer mither's sake an' Jeanie's, I would make a public example o' ye. Go; an' ye can say tae Miss Wallace that yer faither has given ye a haliday. Ae more thing I wad say: If ye canna clear yersel' o' this disgrace, Canada's before ye."

"You are a hard father, and you have condemned me untried. Some day you will be sorry for it." Donald's face was set and white. He did not realize that his father, proud of his integrity, and humbled to the dust for the stain cast on his honorable name, was suffering as deeply as himself. He did not know that if his father could have seen the merest gleam of hope, that his only son could clear himself of the charge hanging over him, he would have rejoiced with fervent thanksgiving. So Donald left his father's presence that calm autumn day, feeling wronged and crushed by the thought that he was cast forever from his father's love as well as from his home. Without speaking to any one, the young man passed out of his father's shop—the shop, high-classed and prosperous, which was to be his own one day, now apparently, lost to him forever.

No sooner had Donald shut the passage door on himself than James Douglas turned towards the office. The old man sat upright in his chair staring vacantly before him, as if he had been a figure carved in stone.

"Maister, what hae ye done? Donald has gone oot o' the shop wi' a look on his face I dinna like tae see."

"Donald has gone oot o' this office and shop no to come back till he is able to clear his name an' mine, frae this stain, Jamie."

"It's a hard sentence, maister, seein' ye hae nae proof. Ye micht as weel sen' me off in the same way."

"Hoots, Jamie, ye hae nae appearance o' guilt aboot ye. I wish I could think the same o' my ain son."

"So ye hae condemned your ae son on appearances, maister. Weel, I'm no' an elder o' the kirk yet, so I suppose I hae no richt tae go sae far."

"There's mair nor appearances, Jamie. There's facts. He stammers an' shuffles an' talks aboot fearin' for somebody else. Wha he'll no say. Would an innocent man no speak oot an' clear himsel'?"

"I repeat, it's no fair tae judge by appearances, maister. I mind fine when I was at the school when some paltry chil wud play a trick on the teacher. Nae sooner would the schoolmaister get up to demand who did this thing, than some wee innocent lad or lass would blush up like the settin' sun sun on a calm simmer evening, while the guilty one would look as cool as a cucumber. Na, na, maister, there's nae jidgin' o' folk by appearances.'

"Ye may speak for a heiland moon, Jamie, but ye'll no talk Donald innocent."

"What are ye goin' tae dae wi' him?"

"He's been wishin' tae go tae Canada for twa or three months back; that's anither thing against him. Conscience makes cowards. Canada will be big enough for him tae hide in."

"Then ye may take my warnin' frae this day. When Donald goes tae Canada for this cause, I go wi' him."

"Jamie Douglas, hae I no' enough tae suffer wiout you addin' tae my burden? Do you no see that Donald's sin an' shame is breakin' my hert?" The old man hid his face in his hands, and his strong frame shook with dry sobs, pitiful to see.

"Maister, maister, dinna take on sae," pleaded James, himself scarce able to restrain tears. I was a blasted fool for speakin' tae ye as I did. But it was for Donald's sake. Ye ken fine I'll never leave ye till my deein' day; an' we'll prove Donald innocent lang afore that, ye'll see." Mr. Graeme raised his head and steadying his voice by a great effort he said:

"If ye succeed in clearing Donald o' this crime, James Douglas, I take ye into partnership the same day."

"I'm no' despisin' the partnership maister, but it's no worth twa straws tae me, compared wi' Donald's character."

Meantime, Donald hiding like a criminal in his own room near the top of the house, had little thought that even James Douglas would think enough of him to speak a word in his favor. How clearly he realized now what his past folly had been, and how the chains he had woven round himself when he had stooped to hidden enjoyments, were now cutting into his heart with wounds that would leave scars for all time. But the thought of all others most galling was not for his own humiliation, but, had he dragged his gifted young sister down with him in his degradation. He could hear her voice, from where he sat on his bedside in abject misery, mingling in happy girlish laughter with her friend's. Sometimes a snatch of song floated up to him as if to mock his unhappiness. Then again, light footsteps would sound along the corridors as the merry girls ran hither and thither, assisting the maid-of-all-work in household duties. Again he found himself wondering if Jeanie could be so happy had she ever done this vile thing, even for him. And Elsie Wallace too, the girl with the dark, clear eyes that seemed to read one's very soul. What would she think of him, if she knew how he had once fallen a victim to the gambling craze? She would turn from him with horror and loathing. And no wonder. Why had he ever listened to John McKetridge, when he spoke to him so fair and decoyed him into his back parlor, just to while away an hour with other young fellows? What would he not give to be able to blot out of his life the memory of that year of folly in which he had yielded to the love of excitement, and gone in for playing for money. But for that dark page in his history this crime would never have been laid to his charge, any more than to James Douglas'. Ay, and James blamed him, too. He could not do otherwise. Mr. Sinclair, worst of all, the man who had taught him the value of a pure life. What must he think of him? And his mother, his gentle, white-haired mother—would it break her heart?

His bitter reflections were broken in upon by the unceremonious entrance of James Douglas.

"I hae been looking for ye all over the hoose, Donald."

"What for, James? Do you not know that I'm an outcast from office and shop, and soon maybe from home and country?"

"Donald, my hert's sair for ye. Ye ken fine, I hae nae time for speeches the noo. But this word I'll gie ye before I rin back tae my work. Go tae yer mither and tell her everything. Though your sin be black as hell, Donald, a mither like yours will not forsake you. A man's best friend, on earth, when he's in trouble, Donald, is his mither or his sweethert—good women are aye strong in time o' need."

"The only thing I have to tell my mother, James, woud only cast suspicion more strongly on me concerning the forgery."

"Donald, who is guilty, if you are not?"

"I am not always in the office, James—neither are you—some one may have been there unknown to either."

"A most unlikely thing."

"Not an impossibility."

"Na, but yer faither harps on your airt o' imitating handwriting."

"Many others can copy handwriting more perfectly than I can, my cousin Archie, for instance. But, oh, I know it all looks dead against me." James Douglas scratched his head.

"Ay, Archie has been oot an' in among us for a good while now. But he's a ship owner. No a man likely tae need money. Hark till him now in the drawing room, wi' the young ladies, singing as usual, 'The Guid Auld Simmer Time.' Some men are said to be born wi' a silver spoon in their mouths. I believe it was wi' a comic song in his mouth that Archie was born. I wonder Miss Jeanie is no' fair scunnered wi' him."

"I thought he was off early in the morning, James." Donald spoke listlessly.

"Oh, he has nae need tae tie himsel' tae work. His ships pay for themsel's in a wheen o' months."

"You are hard on Archie, James," said Donald, as he rose wearily from the bedside where he had been half reclining since James came in.

"Though he's your cousin, Donald, he's a man I canna like, an' wadna trust, Donald."

"Well, at any rate, James, wish him no ill today, as I mean to run up to Glasgow with him."

"If ye were na along wi' him, I wadna be sorry tae hear that the motor had gi'en hersel' a dunt against something saft, that wad put her aff the road for a while. How lang will ye stay in Glasgow, Donald?"

"Hard to tell."

"I wadna, like a coward, turn my back on danger, gin I were you. And think on what I advised ye aboot opening your hert tae your mither. Remember too, Donald, that come what will, I'm your freend."

Donald grasped his proferred hand and wrung it in silence.

The houses were all alight in Kelvinside when Archie Monteith's motor car stopped to let Donald down at his mother's door.

"I'll just run away to the office, Donald, and see if all's right. Tell mother not to wait dinner for me." Before he had finished the sentence his mother threw open the door and stepped on to the pavement.

"Donald, lad, I'm real glad to see you. But Archie, what on earth kept you away all day. There have been three mssengers from the office this day inquiring for you. Business should be first with you, my son." He bent towards her and kissed her cheek lightly as he whispered in her ear:

"When a man's in love, there is only one business in the world, mother, mine."

"Ay, but when poverty comes in at the door, love flies out at the window."

"I think I know a woman whose love could not be killed even by poverty." Lifting his hand to his cap, he drove off.

"Come and tell me all the news, Donald," said his aunt, leading him into her cozy drawing room, where a cheerful fire burned brightly.

"Draw near the fire," she added, wheeling in a comfortable chair. "Motoring is cold, though it is only October, and lovely weather."

"Yes, a fire is delightful. As the evenings are growing chill, and then, Archie drives like Jehu, you know."

"Yes, my heart's in my mouth every time he goes out to Brigend. In town he must go moderately. But I know he will be reckless on country roads."

"I don't wonder at it. One forgets everything but the delight of the moment when motoring."

"There you are, Donald. Men are always talking of forgetting—what in the world have young fellows like you and Archie to forget?"

Donald laughed—a laugh without merriment.

"Aunt Eleanor, there are few men, who have not something in their minds, they would be glad to forget."

"Not meaning you nor Archie? I hope—and yet I fear Archie has something to bother him, betimes. Tell me, Donald, how much longer does Jeanie mean to keep him rushing to and fro, between Brigend and Kelvinside?"

"So it's not just altogether the love of motoring brings Archie so often to our town, ye think, Aunt Eleanor?"

"And you're not sueh a goose as to think it was either, Master Donald—Have you no lass of your own?"

"Thank heaven, no," exclaimed Donald, fervently.

"You are not a woman hater I hope? Though it looks very like it. Running away from home, when a bonnie girl like Elsie Wallace is there. Jeanie told me in a note yesterday she had arrived."

"She's Jeanie's friend, not mine."

"But there's nothing to prevent Jeanie's friend from being your sweetheart, lad. And so good a daughter as Elsie is proving herself, is sure to make a good wife."

"As like as not you'll never see me have a wife, Aunt. You'll mind some day that I told you."

"I'll have a good laugh at you, some day, when you bring the wife to see me. But you've time enough for years yet. Only auld wives like me must have our bit nonsense, sometimes. I'm not joking about Archie, though. Do you think Jeanie gives him any encouragement?"

"I really cannot say. Jeanie does not seem to me to be one of those girls who are very anxious to get married. She seems more in love with the church organ than with any man."

"Is it only the organ, think you, Donald, or is it the minister as well? Archie does not tell me much, but he says Mr. Sinclair is at your house oftener than most ministers are given to call with hearers."

"Mr. Sinclair! Oh, that's absurd. He was always intimate at our house. He does come oftener now, but that's because Jeanie is organist. Of course he has to arrange hymns and things. Mr. Sinclair, indeed! He wouldn't marry the best woman that ever lived. As he said to me one day not long since: 'Some men are married to their life work'—I believe he meant himself."

"If he has been musing that way, Donald, take my word for it, he's in danger of changing his mind. Some men fancy themselves on a high pinnacle of duty, or piety, or self-denial. Far above their fellows in fact. But when a charming woman comes the way, they find themselves just like common men."

"Whether Mr. Sinclair ever marries or not, Aunt Eleanor, he will never be a common man. Since he came to Brigend, he has given his whole energies to the good of his people. Sometimes a fellow sees a thing like that, when too late."

"Donald you speak as if you had something on your mind. What is it, lad?" Donald tried to laugh. He had not meant to let his aunt see that anything was troubling him. The words had slipped out before he thought of what he was saying. With a lame enough attempt at candor, he replied:

"Oh, it's only that I have been a fool, lately. For weeks past I have been bothering father and mother about getting away to Canada. Just this morning father told me that it's the best thing I can do—already it seems a dull enough lookout."

"Donald Graeme were you daft, ever to think of leaving Brigend, with your prospects? I tell you there's many a big house in Glasgow would be glad of your father's income. Put the thought of Canada out of your head forever. When Jeanie marries, your mother will need some one in her place. Then we'll see if Donald does not begin to look at a bonnie lass."

"Maybe Jeanie will have just as little thought of marriage as I have."

"Never believe it, Donald. Jeanie would not allow Archie to go on as he does, if she did not mean to accept him. She knows fine that the motor car was bought solely on her account."

"I think Archie should have waited. I have an idea that Jeanie does not wish to leave father and mother. I do not think Aunt Eleanor, that she seems to favor Archie more than anyone else."

"Why has she not come to see me since she left school?"

"You forget that she is organist. Miss Greg may not be back for a long time."

"She knows that I cannot leave the house here to servants. She must come soon, even for a day or two."

"When Miss Wallace leaves, perhaps she may. Oh, here comes Archie in time for dinner, after all."

"Well, Donald, have you given mother all the news? Have you told her how many times a day, old 'Dry-as-dust' comes in to see Jeanie?"

"Whether he comes to see her or not you'd better not let her hear you call him names."

"I'd like to drown him out of my way."

Archie was laughing, and his mother helped on the jest by saying:

"If your jealous fears are correct, Archie, it will be a great pity of the poor man when the day comes that he has to marry you."

A daintily dressed maid entered, bearing a salver on which lay a telegram.

"For you, Donald," said Archie, handing it to him.

"Bother," said Donald, glancing over it. "It's from Jeanie. What's up, now, I wonder?"

He handed it back to Archie who read aloud:

"Come home by first train in the morning. Important."

Little Red Hen

(The good old story of "The Little Red Hen and the Grain of Wheat," told in verse by Eudora M. Bumstead.)

Little Red Hen looked busily round,
  In search of a bit to eat,
Till, hid in the straw and chaff, she found
  A plump little grain of wheat.
"Now, who will plant this wheat?" she cried.
"Not I!" the goose and duck replied.
"Not I!" said the dog and the cat.
"Not I!" said the mouse and the rat.
"Oh, I will then," said Little Red Hen,
  And so she threshed the wheat
Till a hole she dug, and covered it snug,
  And scratched with her quick little feet,

Little Red Hen gave tender care.
  The rain and the shine came down,
And the wheat grew green and tall and fair,
  Then turned to a golden brown.
"Now, who will reap this wheat?" she cried.
"Not I!" the goose and the duck replied.
"Not I!" said the dog and the cat.
"Not I!" the goose and the duck replied.
"Not I!" said the mouse and the rat.
"Oh, I will, then," said Little Red Hen,
  And, braving the midsummer heat.
She cut it at will with her trim little bill.
  And so she reaped the wheat.

Little Red Hen peeped slyly about
  From her snug little nest in the hay.
If only that wheat were all threshed out
  And fit to be stored away!
"Now, who will thresh this wheat?" she cried.
'Not I!" said the dog and the cat.
"Not I," said the mouse and the rat.
"Oh, I will, then," said the Little Red Hen,
  And, having no flail, she beat
With her wings of red on the grain instead
  And so was planted the wheat.

Little Red Hen had still no rest,
  Although she had worked so well.
She thought of the chicks in her snug little nest,
How soon they would peep in the shell.
"Now, who will go to the mill?" she cried.
"Not I!" the goose and the duck replied.
"Not I!" said the dog and the cat.
"Not I!" said the mouse and the rat.
"Oh, I will, then," said Little Red Hen,
  And fashioned a sack so neat.
With cornsilk thread and a cornhusk red.
  In which she carried the wheat.

Little Red Hen then made some bread,
  That was white and light and sweet,
And when it was done she smiled and said:
  "We'll see who is willing to eat."
"Now, who will eat this loaf?" she cried.
"I will !" the goose and the duck replied.
"I will!" said the dog and the cat.
"I will!" said the house and the rat.
"No doubt," said the hen, "if you get it," and then
  (How the lazy rogues longed for the treat!)
She clucked to her chicks—she was mother of six—
  And that was the end of the wheat.

Judge—"Why did you burn your barn down, just after getting it insured?"

Farmer—"Your honor, a poor man like me can't afford to have a barn and insurance too."—Meggendorfer Blaetter.

Roosevelt

The jungles, Britain, Egypt, Rome,
Each land extols and blames him,
And now that he is rushing home
His country loud acclaims him.

Acres of paper, lakes of ink,
Are joined to spread his glory,
High future and clear past to link
Into the ringing story.

A million men his deeds make known
In fleeting words of duty,—
I smile to think my pen alone
Paints him in deathless beauty.

Miss Webster

By Hilda Richmond.

"Johnny, I want to tell you something," said Mrs. Webster mysteriously as she drew her tall husband to a corner of the sitting room. "That box of roses you sent me this morning Margaret thought was hers, and you must not mention them. The dear child took so much pleasure in them that I couldn't tell her." Mrs. Webster used the name she always reserved for occasions when she wanted her own way very much, but her husband frowned.

"Your wedding anniversary roses!" said Mr. Webster in a disappointed tone. "I don't like it, Maggie!"

"Neither do I, Johnny, but let's not say anything." Further conversation of a private nature was impossible for just then the tall, beautiful daughter of the house lightly whisked into the room, and thrust a huge, fragrant mass of creamy roses under her father's nose.

"What do you think of these, papa?" she said with a little laugh. "I have an unknown admirer! Twenty-three exquisite roses in December when there has been a rose famine almost. Aren't they lovely? I'd just give a lot to know who sent them. Papa Webster, did you send them to me?" she demanded.

"Indeed I didn't, Margaret," said the man of the house with emphasis. "I can truly say, Not Guilty."

"I wonder if it was that silly Charley Fields," went on the young lady. "If I really thought so I'd throw them in the ash barrel. He squeezed my hand at the party last night and acted so horrid. Of course he wouldn't send them, though. He'd bring them himself. Silly thing!"

Margaret Webster carried the roses up to her room where she could enjoy them to the utmost, as she was going to spend the afternoon writing letters. She had only been home a short time, and her moments had been so filled with attentions from her friends and receiving the homage of her relatives, that she had scarcely time to think of the friends she left behind when she came home after five years' absence.

When Mrs. Webster's rich sister offered to educate Margaret in a renowned Eastern college, the family felt sure the chance must be providential, and accepted at once. Mrs. Gregory was much older than Mrs. Webster and had lived abroad so many years that the two sisters were almost strangers. Margaret was in high glee at the prospect of a college course in a much better institution, than the modest income of the family would ever have allowed, with a trip to Europe during the summer vacation thrown in, but when she discovered that it meant staying away from home altogether she was very homesick and depressed. If it had not been for the home folks she would have given up in despair, but they urged her to be brave and think only of the advantages before her. Five years to a girl of sixteen stretch out almost without end, but at last the time had come when the long journeying through foreign lands after the college course came to an end, and the brilliant young student was permitted to go home. Mrs. Gregory had found another niece more ambitious socially than Margaret. and she made the exchange to the great delight of both girls. The Websters were particularly happy to have their daughter with them and Margaret was overjoyed to get back home. Fortune had smiled on Mr. Webster during the past few years, and the house was modernized and refurnished to do honor to the return of the long absent daughter.

"How tiresome!" said Margaret as the door bell rang and she knew she would have to answer it. It was Rosa's afternoon out and Mrs. Webster and her husband's sister who lived with them had gone shopping. She thought once she would not go down, but in the end she ran to the door just in time to see a tall, distinguished looking gentleman turning away.

"How do you do, Judge Kirke?" she said extending her hand. "Come in! I don't believe you know me!"

"Indeed I do!" said the guest warmly. "You look just the same as you did when you left, Miss Margaret, only—" he seemed at a loss for words as he stood looking at her. "You know travel and college and all those things change the expression a little."

"Which is a very polite way of saying I have grown older," laughed Margaret. "Well, I'll forgive you this time. Mamma and Aunt Eleanor? They are down town shopping."

The guest made quite a lengthy call, and Margaret was charmed with him. He was about thirty-five or forty years old, and she remembered him as a rising young attorney when she left for college. She had scarcely known him in those days, as he was a young lawyer while she was a little girl, but this afternoon as they chatted she seemed to have known him all her life. He was slightly gray, but so young in appearance after all, and so entirely different from the youths she had met in the fashionable set in which her aunt moved, that she was delighted.

"I am very thankful I went down," she said with a little smile on her lips as she returned to her letter writing. "It is a pleasure to converse with a man of sense."

The next day Rosa answered the door bell, and was going up stairs with a note when Margaret met her. "'Miss Webster'" she read on the envelope. "I'll take that, Rosa!"

"Did anyone ever see such stupidity," said Margaret to herself as the girl shuffled back to the kitchen. "Just because mamma told her yesterday to always take the notes to my room when they came she thought she had to obey."

The color rose to Margaret's cheeks as she read the note. It was an invitation from Judge Kirke to go sleigh riding at two in the afternoon, and he asked her to telephone her answer. Margaret had a sort of half engagement with some girls for the afternoon to go to the library, but she instantly decided to accept the invitation in her hand, and put the girls off.

"I can't understand!" came faintly over the wire as she telephoned to Judge Kirke's office. "That storm tangled up the wires. Please say it over again."

"This—is—Miss—Webster," said Margaret after considerable trouble. "I—shall—be glad—to— accept—your— invitation—for — this afternoon." The answer must have been satisfactory, for she hung up the receiver, and held her ear a few moments to escape the unpleasant sensation which the crackling and buzzing and humming of the wires had produced.

That afternoon Margaret ran down the stairs all ready for the drive, and Judge Kirke seemed to forget his manners as he stared at her. Her magnificent furs and costly dress provided by the aunt whose purse was filled to overflowing, made her look more stately and handsome than ever, and the glow on her cheeks deepened as he stared.

"You are surprised that I am ready on time," she said lightly to cover his evident confusion. "You see I am the exception to the general rule."

He seemed to recover the power of speech as they started, and they had a very merry afternoon. The air was crisp and the sleighing perfect, so they gave themselves over to the business of enjoying every moment, and for Margaret the homeward drive came all too soon. Her aunt always lingered in warm countries in winter, and at school she had been so carefully chaperoned and looked after that this was her first enjoyable cold weather drive in years.

The next day a house party claimed her attention, and it was a week before she returned home. So much pleasure and so many social events crowded in upon her, as she renewed her acquaintance with old time friends, that she almost forgot Judge Kirke entirely. However she thought of him the very day she got home, which was quite unexpected, as a case of scarlet fever developed in the family she was to visit after the house party came to a close, so she arrived one cold day unannounced.

"How on earth did Judge Kirke know I came home this morning?" she said to herself as a box of flowers for Miss Webster was delivered three hours after she returned. "This is getting serious. O, I know! The young lady who works in his office was at the train when I got off. I saw her looking at me very closely." She carried the flowers upstairs at once. "Papa will tease me unmercifully about my elderly lover if he finds out he sent me flowers the instant I got home. I've always heard that the older people get the worse the disease takes hold," she mused as she settled the beautiful roses in water. "Judge Kirke!" she went on with her head perched a little on on side as she eyed the flowers, "I think you have splendid taste when it comes to selecting flowers, but I do think I might get tired of a legal friend who is so devoted."

Christmas came with its train of festivities,

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, JULY 3.

Theme for the Day.—Daily Strength for Daily Needs.

Scripture.—Only be thou strong and very courageous . . . for then shalt thou make thy way prosperous, and then shalt thou have good success.. Have I not commanded thee? Be strong and of good courage, be not afraid neither be thou dismayed; for the Lord thy God is with thee, whithersoever thou goest.—Josh. 1:10, 11.

Be strong!
It matters not how deep intrenched the wrong,
How hard the battle goes, the day, how long;
Faint not, fight on! Tomorrow comes the song.
Be strong!
—Maltbie D. Babcock ("Be Strong.")

Prayer.—Our gracious Father, we give Thee humble and hearty thanks for Thy strength vouchsafed to us for our daily comfort and protection. We acknowledge Thy providence which has brought us in safety to this holy day. May we accept it as one of the gifts of life by which we come to know Thee as our Father and Friend. Grant us the wisdom and humility to go through this day's duties with the thought of Thy care and Thy will in our behalf. May we slight no duty, but accept all the labors of the day as a part of our divine calling and profession. May we enter Thy house with joy, and worship Thee in spirit and in truth. And may all the experiences of the day bring us nearer to Thee. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

MONDAY, JULY 4. (Independence Day.)

Theme for the Day.—National Blessings and Responsibilities.

Scripture.—The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage.—Psa. 16:6.

Blessed is the people whose God is Jehovah.—Psa. 144:46.

God of our fathers, known of old,
Lord of our far-flung battle line;
Beneath whose mighty hand we hold
Dominion over palm and pine;
Lord God of hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget! Lest we forget!
—Rudyard Kipling ("The Recessional.")

Prayer.—Our God and Ruler, we adore Thee for Thy guidance of our national life up to this very hour. Through dangers of many minds Thou hast brought us, and though we have often suffered, yet Thou hast never forsaken us. On this day, the memorial of our beginnings as a nation, we would not be unmindful of that kindly hand by which we have been led and safeguarded. May we celebrate this day, not as those who would disgrace it by confusion and uproar, but as those who would make of it a real holiday, a day of holy memories and hopes. And may our purposes be lifted to new planes of patriotism as we consider all the lessons of our history. Amen.

TUESDAY, JULY 3.

Theme for the Day.—The Need of Unceasing Vigilence.

Scripture.—Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation.—Matt. 26:16.

Beware of them that come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves. By their fruits ye shall know them.—Matt. 7:15.

Much remains
To conquer still; peace hath her victories
No less renowned than war: new foes arise,
Threatening to bind our souls with secular chains.
Help us to save free conscience from the paw
Of hireling wolves, whose gospel is their maw.
—John Milton ("To Cromwell.")

Prayer.—Holy Father, we thank Thee today for the new occasions that life brings to us. Each new day brings us its privileges and its work. Both are needed to make life complete. We desire to enter upon the experiences of this day with a due sense of Thy love and mercy, that have kept us hitherto. We want to meet all the problems of the day with patience and courage. Our domestic relations and our social plans we should like to have enriched by Thy presence and direction. Our business and our public life we would live as in the great Taskmaster's eye. So may we be led this day that we may count it a good day when it shall come to its close. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 7.

Theme for the Day.—God's Love.

Scripture.—He careth for you.—Psa.26:5.

Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of these things.—Matt. 6:14.

For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life.—John 3:16.

Receive the good glad news again,
O heavy-laden sons of men;
Our Father will your burden bear,
Our Father will your sorrows share,
Because he loves you. Cold of heart
Are you to others? Do your part,
And thank Him thus. To your heart's take Earth's sad ones for your Father's sake,
Because He loves you.
—Marianne Farningham ("Our Father Cares.")

Prayer.—Our Heavenly Father, we have read the story of Thy love to us in the gospel of Jesus Christ our Lord. It seems wonderful past all power of believing. Surely Thou hast seen in us values which we should never discover in ourselves. May we accept Thy estimate of our lives rather than our own, and make the daily effort to complete Thy plans for us by Christly living and service. Especially may we give to others the joy of appreciation and good will which our Father has shown to us. And may we at all times seek the direction of the Holy Spirit, our Comforter and Friend. Amen.

THURSDAY, JULY 8.

Theme for the Day.—The Knowledge that Comes of Experience.

Scripture.—The man answered, Whether he be a sinner, I know not. One thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see.—John 9:27.

If e'er when faith had fallen asleep,
I heard a voice, "Believe no more,"
And heard an ever breaking shore,
That tumbled in the godless deep;

A warmth within the breast would melt
The freezing reason's colder part,
And like a man in wrath the heart
Stood up and answered, "I have felt."
—Alfred Tennyson ("In Memoriam.")

Prayer.—Father of mercies, we are grateful for all the goodness that falls to us through Thy mercy and the atoning of our Saviour. Through his cross and the wonder of his life of goodness and sacrifice we have peace with God and the promise of eternal life. Our Father, we give Thee praise not only for the assurances of holy scripture, but also for the abiding presence of the Holy Spirit in our hearts, which makes the comfort of our faith complete. May we never give over the calm and serene confidence which our friendship with God affords. May the day star arise in our hearts to give us complete trust in God and the life eternal. Amen.

FRIDAY, JULY 8.

Theme for the Day.—The Eternal God and Tender Father.

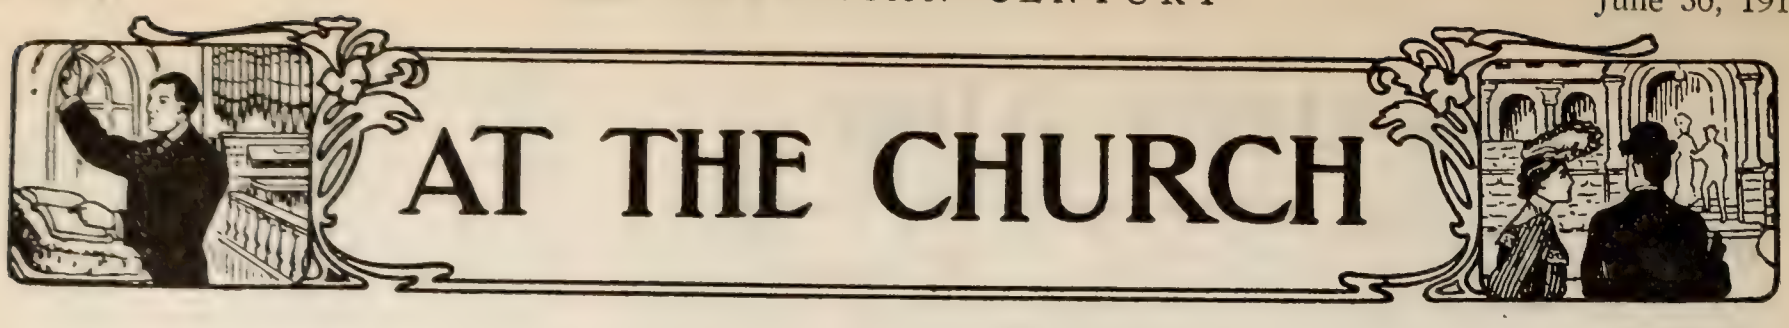
Scripture.—Lord, Thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations.—Psa. 90:1.

Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him.—Psa. 103:12.

Thou who didst wrap the cloud
Of infancy around us, that Thyself
Therein with our simplicity, awhile
Mightst hold, on earth, communion undisturbed;
Who from the anarchy of dreaming sleep,
Or from the death-like void, with punctual care,
And touch as gentle as the morning light,
Restorest us daily to the powers of sense
And reason's steadfast rule, Thou, Thou alone
Art everlasting.
—William Wordsworth ("The Prelude.")

Prayer.—Father of spirits, Thou God of life and of salvation, we waken to a new day with the consciousness that it is through Thy kindness that we still have health and reason. We thank Thee for our families, for the children in our homes, and for all the happy events the days bring us in their passing. Our life is such a little thing, help us to acquire something of the sense of Thine own eternity, that we may feel that we too share a little in that endlessness which is thine. Deal with us very gently, for we are only children, and need Thy constant care and love. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

SATURDAY, JULY 9.



Theme for the Day.—The Higher Destiny.

Scripture.—Be not anxious for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, nor for the body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?—Matt. 6:24.

Ye therefore shall be perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect.—Matt. 6:30.

Not enjoyment, and not sorrow
Is our destined end or way.
But to act that each tomorrow
Find us further than today.
Longfellow ("A Psalm of Life.")

Prayer.—Divine Father, we want to learn the lesson of interest in the higher things. At times we fall into the illusion that the chief purpose of life is the good that we can get from it. Then when we see how little the good of the world can satisfy, we turn from it all and seek in self-denial nad suffering some atonement for the evil of our hearts. Aid us to understand, dear God, that neither pleasure nor pain are of value in themselves, but that all the experiences of life should bring us further on the way of holiness. May our anxiety be therefore for the attainment of character, and not for either the winning or the avoidance of the joys of life. This we ask in the name of our great Example. Amen.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

In the School of Christ*

The review lessons for this year come quite irregularly. The first quarter had none, and the second quarter was really in the same state. The present review comes as the second lesson of the third quarter, and in the fourth quarter the review occurs as lesson four. There seems to be no special reason for this dislocation of the reviews. They are of great value in the study of any series of lessons if properly placed and carefully employed. If emphasis is placed on the individual lessons, as in the case of the younger classes in schools where the proper grading is not observed, then the review is of less value. But if an effort is made to keep the entire story of Jesus' ministry in mind the reviews are of great help, because they gather up the lessons of a considerable time and put them in more or less clear perspective in the minds of the students.

Little Logical Order.

The lessons of the past quarter are not easily grouped into such subordinate divisions as are usually found helpful in the conduct of the review. In only two of the four general divisions into which it seems best to throw the lessons of the quarter is there any logical coherence. This is because the material is placed by the evangelists in such a manner as to bear almost equally on the different phases of Jesus' public work. Therefore, incidents, teachings and miracles follow each other without particular connection.

The First Group.

For purposes of convenience in connection with the present study it seems wise to put the first four lessons into the first of four divisions. These four lessons include the cure of Jairus' daughter and of the woman who touched Jesus on the way to the ruler's house, the missions of the twelve disciples, the inquiry of John the Baptist, and the discourse of Jesus which included such alarming warnings and such a gracious invitation. Few groups of narrative could be more diverse than this. The first lesson is the story of miraculous help afforded a bereaved family and a diseased woman. The second records the instructions given to Jesus' followers as they went forth on their mission of evangelism to neighboring districts of Galilee. The third gives us the picture of John's embassy to Jesus to inquire if the expectations of that stern preacher of the desert had been mistaken or not. And the fourth gives the striking contrast between those places that had listened to the teachings of Jesus and those who had rejected him, and with the additional word of warm and loving invitation to himself and the rest he could give to his weary ones.

Four Phases of His Work.

These four lessons are different enough in character, yet all four of them illustrate some important phase in the life of Christ. More than this, they give us some due impression of the variety of activity to which he devoted himself in the course of his day's work. Here were two works of mercy, a commission to his followers to teach for him in wider districts, a conference with the friends of the great evangelist, John the Baptist, who came to bring some comforting word from Jesus to their depressed leader, and the words of Jesus to the multitude in reference to the dangers of neglecting the invitation which he was so graciously offering to the world.

The Second Group.

The second group of lessons also includes four. These are as unrelated as those in the former division, and one of them is the quarterly temperance lesson, chosen from the Book of Proverbs. The other three, the fifth, seventh and eighth of the series, deal respectively with Jesus' attitude toward Sabbath narrowness, his indignant refutation of the Jewish charge that he was linked with the prince of evil in his working of miracles, and finally the tragic death of John the Baptist as the result of a woman's furious hatred.

Progress Toward the Goal.

The progress noted in this series over the first is seen chiefly in the deepening opposition to the Master on the part of the Jewish rulers. Jesus' tone in reference to them is correspondingly severe. There is distinct rebuke in his comments on their overzealous criticism of the disciples for their plucking the grain on the Sabbath day, and of Jesus himself because he wished to cure a man with a shrunken hand whom he saw in the synagogue. In the lesson against the blasphemy uttered regarding the Holy Spirit, Jesus reaches the limit of severity in his reproof of Jewish hatred toward himself. There is also progress from the arrest of John in the first section to his death in this, the second.

The Third Group.

The third series of lessons is wholly taken up with the works of power which occupied so notable a place in the public ministry of Christ. Three of them are given in this group. Lesson nine is the story of the four thousand fed from a seemingly impossible store of food. The relation of this narrative to the feeding of the five thousand is clear, though whether it be a duplicate or a second miracle it is difficult to decide. Lesson ten deals with Jesus' approach to the disciples on their voyage across the Sea of Galilee and their astonishment at his coming to them on the water. Perhaps the most impressive feature of this account is the attempt of Peter to duplicate the act of Jesus, and his failure, which the Master charged to lack of faith. The eleventh lessons tells the story of the Syro-Phoenician mother who begged of Jesus the cure of her daughter afflicted with an evil spirit. The Master refused at first to listen to her, but later because of her urgent persistence he not only healed the child but gave the mother his warmest commendations because of her unwearied importunity.

Three Parable Studies.

The fourth section of the lesson is occupied with a series of three parable studies. The first, number twelve in the list of lessons, deals with the familiar story of the seed and soils, generally known as the parable of the sower. The second, number thirteen, is devoted to the lesson of the tares, which the householder commanded to be left and gathered at the last with the grain. These two lessons were carefully explained by Jesus to the disciples as the basis for all his parable work. He wanted them to have minds so filled with the lessons of the kingdom that they could bring out, like well furnished householders, things new and old from their store. The last lesson, the fourteenth of the series, but really number one in the new quarter, presents five short pictures of different phases of the kingdom: the mustard seed and the leaven illustrating its growth and its pervasive power; the treasure hidden in the field and the pearl of great price illustrating the value of the new life; and the fifth, the net, which is perhaps to be joined in thought with the parable of the tares illustrating the diverse nature of those who constitute the members of the social order in which the kingdom must make its effects felt.

The Note of Suffering.

In these fourteen lessons we have nearly every phase of Jesus' public work illustrated. To be sure there is nothing here of his own suffering for the cause he came to establish. It was not yet time for that element to enter more than slightly into his life. But the arrest and death of John, the growing hatred of the Jewish authorities toward Jesus, and the deepening severity of his utterances regarding them are the proofs that the second great period of his public work, that of popularity, was drawing to its close, and that the opposition against him was now becoming sufficiently formidable to shadow his path with the sinister figure of the cross.

A True Friend

Oh, who will walk a mile with me
  Along life's merry way?
A comrade blithe and full of glee,
Who dares to laugh out loud and free,
  And let his frolic fancy play,
  Like a happy child, through the flowers gay,
  That fill the field and fringe the way,
Where he walks a mile with me.

And who will walk a mile with me
  Along life's weary way?
A friend whose heart has eyes to see
The stars shine out o'er darkening lea,
  And the quiet rest at the end of the day;
  A friend who knows, and dares to say,
  The brave, sweet words that cheer the way,
Where he walks a mile with me.
With such a comrade, such a friend,
I fain would walk till journey's end,
Through summer sunshine, winter rain;
And then? Farewell! We shall meet again!

—Henry Van Dyke.

The amount that Richard Parr will receive for his success in uncovering the sugar trust frauds will be $100,000, instead of $1,000,000 as at first reported. Secretary of the Treasury MacVeagh has decided on this figure after the cabinet meeting had discussed the matter. Parr will share this sum with no one, having no fees, discounts, drawbacks or rakeoffs to distribute.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES

THE MODEL CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR SOCIETY.

Topic July 10: I. Cor. 12:4-27.

The Model Christian Endeavor Society is true to the spirit of its motto: "For Christ and the Church." This motto together with the scripture gives us at once the ideal and the program of every Christian Endeavor Society. The motive which gave birth to the Christian Endeavor Society was the holding and the saving of the young people. The lives of the young people were the object. The only sure way, of course, is in Jesus Christ. He is the Master of all life. He alone knows what all life needs and is able to supply us with that need. The Endeavor stands for the church because it is in the church that the ideals of Christ can best be realized in life.

The Endeavor Society then may be called the young people's department of the church in a very true sense. Here they plan their work in a way best suited to the spirit of the young, though always within the spirit of the Christ purpose and in conjunction with the spirit and harmony of the other work of the church. That is to say its work is coöperative. The Endeavor Society like every other society which has for its aim the development of the individual, recognizes the difference in personalities, duties and privileges for each which are all in line with the one spirit—the spirit and purpose of Jesus Christ.

With this great ideal before it the model Endeavor proceeds to its work through its various departments of activity. The Prayer Meeting Committee plans to make just the best possible devotional hour for the members. They will see to it that there is a leader. They will be ready with a substitute in case he should fail. They will see that all have an opportunity to lead. That he will have sufficient helps and equipment. The work of this committee is of the highest importance. In a very true sense the grade of the work done in all the rest of the society will depend on this.

Then there is the work of the social committee. What a vast field and how important. There never have been so many places of amusement in the whole world as there are now. Perhaps there never was so much need for them as now. And when we stop to consider the questionable character of so many of them from a moral point of view and the consequent need of just the right kind the opportunity for the social committee becomes boundless. Did space allow it would be easy to enlarge upon the scope and work of each one of the standing committees.

The model Endeavor will also study conditions of the community in which it lives and seek to render any service possible. It might be the means of affecting certain reforms, such as eradicating boisterous amusements on the Lord's Day, and immoral amusements entirely. It might relieve distress of some particular kind, etc. The great object then of the model society is not to see how big it can grow, but to see how much good it can do, and if it renders a real service it cannot help but grow. But in all its doing it will always work in strict harmony with the church and the Christian spirit.

Miss Webster

and Margaret's time was more occupied than ever. With her mother and aunt she helped prepare for a splendid celebration, that was to crowd together all tne missing five holidays when they were separated, and all was excitement and bustle in the big house. Telephone calls, notes, mysterious parcels and shopping tours made anything like a settled life impossible, and Margaret rather rejoiced that Judge Kirke did not write nor send flowers those busy days preceding the twenty-fifth.

"Well, I certainly got more than my share of gifts," said Margaret looking at the heap of things on her dressing table after the festivities had subsided a little and there was time to sit down quietly. "Some of these things are exquisite, and like them all. All but this," she added as she frowned at a diamond ring from which she had hastily snatched the card when it came in on Christmas eve. "Just as soon as Judge Kirke gets home I shall send it back to him, and tell him plainly what I think of such a gift. Of course I have known him all my life, but never intimately, and I think it is very presumptious to send a valuable thing like that. I suppose he thinks because I accepted that first box of roses that must have cost twenty-five dollars at the very least, he could send a ring. I'm tired of his ponderous conversation, anyway. O dear, why did I ever encourage him?"

"I'll just run up to Margaret's room," said a gay voice from below. "I haven't seen her gifts and this will be a good chance. It is storming like everything, and no one else will call."

Margaret hastily twisted the ring from her finger, and dropped it into a drawer as Julie Ross ran lightly up the stairs. "How do you do? Have you had a chance to get a long breath since Christmas? What a stack of pretty things! It's worth being away a few years to get such a display as this. You fortunate girl! Here are things fine enough for a princess!" Julie was devouring the pretty things with her eyes as she threw off her wraps, and Margaret hoped her cheeks were not too scarlet.

"Are these all?" asked Julie in mock surprise when everything had been duly admired and commented on.

"Aren't they enough?" asked Margaret thinking of the sparkling ring in the drawer.

"Well, I supposed of course Uncle Morris would send you something," said Julie archly. "He has been so devoted and——"

"Uncle Morris!" cried Margaret in surprise. "I have no Uncle Morris."

"Well, you will have very soon if all reports are true," laughed Julie. "Come now, Margaret! Don't appear so innocent!"

"I really haven't the faintest idea what you are talking about," said Margaret thinking her friend must be crazy.

"Margaret!" said the young lady reproachfully. "If you think I am curious or prying, say so, but don't think it necessary to tell an untruth. I beg your pardon, but everyone says your aunt is to marry Judge Kirke as soon as she is out of mourning, and I didn't think it would offend you to mention it. I am sorry I said anything," she added hastily, as a pallor crept over Margaret's face. "Please forgive me and forget it."

"Aunt Eleanor!" gasped Margaret clutching her friend's skirts as her voice dropped to a whisper. "Aunt Eleanor is—is—she's nearly thirty years old, I think."

"Well, the judge is thirty-five or along there. Everyone thinks it a fine match."

"Julie! Julie!" wailed Margaret falling down before her friend to sob wildly in her lap. "Julie! I've done such a dreadful thing!"

It was a long time before the frightened Julie could get anything lucid from the incoherent sentences and lamentations poor Margaret poured forth, but in time she grew calmer. "Now don't take it to heart so," said Julie comfortably stroking her hair and wiping away the tears. "It all comes of being the only one in the house, the only child, I mean. I started out like that when I got home from college, and the boys took me down instantly. I tell you Margaret, it's a fine thing to have a big family. It saves a lot of trouble."

"But what am I to do?" wailed Margaret afresh. "I have no brothers and sisters to keep me from making a simpleton of myself. What would you do, Julie?"

"I'd call in my mother and aunt this very minute and make a clean breast of it," said Julie. "They'll forgive you. Never fear! Mothers can forgive anything, and so can aunts—particularly when the aunts are in love," she added.

Margaret was no coward, but it took a great deal of effort to tell her story when Mrs. Webster and Miss Webster came in great surprise in answer to the young lady's tearful summons. "You poor dear!" said Miss Webster throwing her arms about the weeping girl. "Don't you cry a bit. Nobody will ever tell, and it's a very natural mistake."

"What a selfish pig I was!' said Margaret after she had been kissed and comforted. "I want you both to pick out everything that belongs to you right away, and I'll get you some flowers out of my allowance to pay up for all I've stolen. Yes, I will, too. I am so ashamed of myself."

"That pin with the ruby Uncle John sent me," said Mrs. Webster. "I had a letter from him today. He directed the package to Maggie Webster."

"And the pin cushion with the hearts and true lovers' knots, is mine," said Miss Webster with a blush. "Cousin Mattie sent it."

When the two ladies had picked out their possessions, there was still another array of pretty things left for Margaret. "No one will ever know," Miss Webster kept saying soothingly. "We will never tell."

"I intend to tell Judge Kirke the very first time I see him," said Margaret firmly. "I'm going to confess the depths of my iniquity, and no one can stop me."

But when Judge Kirke heard the confession he gallantly shifted the blame to the jeweler who delivered the box with the ring. "I wrote the address myself to be sure your aunt would get it," he said, "but in the Christmas rush he probably overlooked it and made the mistake."

"It wasn't his fault at all," contradicted Margaret flatly. "It was all mine for thinking myself the only person in the house. I appropriated mamma's and Aunt Eleanor's attentions and gifts recklessly, but I never will again. Henceforth and forever, I am content to be Margaret Webster!"

"Not forever," corrected Judge Kirke, holding up the slender hand on which glowed his diamond ring. "After February you will be Miss Webster, and from various reports that come to my ears you may not stick to that name for ——"

But Margaret with crimson cheeks had fled from the room and the closing of the door cut off the sentence abruptly.

A census enumerator in Passaic, N. J., has found a single house which is the home of 350 men, 45 of them occupying three rooms. The men constitute a day shift and a night shift, so that the beds are occupied all the time.

Church Life

—It is summer in Chicago.

—Dr. and Mrs. Herbert L. Willett are expected to return from their western trip next week.

—Some reports from the colleges which reached us too late for publication last week are included in this issue.

—The National Convention—read about it in this number of the Christian Century. It is none too early to plan for attending.

—The article by Mr. Ewers, editor of "Our Church Men," was published by "The Spectator," a magazine of Pittsburg.

—During July the Christian Century will publish a special book number. Look to it for a review of the best books that have been published in recent months.

—A sane Fourth—this is the cry heard from every quarter. Chicago is aggressively pursuing the ideal, and will present in a street parade the scenes associated with the signing of the Declaration of Independence.

—A number of our preachers and teachers are studying at the University of Chicago this summer, and despite the warm weather they are making good use of the time for better equipping themselves for work, and incidentally enjoying a vacation in the change of environment and work. The summer school at the great university grows in favor with the most earnest men of the school and church.

—It is of greatest interest to note the present wide spread interest in scientific religious education. Summer conferences are being held for the purpose of teaching teachers. Men with thorough equipment are greatly in demand for public addresses and institutes, even in the state universities. The graded lessons which are being so rapidly introduced into our best schools are opening the minds of workers to the possibilities that lie before the Sunday school.

E. L. Powell, popular pastor of the church in Lexington, will spend some time abroad this summer.

The church at Colfax, Ill., observed children's day June 12. The offering was $118.36. Attendance at Sunday school, 314. N. H. Robertson is the pastor of this church.

The brotherhood Sunday class of the First Church, Massillon, Ohio, is in a contest with the brotherhood class of the First Church, Toledo.

J. S. Hughes, Macatawa Park, is prepared to make engagements for fall and winter lecture courses on John's gospel and the revelation.

The First Church, Portland, Oregon, has merged its morning service and the Sunday school meeting. If the trial proves satisfactory they will permanently adopt the plan.

The Northern California Convention will be held at Santa Cruz, July 12 to 24. Dr. H. O. Breeden is announced for a series of sermons and lectures.

W. B. Craig, pastor of the Lenox Ave. Church, New York, is spending the summer in Colorado. The pulpit at Lenox Ave. is being supplied Sunday mornings by W. C. Bower. There is no evening service.

The New York state convention meets at Rochester, June 28 to July 1. In Rochester we have two churches: the First, of which Robert Stewart is minister, and Columbia Ave., to which C. C. Crawford ministers.

The Scoville campaign continues in Spokane, There have been 679 additions here since the meeting began. The new church, organized two weeks previously, has built a tabernacle which was dedicated the last Sunday in June.

Arthur Holmes gave an address in the First Church, Lincoln, Nebr., having as his subject, "What Shall the Church Do with Her Men?" The address was before a large body of the men of the church and the community at a banquet.

Any church in the west or northwest desiring the services of an earnest and capable young unmarried minister of several years' experience able to pay $1200 will do well to correspond with "Christian Minister," Box 277, Clarence, Mo.

Nelson H. Trimble, the new pastor of the church at Gary, Ind., is getting hold of things with his accustomed aggressiveness. He has put out an announcement to the people of the city which will be sure to get him a hearing and bring the church before the community in a good way.

A. P. Findley, who has for the past year been teacher in the Disciples' Bible Chair in Drury College, Springfield, Mo., is spending the summer in study in the University of Chicago. Mr. Findley is available for supply work. Churches near Chicago would do well to call upon him for such service.

The Central Ohio Ministerial Association will meet in Cincinnati, July 11. In the forenoon there will be a review of Professor Rauschenbusch's "Christianity and the Social Crisis," by W. S. Cook of Nelsonville. In the afternoon, W. W. Wilson of Belle Fontaine will speak on "Socialism and Christianity."

The children's day offering of the First Church, Wellsville, Ohio, was $90.10. The service given by the children was beautiful, and rendered before a crowded house. This Sunday school is now numbered among the "Front Rank" schools. C. L. Morrison is minister of the church.

The last Sunday in June the First Church, Tacoma, Wash., celebrated the second anniversary of the dedication of their new church with appropriate services. On the same day the new church at South Tacoma was dedicated. It is wonderful how the churches are multiplying in these western cities. W. A. Moore is pastor of the First Church.

J. C. Todd, pastor of the Kirkwood Ave. Church, Bloomington, Ind., recently addressed the brotherhood of the church at New Bedford, Ind., on "Sense and Nonsense in Church Work." The Kirkwood Ave. Church is closely in touch with the life of the university at Bloomington, and many of its members this year graduated from that institution. Mr. Todd honored the occasion with a sermon on "Winning Power through a Noble Purpose."

F. W. Emerson has become secretary of Southern California, succeeding R. P. Shepherd. Mr. Emerson was formerly pastor of the First Church, Topeka, Kansas. Then for five years he served the International Reform Bureau as lecturer and organizer in the interest of civic rghteousnessi. Then came his pastorate at Freeport, Ill., from whence he went to California, where he held a successful pastorate with the Redlands Church.

At the annual meeting on June 14, the Disciples' Missionary Union of Greater New York elected the following officers for the coming year: President, A. S. Vance, Brooklyn; vice president, Dr. W. Bayard Craig, Manhattan; secretary, C. B. Drake, Brooklyn; treasurer, L. Preston Gates, Manhattan; trustees, W. H. Olmsted, L. Preston Gates and H. E. Davisson.

The committee to report to the next state convention of Illinois as to the advisability of aiding the church at Champaign in placing a Bible chair at the University of Illinois, consisting of O. W. Lawrence, J. Will Walters and J. H. Gilliland, have been at work upon the problem, visiting the field and studying conditions at the university preparatory to making their report at the coming state convention.

A recent issue of the Muskegon (Mich.) Daily Chronicle contained a picture of the pastor of the Christian church and the following "write up": "Rev. A. R. Adams' Sunday evening sermons at the Forest Ave. Christian Church, 'the little church on the corner,' are attracting widespread attention. Mr. Adams is absolutely fearless in his denunciation of evil and is considered a fine pulpit orator."

Granville Snell, who is assisting in a meeting at Bosworth, Mo., says that during the third week everything was moving encouragingly. There had been twelve additions in the last two days. A men's bible class was to be organized the following Sunday. The offerings for missions from the district will double those of last year. F. W. Condit is pastor at Bosworth, and Mr. Snell says deservedly popular in the community.

The Minnesota State Convention met in Rochester June 13 to 17. The officers elected for the coming years are: A. D. Harmon, St. Paul, president; M. R. Waters, Minneapolis, vice president; Charles Oliver, Minneapolis, treasurer; L. W. Porter, Minneapolis, Christian Endeavor superintendent; C. B. Osgood, Minneapolis, superintendent of Sunday schools. Mrs. Charles Oliver was elected president of the C. W. B. M., with Mrs. J. T. Ingersoll of St. Paul vice president, and Miss Florence Pierce of Minneapolis secretary.

Walter E. Harman, minister at Mitchellville, Ia., for three years, has just been graduated from Drake University with the degrees of A. B. and B. D. During his ministry at Mitchellville, while he was in school, the work has steadily grown; a new building has been erected and paid for, the Bible school has doubled in attendance, and all missionary offerings increased. Mr. Harman preaches to as many people as all other preachers in the town combined. He has not definitely decided where he will locate.

The returns from children's day for the first twenty-two days of June amount to $34,305.58, a gain over the same time last year of $10,504.79. This is the greatest gain from this source for the corresponding time in the history of the Foreign Society. There was also a gain of 163 contributing schools. Hats off, please, to the children. Every school in line now and insure the $100,000 from the children alone. The total receipts for twenty-two days of June were $46,809.38, a gain of $8,574.40. Fine! The total gain from October 1, 1909 to June 22 is $31,901.40 All together for $400,000 by September 30. If we can gain $17,414 between this and September 30 we will reach the $400,000.

B. H. Sealock, pastor of the church at Petersburg, Ill., tells us that there were 113 delegates present at the fifth district convention, and most of these were on time for the C. W. B. M. session. Of the 132 churches in the district only about sixty had taken the offering, yet there was about $400 remaining in the treasury, according to the report of O. C. Bolman. District Evangelist C. W. Ross held nine meetings during the eight and one-half months since his employment. The Petersburg church is in its new building and provided a fine place for the meetings of the convention.

The Sunday schools at Galesburg and Quincy, Ill., are in a spirited contest for the attendance and increase in membership.

Dr. Herbert Martin, Professor of Logic in Teacher's College, New York, and Mrs. Martin sail for Italy, Switzerland etc., June 30. The Christain Century wishes them "Bon voyage."

B. F. Cato has resigned at Beaumont, Texas, closing his work there June 19, and returning to his old home at Albany, Ind. The church has not yet chosen his successor, but it is stated that the choice will likely fall either to N. E. Ewell of Durant, Okla., or David E. Barr of Covington, Ky.

The church at Audubon, Iowa, burned to the ground Tuesday, July 14. After a struggle of thirty-five years this congregation at last held a good modern property free from debt. Now this is lost with only $2,000 insurance. It is not known how the fire originated but supposedly from the furnace room.

W. J. Minges tells us of the way things are being done in Spokane, Washington, these days. The Scoville Company is operating there with over six hundred professions to date. Just beginning meetings in the North Side Tabernacle which seats 1,700; and "hundreds are turned away each evening. All five churches greatly strengthened and a new church organized."

A letter from Glascow, Scotland, by C. C. Morrison says their party composed of pilgrims to the Missionary Conference, with whom were Mr. and Mrs. Morrison, Dr. and Mrs. Errett Gates, had a "perfectly glorious trip, delightful weather and no one sick." The passengers were able to spend the entire time on deck playing games and enjoying tne fine fellowship.

A. D. Harmon, pastor of the church at Pasadena, Calif., has announced the following interesting series of sermons for Sunday evenings during the latter part of June and July: "The Teaching of Jesus Concerning God, or Show Us the Father"; "The Teaching of Jesus Concerning Man, or Humanity Greater than Institutions"; "The Teaching of Jesus Concerning the Kingdom, or The New Social Order"; "The Teaching of Jesus Concerning Sin, or Crimes Against Criminals"; The Teaching of Jesus Concerning the Attainment of Happiness, or The Life Worth While." Such a series of sermons should have interest and help for the best people of the community, and announced attractively as they are will doubtless attract large and intelligent audiences.

This prayer clipped from the printed Sunday-school service of the Hyde Park Church of the Disciples, Chicago, is sufficiently unconventional to command attention. The service is for the month of June:

"Almighty God, King of kings, and Lord of lords, from whom proceed all power and dominion in heaven and earth: Most heartily we beseech Thee to look with favor upon Thy servants, the President of the United States, the Governor of this State, and all others in authority. Give them the spirit of wisdom, goodness and truth; and so rule their hearts, and bless their endeavors, that law and order, justice and peace may everywhere prevail. Defend our land, we beseech Thee, from the secret power and the open shame of great national sins. From all dishonesty and civic corruption; from all vain and selfish luxury; from all cruelty and the spirit of violence; from covetousness and impurity; and from intemperance, which is the mother of many crimes and sorrows; good Lord, deliver and save us and our children, and our children's children, in the land which Thou hast so richly blessed; through Jesus Christ, our Savior. Amen."

Daniel Protoff, who contributes the article on Tolstoy, the Luther of Russia, was born in Moscow, Russia, 1873. His father was a Chaplain in the Army; most of the Protoff's families are practicing the Priesthood in Balkan and Russia. There are few of them that are generals, professors, judges and consuls.

Mr. Protoff studied in Mascow, Russia; St. Petersburg; Saraevo, Bosnia; Vienna, Austria; Constantinople, Turkey; Belgrade, Servia; and Philadelphia, Pa. He was in the Army both a clerk and officer, in 1891-2. In 1893 he was ordained and afterward sent to Jerusalem as Missionary. In 1899-1902 was a missionary in Jerusalem; wrote a book for the Pilgrims, "How shall we know Him" in 20,000 copies. Was persecuted by the Greek Patriarch, arrested and exiled to Egypt; there he started to work with the Bible Society, and after three years of work there, came to America in 1905, working with the Tract Society at Ellis Island; Boston, Mass. From 1907-8, he worked as an independent Evangelist through the states and in 1908 started to advance his studies in the Theological Seminary in Philadelphia, Pa., and in 1909 was examined and ordained to the ministry.

First District Convention

The First District Convention has come and gone. It was one of the best held in the district for several years. In addition to the program work done by members of the district we had the splendid help of J. H. Gilliland, Bloomington, who delivered a powerful sermon on the subject "Jesus' Grouds for Discouragement." David Shields, also brought a very carefully prepared address on "The Social Message for the Modern Pulpit." H. H. Peters came with his strong appeal for Eureka College Endowment Fund. J. Fred Jones told us how to plant the cause in new fields.

Officers elected for the coming year were as follows:

President—H. W. Stauffer, Dixon.

Vice president—Daniel Burkey, Sterling.

Sec.-Treas—D. F. Seyster, Polo.

Supt.—C. E. Work—E. M. Peterson, New Bedford.

Supt. Bible School Work—Albert Jones, Princeton.

Historical Com.—Perry Stevenson, Dixon; Geo. Potter, Erie; D. F. Seyster, Polo.

Next year's convention will be held with the church at Lanark.

S. Elwood Fisher,

Follow the International Lesson Committee

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine month or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

To Churches of Indiana

Bloomington, Ind., June 8, 1910.

"We, the students of the Christian Church in attendance at Indiana University, feel confident that the time has come for the church to place at the State University at Bloomington a man capable of giving instruction on biblical and religious subjects and having oversight of our students during this important period in their lives. We have from one hundred and seventy-five to three hundred Christian church students here all the time, and they come from eighty to one hundred and fifty churches in the state. We believe a work should be established along the lines of the Bible Chair work being done at other universities. Indiana University is favorable to such an institution and we have promises that courses of university standards would be given credit for toward graduation. We therefore petition the Christian Church in the state of Indiana to establish such a work and pledge our support in every possible way.

Passed at a meeting of the Christian Church students, June 8, 1910. President Bryan, Prof. E. H. Lindley, Mr. John Voris, secretary of Y. M. C. A., and Hon. Ira C. Batman, of the University trustees, were present and spoke in favor of the action.

Respectfully submitted,

Adam A. Leonard,

Secretary of the Meeting.

The Topeka Convention

The Convention Chairman.

James W. Going, who is chairman of the Convention Committee at Topeka, was born in the State of Missouri in 1862 and was educated at the Unversity of Kansas. In 1884 he was married to Miss Georgia Goodwin, of Salina. Miss Goodwin was a grand-daughter of Elijah Goodwin, and it will be seen that the preaching blood of the pioneers is strong in the family. Her father, A. D. Goodwin, came in 1870 from Indiana to Kansas and located at Manhattan. During the early days of the state he preached at St. George, Ellsworth and Salina, and had much to do in establishing the cause in Kansas. James W. Going is essentially a business man, but because of his versatility and the wide scope of his thinking could have attained the same success in many other lines of work. In 1893 he organized and founded the Shawnee Fire Insurance Company, said to be the largest institution of that nature in all the West, and is at the present time its vice-president and manager. The citizens of Topeka have honored him with varied positions of trust and confidence. He is at present president of the State Fair Association, and was to a great degree instrumental in making possible for the city the great pipe-organ which was placed in the City Auditorium, as president of the Pipe-organ Association. Brother Going is a man of growing vision. He is very liberal as a giver to the work at home and abroad, and is coming to be depended on more and more as a leader in the affairs of the church and Topeka. It is safe to say that, in placing the direction of the convention in his hands, everything that can be done to make our guests feel the hosptality of our citizens will be accomplished.

A word might be said concerning the great pipe-organ. One of the attractions of the middle west is the monster organ which was placed in the Auditorium of Topeka a number of years ago. No expense was spared in securing the best in modern organ construction that was available. The result is one of the four largest concert organs in the United States. It has five manuels, including the pedaled keyboard, about sixty speaking stops and forty-five hundred pipes. Many tourists and travelers are attracted to Topeka to see and hear this wonderful instrument, and a very conservative estimate shows over one hundred thousand people have listened to the great rogan within the last five years. During the convention the main place of meeting will be at the Auditorium, where this magnificent instrument will be placed at the disposal of the committee in charge of entertaining delegates.

J. W. Going, Chairman Convention Committee, Topeka, 1910.

CHARLES A. FINCH, Sec'y.

First Illinois District Convention, Dixon, June 15-17

It seems strange in, that the beautiful city of Dixon, Ill., one of the most enterprising of its size in the state, that only fifteen years ago we had only a few hungry Disciples and now they command the respect of the whole city, and led by that princely man, S. E. Fisher.

It was in this city that we met and we shall never forget the kind, courteous treatment of the brethren and sisters. The entertainment at the church and in their homes was just splendid and long will we remember the royal reception given us.

After the usual routine of business some splendid papers were read and the address by W. B. Clemmer of Rockford, closed the afternoon session with hearts tingling with a new devotion and a new zeal for the Master's kingdom.

The evening address by Mrs. Zellers, "The Power Within Us," was beautiful in thought and wonderful in spiritual food.

On Thursday morning the services opened with Brother Ross of Walnut presiding. After the usual committees were appointed the Men's Movement and Sunday-school were taken up. Here we had some splendid treats. Brother Parvin of Sterling, Brother Woodman of Polo and Brother Martin of Lanark, along with Brother DePew's splendid address, interspersed with splendid discussions, made the morning hour one long to be remembered.

The afternoon hour had a rare treat from David Shields of Eureka. In the evening J. H. Gilliland of Bloomington, preached just one of his little sermons—so little that it found its way to all hearts, entering every corner and crevice of all lives, lifting us to a higher plane of Christian duty.

On Friday morning district work proper was taken up. Reports from various churches from the district secretary, D. F. Scyster of Polo, and a reminiscence of Ogle and Lee counties, by Brother Johnson. Then as a climax H. H. Peters for Eureka College closed the morning services.

The Hub of the Empire State

All eyes are now turned to Rochester, where from the 28th of June till the 1st of July the annual convention of the churches of this state will be held. The program is a very strong one and contains, besides many of our prominent brethren, several speakers from other communions. Our national societies will be represented by Brethren S. J. Corey, George W. Muckley, Oliver W. Stewart and the C. W. B. M. by Miss Florence Miller of Kentucky. William Bayard Craig, now pastor of the Lenox Avenue Church, New York City, will deliver a series of devotional addresses throughout the convention. The two Rochester churches, under the untiring leadership of their pastors, Robert Stewart and C. C. Crawford, are doing everything possible to insure a good time for all who attend.

The convention number of the Messenger, the official organ of the New York Christian C. R. Stauffer is just out and is o Brother C. R. Stauffer is just out and is a gem. Aside from much information, germaine to the coming convention it contains lots of newsy items from the churches of the state.

We regret that Cecil J. Armstrong has felt it necessary to sever pastoral relations with the River Street Church of Christ, Troy. In his letter of resignation, printed in the Troy Record of June 6, he says: "Upon the fundamentals of Christianity we are in perfect accord. I believe in the Fatherhood of God, the divinity of Jesus Christ, the Holy Spirit as God operative in the affairs of men, the Brotherhood of man, and that the Bible contains a unique revelation of God to man. . . . . Upon other matters, however, we differ. I am no longer in accord with you upon the subject of baptism, the means of bringing Christian unity to pass, and the value of higher criticism. I feel that upon these matters we differ irreconciliably. . . . . Inasmuch as my own plans for the future are unformed, I can make no announcement as to them. For some years now the claims of social settlement work have received considerable study and thought from me. At this time, however, I can simply make no statement as to what line of activity I shall engage in the days to come. . . . . In order that you may have time to find a suitable pastor and I may have time to readjust myself to the change necessitated by this step, I will, with your consent, fix December 31, next, as the date upon which our present relationship will be dissolved."

O. G. Hertzog is preaching at Brewerton during the summer, and under his supervision extensive improvements are being made in the church building. The plans call for improvements that will cost $1,000.

The church at Throopsville has broken ground for its new parsonage to be built on the lot immediately adjoining the church.

After the longest pastorate in the history of this state, and that in the country's metropolis, S. T. Willis of the 169th Street Church has resigned to accept the Bible chair in Virginia.

E. F. Randall leaves the Tonawanda church, after his second pastorate with this people to engage in the insurance business in Erie, Pa.

The annual meeting of the trustees of Keuka College was held at the college on the 14th, and Dr. R. E. Belding was added to the Disciples now on the board. Brother Braden was re-elected president. The year just closed has been one of decided gains in students enrolled, an increase of over 40 per cent over last year. Finapcially the college had many problems to contend with and in consequence the record is not as good as hoped for. No large gifts have been made by the Disciples this year. Ball Brothers of Muncie, Ind., nephews of Dr. Ball, the founder, have stood nobly by, matching dollar for dollar all the money raised. This offer has been of help in raising money this year. Mr. Frank Ball was present at the meeting and agreed to give $5,000 on the same conditions next year. With such a liberal offer it ought not to be difficult to raise the money for current expenses, besides making considerable gain in the endowment campaign.

The baccalaureate sermon will be preached by Robert Stewart of Rochester, and the commencement address delivered by President Arthur Braden.

During the summer months the college building will be opened as a summer hotel, and to any who desire a healthful restful place to spend the vacation period I would call attention to Keuka. The spot on which the college stands is one of the most beautiful in the country. Stretching out for miles is the lake, one of the finest of the many New York lakes. It is thirty miles long, one-half to two miles wide, traversed by several lines of steamers, all of which stop at the college dock. Its waters abound with fish, and afford excellent boating and bathing. Rooms and board are furnished in the building at one-half the cost of the regular hotels on the lake, and an excellent library of 8,000 volumes is open for use of guests. It affords an ideal place for a summer outing. Write to the secretary for further information.

A Great Achievement

The Erection and Dedication of a Church at Carthage, Mo.

By D. W. Moore.

The origin, progress, experiences, and history of the Disciples of Christ in Carthage but repeats that of many growing communities in the middle West. The church was organized about 1866. Though small at first it has had a continued existence from that date to the present time. Those faithful few builded better than they knew. The loss of all records makes very meager any definite knowledge of the early history. Like many others, it was a time of frequent change. This was also a time of trials and triumphs. This period ended "when, on Lord's Day, September 21, 1894, the congregation moved into its new house of worship at the corner of Main and Chestnut streets. This was a brick structure, with basement rooms, costing some $15,000; and was considered ample provision for the times. Rev. N. M. Ragland was the godly and capable pastor. He preached the opening sermon, and ministered to this people for three years. For twenty-four years the congregation continued to work and worship in this building. Soon, the growth of the congregation made a better and larger plant necessary.

The First Step.

At the regular board meeting of the church, June 7, 1908, a committee was appointed to consider and recommend to the church what action should be taken.

July 12, Lord's Day, was designated as the time when we should publicly call for pledges for the new building. The membership was present in full force. The pastor, D. W. Moore, preached a short sermon, appropriate to the occasion; and then called for pledges. Amid tears, and the clapping of hands it was soon announced that nearly $13,000 had been raised. This, with the $2,000 cash in bank made the enterprise an assured success.

A building and a finance committee had been previously appointed. Steps were at once taken to clear away the old building, preparatory to the erection of the new. A temporary meeting place was secured in the K. of P. hall. On September 20, 1908, just twenty-four years from the time of the first service, the pastor preached the farewell sermon in the old house.

On March 17, of the following spring, the first stone was laid in the building. On the 25th of the following May the cornerstone was laid, with Masonic ceremonies; while thousands of the people of Carthage and surrounding country witnessed the impressive scene.

Plan of Building.

The building has three floors, basement, upstairs, and gallery. In the basement are to be found kitchen, dining-room, banqueting room, parlor, cloak-room, and other conveniences, with heating plant and fuel room. On the main floor is the large auditorium, with galleries above, seating more than 600 people. To this may be added some 150 chairs, when occasion demands. On the south, and arranged to be opened into the main auditorium, is the Bible-school chapel, with its class-rooms. This, when fully opened, adds some 300 to the seating capacity, in one great auditorium. To this, also, one hundred or more chairs may be added. Thus an audience of from 1,000 to 1,200 people may be seated in easy hearing of the speaker. Sixteen class-rooms accommodate a large body of pupils. Four of these are large and airy, suited to primary, and adult class work.

Just back of the pulpit platform, and always open, is the baptistry. Back of this the robing rooms, and the superintendent's office. A $3,000 pipe organ is being installed, at this writing. The building is lighted throughout with gas and electricity, and has an up-to-date steam heating plant. The building and grounds represent an expenditure of $50,000. The architectural design is most beautiful. Indeed the building is the admiration of Carthage. The effect within is equally pleasing and satisfactory to all.

Dedication.

One year and four days from the time of the placing of the cornerstone finds us ready to dedicate the building. Slowly the walls have gone up; patiently the church has waited, prayed and hoped. Dr. H. O. Breeden and his singers, Prof. W. F. Lintt, chorus leader, and Mr. G. P. Lintt, soloist, are on the ground. These men are tireless workers, wise in their methods, and unsparing of patient and painstaking toil. The Lintt brothers work admirably together in their service of song; and inspire the great audiences that attend, to uplifting praise. One could but be impressed that the music was to be felt as well as to be heard.

Dr. Breeden needs no word of praise from me, and yet I will be suffered a few words. His strong personality, dignified bearing, and splendid voice give him easy access to the ears and hearts of all thinking people. His wide reading and gleanings from the best of literature, his wonderful fund of Bible knowledge, his rich experience in a long and successful pastorate in one of our great educational centers, his practical knowledge of human nature, his soul culture, and his love of and sympathy for humanity; all combine to make his work wonderfully satisfactory and helpful, and to at once attract to the meetings the most cultured people of the city. This was especially noticeable here. People of all the churches, and of no church; people who are not attendants upon religious services came constantly to hear his message.

The Evangelistic Meeting.

Everything connected with the meeting is on the same high plane. Nothing sensational is allowed, nor does it seem to be in place.

Request for literature, speaker and contributions should be sent to the secretary. Offering requested from each church the most convenient Lord's day of each year.

The singing is worshipful, devout. The preaching is plain, practical, serious, sane, reaching both the head and the heart. The appeals are on a lofty plane, wonderfully forceful at times; and always addressed to the highest motives.

The audiences were large from the very first. There were additions at almost every service. A very great majority of these were adults, and are already beginning to be helpful in the work of the church. Of the 143 who came in response to the invitations, a number of new families are included. Thus our homes and increased, and we are greatly strengthened in our work. The meeting has been ideal, and I do not see how it could be greatly improved. I heartily enjoyed every hour of it.

It is not difficult to forecast the result of a dedicatory service, in the light of the foregoing. The task was an immense one. Only a leader and a people capable of measuring up to large things could hope to succeed. Sacrifice and heroism were the words to which the occasion was keyed. $30,000 was the amount to be provided for.

"Will they do it? Dare they do it?
Who is speaking? What's the news?"

Burden Lifted.

The Lord's Day, May 29, dawned bright and clear. The clouds that lowered so long, had lifted; token of the burdens that should be lifted from His people, that day. Early the people were finding their way to the church house, with the faith that, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me." The Bible-school hour was made to contribute to the coming struggle. After a short, pointed, and appropriate sermon by Dr. H. O. Breeden, followed by an explanation of the plan, as previously outlined at a preparatory meeting of the church, the appeal was made for $30,000 in thirty minutes. Previous to this, a partial preliminary canvass of the city, outside the church, had been made. In a short while it was announced that the peldges had gone up to $20.000. At this juncture, a consultation was held by Dr. Breeden and the finance committee, after which the finance committee announced to the congregation their willingness to assume the responsibility of raising the last $10,000. This closed the appeals for money; and, amid great rejoicing the building was dedicated to the worship of the Lord.

The fellowship service, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, was a most happy occasion, participated in by representatives of most of the churches of the city, and by visiting pastors from surrounding churches.

A great concourse of people filled every corner of the spacious structure, in the evening evangelistic service, and many were turned away. Thus closed one of the greatest and happiest events in the history of our Carthage people, and in the history of the southwest Missouri work. The meetings closed on Wednesday evening with a lecture-recital.

Nor has the pastor been forgotten in all these busy and burdensome experiences. A rest has been urged upon him, he has been made a delegate to the state convention, with all expenses paid, and his salary increased $300 for the coming year. Our people are happy and hopeful. Their faces are to the future, and their confidence is in Him. To Him be praise and glory evermore. Amen.

"I feel the earth move sunward,
I join the great march onward;
And take with joy while living,
My freehold of thanksgiving."

A Letter to Chicago Disciples

BY DR. ROYAL J. DYE.

Dear Friends of Chicago:—The days go swiftly with us here, so much to do and so few to do it. There hardly seems time to get in all one needs to do saying nothing of the things ont desires to do. Since last writing to you, we have had the great joy of baptizing 36 more at Bolenge. This was last Wednesdy, April 6. It had been a week of great meetings. Our devoted Evangelists to the wild back villages had come in with their crowd of interested and anxious enquirers, and their reports were an inspiration to us all. They called us to greater effort than ever before. People who had been indifferent to the messages in previous days were welcoming it now and begging for their teachers. Their followers were intelligent and anxious to learn more. Day after day they gathered on the verandas and at the church for meetings and when questioned upon the reasons for their coming and for their desire for teaching they gave answers that I doubt if many among the recent converts at home could equal. It was very gratifying. The day of the Baptisims there were five meetings and the Sunday before and after there were as many. Maybe that was not getting religion. During the stay of the Evangelists they were not contented with having been preaching all the time while away but they all scattered through the immediate villages of our neighborhood during their spare time and preached to the Natives, besides attending two services a day for their own special instruction. Sunday was a great climax service. Then the newly baptized converts partook for the first time of the Lord's table. It is always a solemn event with us here. Our English Baptist Brethren who have it but once a month say that our service means much more to them than their own. It certainly means much here. If for discipline, one has been set aside from the Table of His Memory, they are most solicitous for the privilege of return. You will see on some occasions a hush and awe over the assembled congregation that fills you with holy thoughts of the meaning of the redemptive sacrifice of our Lord for the whole world.

Monday was a busy day preparing for the return of the Evangelists to their several fields. The "Brotherhood Volunteer" service was observed and two more fine fellows offered themselves for the service of the Lord whom they had learned to love in telling of that love to the regions beyond.

During these meetings there came a letter from the Governor General at Boma declaring that "Lotumbe," the new station desired for the Californians had been granted subject to the Royal Decree and Signature. We are not the least bit anxious about the latter, for the present King Albert when he was Crown Prince, visited Bolenge and made many flattering remarks about the work he saw there, to the United States Consul General at the Consular reception held for him afterwards.

Dr. Jaggard of Longa came down to Bolenge to consult with me over the case of one of the best of the men of the Bolenge Church who was injured recently by the explosion of an old percussion cap gun. We at once held a meeting of the entire Field Committee and discussed the name of the ones to go to "Lotumbe" and pioneer the new station there. The opinion was unanimous that Brother and Sister Smith, the good people whom you dear friends of Chicago sent out with me this last time, were the best qualified and situated to go to that important and strategic New Station. You were planning larger than you knew when you sent them. Their coming then has prepared them in the language and experience to learn the methods of work and ways of the people so that they can now go to that fine section and break to them the bread of life. The native evangelists have prepared the way for their coming, under the active and wise supervision of Dr. Jaggard, and a church will be ready for them of over 40 members as a neucleus for their larger work.

Lotumbe is in the heart of a most populous district. The officer of the state there has on his tax list over 75,000 people. This makes at least a population of the immediate section within two days' march, of 150,000, while reaching beyond them far up the river lie sevevral other larger sections of population adjacent to Lotumbe and dependent upon them for their knowledge of salvation. How easy it is for you to read that these millions are dying without even the knowledge of the Savour's Name! But how awful the import of this to them! Have you read recently, Ezekiel 3: 6-10? These dying millions are brethren of yours, the brotherhood of "need" as taught by Christ in the lesson of the Good Samaritan. "Lotumbe" must have a doctor at once. An enormous practice is open to him and he need not fear competition, his nearest conferee will be Dr. Jaggard and he will be 100 miles away. Dr. Jaggard is going up there in a week to open up the situation and secure workmen and such for Brother Smith, then I am to be released by the Bolenge workers to go and stay for a month helping Brother and Sister Smith settle themselves in their work. How I would enjoy staying there and doing the work of pioneering a new station. Brethren why not send the doctor who shall join Brother and Sister Smith in founding this new center of gospel light and do for you a mighty work. Do not disappoint us, Brethren. These are days of greater things for the Kingdom and you will want to have your share here.

Chicago and Englewood are dearer to me than ever, and so we look to you.

With much prayer and in full assurance of your joyous fellowship, I am,

Yours in His glad service for Africa's redemption. Royal J. Dye, M. D.

HIRAM COLLEGE

A college of high rank, favorably located for undergraduate study and devoted to the Christian education of young men and women.

SOME ADVANTAGES OF HIRAM COLLEGE.

I. High Educational Standards.

Hiram meets the requirements of the highest educational authorities, such as the National Education Association and the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching. The best universities east and west recognize Hiram's work at its face value. Standard four-year courses, following a four-year high school course or its equivalent, are required for the bachelor's degree. Four of these courses are offered, viz., Classical, Ministerial, Philosophical and Scientific. Classroom work is thorough. Standards of scholarship are high and steadily rising.

II. Close Personal Contact with Teachers.

Personal contact is the most vital factor in education. Nowhere else is possible such close personal contact between teacher and student as in the small college. Where the college enrollment is from 300 to 500, each student may feel the impress of the personality of every teacher. This may mean either strength or weakness to the college, according to the character of its teachers, but herein lies its supreme opportunity. If only it can command the service of great teachers, able in scholarship and strong in personality, men and women whose nobility of character and unselfish devotion are a continual inspiration to their pupils, then, indeed, its superiority over the university or overgrown college, as a place for the worthy education of young people, is unquestioned. Hiram College has been peculiarly favored from the beginning in the character of its teachers.

III. Favorable Conditions for College Work.

Aside from the character of its teachers and the question of numbers, there are other vital considerations. The character of the college home—its location, its health, its beauty—and of the college community—the type of students it attracts, and the environment in which they live—are of the highest importance. The location of Hiram, free from the distractions and dissipations of the city, and yet in touch with its pulsing life, is almost, if not quite ideal. In quietness there is strength and the young man, who at the beginning of his career, can face the vital problems of young manhood under the favorable conditions of college life in such a school as Hiram, may well feel profoundly grateful. The college campus is one of the most elevated points in Ohio, and the clear, bracing air suggests the mountains. Pure spring water in abundance is supplied through an excellent system of waterworks. Few colleges are favored with surroundings at once so healthful and of such natural beauty as those of Hiram. The college dormitories are equipped with all modern conveniences and most of the comforts of city life are at hand. On the other hand it would be hard to find more earnest, ambitious and sincere young people anywhere than those who make up the student body of Hiram College. Association with such a group of choice young people selected from a score of different states and countries, is an education in itself. Their environment could hardly be better. There is not a saloon or evil resort within a score of miles, and the Hiram Church is a power for righteousness in the community.

IV. Moderate Expense.

Hiram College has always had a place for young men and women of ambition, but of limited purse. Many such are now numbered among her graduates of largest power and usefulness. College expenses have been kept purposely low, in order that no earnest young man or woman should be deprived of an education for lack of means. Many students pay their college expenses wholly or in part by their own efforts, and rich and poor meet together at Hiram on equal footing.

V. Encouragement to Christian Faith and Service.

Not narrow or sectarian in spirit, the college holds firmly to the great fundamental truths of Christianity and aims to set forth by precept and example a high type of Christian manhood and womanhood. Hiram seeks to develop the open mind, to inspire love for truth, and to lay a solid foundation for positive Christian faith; to inspire in all her students such love of justice, such zeal for righteousness and such ideals of and motives for Christian service, as shall fit them for the high duties of Christian citizenship.

The Essential Significance of Graded Lessons

RULING PRINCIPLE

The new education puts the pupil at the center and requires the instruction to be adapted to his needs. The history of education shows that the pupil for a very long while was denied this central position. The question of interest belonged to the instructor, not to the instructed. But modern education entirely reverses this. The nature of the pupil, and the consequent needs of the pupil, receive first consideration. Modern psychology, particularly the study of the child-mind, has shifted the educational center from subjects to persons.

BEGINNERS

The series begins where the child's conscious thought always begins, with the parental idea, and presents God to the child-mind as the heavenly Father, and leads it to the conception of this divine fatherhood through the simple and familiar relations of the child to its earthly parents. The very reading of the topics which are the subjects of the lessons in the course for Beginners is like sweet and simple music, and to any heart capable of appreciating the simplicities of truth it will indicate how natural and simple religion is as belonging to the very nature of the soul, entering into its most germinal development and working itself out in all the processes of growth.

PRIMARY

In the Primary grade the same simple but great themes touched upon in the Beginners course are continued, but just sufficiently developed to correspond to the growing capabilities of the child's mind, including, but not going beyond the widening circle of the child's extending associations and experiences. Nothing is forced in upon the child that is unchildlike in character; truths which the child can comprehend and that have natural place in his life are presented and repeated with that reiteration which the child's mind requires, while the teacher is content to wait for the germination and silent growth of the simplest seeds of truth in the child's heart.

JUNIOR

In the Junior lessons the pulse of life begins to throb more strongly. The great subjects of religious thought begin to enter; the simple introduction to the great story of history begins; the wonderful stories of the Bible begin to exercise their fascination; duties growing out of natural relationships are recognized; the choice of good and evil, and the fateful results of such choices, are made to be seen and felt; and the thought of God's providence over individual life is given manifold illustration in the biblical stories. In the fourth year of the series a more careful study of the briefer of the four Gospels is entered upon, followed by a study of the most striking incidents described in the book of Acts, and closing with stories from that larger book of Acts, the lives of later Christian missionaries.

INTERMEDIATE

Here we find ourselves where adolescent life begins, when the child ceases and the man begins; when the stirrings of those ambitions which are to issue in great deeds begin to manifest themselves; when the sympathies and affections become more intense; when the great choices and decisions are made; when the heroic spirit becomes dominant and when ideals are set up; when the great temptations open their deadly assaults; when the reason begins to exercise itself: a period of strife, and tumult, and strain, of high resolving, of deadly peril, of glorious victory. To this fateful period our new series of lessons comes with definite and intelligent understanding. Christ forever knocks at the door of life in every stage, but more distinctly and strongly does he knock at the door of the heart of youth at this period than at any other time.

SENIOR

This is the period for constructive study. It is the altruistic period of life and its spirit is optimistic. The individual begins to define his relations to others and the duties growing out of those relations. The sense of obligation and responsibility grows, purpose becomes more definite and the formulation of a life program is undertaken. Consequently the steady aim of the study and instruction in this period is to help the pupil to find his place and work in the world.

NEW CONCEPTION

The new movement is the outgrowth of the larger conception of religious education. According to this new conception the factors entering into the process are much more varied than was formerly supposed. All truth belongs to religious education, from whatever source it may be derived. Moreover, the aim of all genuine education is the production of sound character, and all instruction must be directed to this purpose. Consequently into these new courses is to be introduced the study of great characters other than those included in the Scriptures. And the moral heroes of every generation will be summoned to illustrate and impress the great elements of noble character.

THE BIBLE

The Bible is used as the most valuable material in moral and religious instruction; and it is used with discrimination, with a clear understanding that we must select from it in the progressive education of the child such material as answers to the needs of the child at the various stages of his growth. The Bible is a great storehouse of spiritual food, but in its stores is food for the little child and the strong man. Henceforth we are to give to the child only that which belongs to the child and to the man only what belongs to the man.

—The Germans are eminently a church-going or at any rate a church belonging people. According to the last federal census, taken four years ago, the total population was 60,641,278. This church census gives the church membership, Evangelicals and Catholics combined, as 59,741,344. The Evangelicals far outnumber the Catholics, the figures being: Evangelical, 37,646,852; Catholics, 22-094,492. The Free Thinkers number only 4,270.

—According to the London Christian World Mr. Evan Roberts, the Welsh revivalist, who has been living for the last six years in comparative seclusion at Leicester, has recovered his physical strength, and is now planning new work in Wales. —The executive committee of the co-operating societies of the Northern Baptist Convention said, in its report at the Chicago meeting: "We desire to express our hearty appreciation of the generous support rendered by our denominational newspapers. More and more it is apparent that our denominational papers are essential factors in our efficiency. We shall not approximate our ideals for intelligence and efficiency until a good Baptist paper is read in every Baptist family."

New Occasions, New Duties

Is There Need of Readjustment in the Program of the National Convention?

One is not shooting beyond the mark in saying that the Annual Convention of the Disciples of Christ which will assemble in Topeka in October will be the most important in our history.

In a certain limited sense it is always true that the latest is the most significant. We have a way of complimenting each new class that goes out from high school or college with the statement that it is the best the institution has ever graduated. And this ought not to be a mere bit of flattery. So of each convention.

It will not be the largest convention we have held. To be sure it is in a most favorable locality to attract a great company of Disciples. We have no doubt it will exceed in numbers any recent gathering of our people except the Pittsburgh meeting. But its significance will be of a different sort.

It will face some of the most important issues ever presented to our churches. It will not settle all of them. It may not settle any of them. But it will face them, and undertake to think them through to some definite solution.

In the first place it will have a president who takes seriously his office. It is no reflection on the excellent men who have preceded Mr. Ainslie in the chair of the American Christian Missionary Society, to say that they have taken their position as a good-natured compliment paid them by the churches for a career of more or less success in the local fields in which they have labored.

Beyond the appointment of the routine committees and the preparation of an address, their work has been only a pleasurable incident in their own lives, and without moment to the brotherhood.

For the first time in our history the man who more than any other is the choice of the churches for the year has undertaken to serve the Disciples in a definite and statesmanlike way. He has believed himself called to be more than a figurehead. He has understood that his position was not merely a compliment to himself, but a call to a real service.

He has taken time, from a very responsible ministry, to go out among the churches in a series of rallies in representative cities east and west, and lay upon the hearts of the leaders in the churches what he conceived to be the impressive lessons of this first year in our second century of history. This has given dignity to the office he holds, and has been of value in making the brotherhood aware that new duties are expected as new occasions arise.

We expect to see Mr. Ainslie carry this same attitude of serious and purposeful devotion into the convention. We believe that he will have some wise and wholesome reforms to administer in the position which has been so much a matter of hap-hazard hitherto. We anticipate a new emphasis upon order, decorum, reverence and business-like effectiveness which has been too far lacking in the past.

Another element of interest in the convention will be the report of the special committee which has been for sometime at work upon the general question of unification in the work of the missionary and benevolent boards. The character of this committee is an assurance that whatever be the nature if the report, due consideration will be given alike to the interests of the different organizations themselves and the entire brotherhood.

For a long time it has been apparent that the various causes to which the Disciples devote their thought and money have been too much separated in their management, and for this reason lacking in that economy of administration and that efficiency of result which ought to be evident in all work of this kind.

This does not mean that money has been wasted, but it does signify that team work is better than the situation described by the proverb, "Every one for himself, and—." For in too many cases the remainder of the aphorism, "extremum diabolus capiat," follows in logical order.

Whether our missionary societies and the other organized interests of the Disciples should be merged into one central board, or into some smaller number than we now have, is for the special committee to advise and the churches to consider. But when one notes the necessary invasion of each other's time and territory involved in the present arrangement, the multiplying of days in the missionary calendar of the local churches, and the lack of harmony resulting from the loose plan now in operation, it is clear that the time has come for amendment.

We have no wish to forecast what that plan will be. It has been drawn with care. It will satisfy neither those who want a drastic change nor those who want to retain the present disorganized condition. But it will be a step in the direction which will meet the needs of the new time upon which we have come, with its new duties.

Nor can we fail to take note of the significant changes which are taking place in this regard among the religious bodies with which the Disciples are accustomed to rank themselves in point of numbers and efficiency has been heard and heeded. And the call of the of all administrative work among the Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists and Presbyterians has been marked. Only this year the Northern Baptist Convention took the final step in its great plan of unification of its various missionary and benevolent interests, a plan upon which three years of careful work have been spent.

We are neither anxious to imitate our religious neighbors simply because they are doing something that looks attractive, nor are we afraid to adopt the same plans lest we should be misled. In all these instances the great call of the times to unification, economy and efficiency has been heard and heeded. And the call of the age usually proves itself to be the call of God.

We expect the Topeka convention to be notable in another respect as well. Whether as a part of the report of the committee already mentioned, or as a special order, there is certain to arise the question regarding the future constitution of our conventions.

At the present time, as we have many times pointed out, the Disciples of Christ have no general convention. We have a series of such gatherings, to be sure, that are convened at the same place and relatively the same time; but no representative assembly of the brotherhood.

There is the convention of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Then there follows the convention of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. After this the American Christian Missionary Society convenes, with the various interests which attempt to secure attention under the mantle of its charity. But at no time in the series of gatherings thus described and the Disciples of Christ really in session in a representative and effective manner.

Suppose some action was desired in reference to the White Slave Traffic, or the work of International Peace, or Prison Reform, or the suppression of vicious literature. There is no moment in all the series of gatherings when any one of these matters, or any other save those strictly pertinent to the work of the specific organizations convened, is in order. Objection from the floor on the ground that such matters were "not germane" to the purposes of the gathering would rule out every such interest.

Nor is this a fancy sketch. On just such pleas the Disciples of Christ have times beyond belief been hedged in with antequated objections to any action on great questions of world-wide interest, such as temperance, the forward movement for Christian Conquest, the work of Church Federation, and the propaganda in favor of peace among the nations.

It is time such childish limitations were laid one side. If there are those among us who are opposed to the great ideals toward which the church in our day is moving, they should fight in the open, and not under the threadbare plea that such questions are "not germane" to the purposes of our gatherings. But as rapidly as possible we ought to make all such pleas obsolete and impossible by such organization as provides us with a real convention.

This of course means a convention of delegates representing the churches. Our present gatherings are mass meetings. They are largely local in their attendance. The number of those sitting in the convention and entitled to vote is determined very little by the interests of the brotherhood at large, and very much by the place in which the convention is held.

There need be no restriction upon the fullest local attendance. But the business of the convention should be transacted by a delegate body and not by a mob of good people who happen to be there.

These are some of the matters which will make the Topeka gathering important. We look for developments that will be of the greatest interest to the Disciples.

New occasions bring new duties.

Editorial Correspondence

Dear Readers of The Christian Century:—The trip across the Atlantic is a commonplace experience today, but to one who is making it for the first time, it retains all the awe and charm which it had in the day when but a few attempted it. Unfortunately for purposes of newspaper sensation, but most fortunately for our fearful hearts, our trip was extraordinarily smooth. Indeed, our boat, the "Ionian" of the Allan Line,—not one of the larger craft, but excellently manned in every respect—broke her time record for crossing the ocean. Not a minute was lost by mishap or adverse weather or any untoward circumstance. The great engine-heart kept throbbing steadily on, seeming never to lose a single beat from the time we left Montreal until we landed in Glasgow this morning.

At the first the Captain and his men were a bit concerned for the fortunes of the voyage when they realized that so many preachers were aboard. In vain were they assured that there was no Jonah among us. However, as the days came and went and the sun shone and the winds came not, the feeling grew that preachers were not bad cargo, after all. And at the dock this morning, when we bade the Captain good-bye, he said this was a red-letter trip, and that he was going to advertise hereafter especially for preachers and missionaries!

It was a delightful company of men and women who found themselves on the deck of the boat the first day out. Fully one-half of the first-class passengers were enroute to the World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh. From the start, therefore, there was established an easy and interested intercourse, out of which many lasting friendships no doubt have grown. On Sunday, the customary service in the dining saloon was addressed by a French missionary to the Foreign Legion in Algiers. In the evening, three missionaries, representing Japan, India and China, spoke. Various other services and conferences were held during the week, that on Thursday night, a praise and testimony service, being especially interesting.

"The "talent" of the company got a chance to exhibit itself entertainingly on Friday night, in a grand concert in which everybody who could perform was called upon to do so. One of the interesting numbers on this program was a tune on the bagpipes, rendered by a young woman passenger. The days were spent in reading, conversation and deck games, chief among which was the game of shuffleboard. The whole cabin was organized into a tournament early in the voyage, an arrangement which proved especially effective in promoting acquaintance and sociability. Games are an excellent common denominator. People cannot remain strangers if they play together. This is why children become acquainted with one another so quickly and easily. And on an ocean voyage when all are so far separated from their tasks and troubles, the child in us is revealed.

It was interesting to go down in defeat at the hands of a venerable Toronto Presbyterian minister, and afterwards to go off in a corner of the deck and talk theology with him. This particular Presbyterian minister was hearteningly open-minded in his view, although other Canadian pastors on board showed signs of fear and confusion in the face of the productions of present-day scholarship.

Yesterday was a day of especially interesting characters to us. If we hadn't been on the sea we should have called it historic ground. We passed through those waters in which the course of Alexander Campbell's life was providentially determined. It will be remembered that his first attempt at taking his mother and the family to join his father in America was foiled by a fierce storm which swept them from their course shortly after reaching the open sea from Londonderry, in the north of Ireland. Yonder, to our right, was the mouth of Londonderry harbor, from which the little craft bearing the Campbell family issued to its fate. On our left lay Islay, with its broad-mouthed bay, into which their boat was driven by the storm, and where Alexander resolved to abandon the trip and spend a year in the University of Glasgow.

This year in Glasgow was the period in which the young man's mind was reconstructed and the foundation laid for his leadership of the Disciples' reformation movement. It is my intention later to visit the home of the Campbells in northern Ireland and to report the things I find there. But better still for the readers of The Christian Century than anything I may write, will be the report of Dr. Errett Gates, who, at greater leisure and with more skill will make a study of the whole social and religious situation within which the early life of the Campbells was implicit. Dr. Gates, who, with his wife, accompanied us on the Ionian, has promised to tell us the results of his excursions into those places of interest to all Disciples. He will make Edinburgh his headquarters for several months, utilizing the library of the university there.

Here we are in Glasgow on a Sunday morning, early enough to look around a little before going to church. Leaving the boat, we find our passenger friends in the baggage shed, quite transformed in appearance. The negligé dress has been laid aside and the street gowns and stiff hats have been donned. We hardly recognize the Rev. Dr. C. B. Spencer, editor of the Central Christian Advocate, of Kansas City, as our erstwhile opponent at shuffle-board. However, there are few good-byes, for we expect to meet shortly at Edinburgh. So, passing the customs outrage, we go to our hotel. Not a street car moves in Glasgow on Sunday until nine o'clock. The streets are as quiet as a forest path. We walk a mile and a half to the university, in whose vicinity we mean to attend church. Here, overlooking the beautiful "Kelvin Grove," stands the university building. It is in early English style and said to be one of the grandest modern buildings in Scotland.

Half way down the hill is Wellington Church, whose pastor, Rev. G. H. Morrison, M. A., has many interested readers of his monographs in America. The service is very plain, consisting of alternate scripture readings and long prayers, with hymns by the congregation and a sermon certainly of not more than twenty minutes' length. To us the most inspiring portion of the service was the hymn-singing. There was not a single special number by the choir. But the hymns themselves were anthems—the grand hymns of the church with character in them and a musical and thought structure that made them worth while. There was some help in the sermon, but we all came away with hushed hearts, not because of what was said in particular, but because the atmosphere of the place made it possible for God to speak in that quiet voice within us by which, after all we knew it to be, none other than the house of God and the gate of heaven.

Tomorrow Mrs. Morrison and myself leave Glasgow for a trip through the Scottish lakes and the Trossachs, spending a few hours in Stirling, to visit the old castle and the battle field of Bannockburn. Thence our plans take us by Tuesday afternoon to Edinburgh, whither the tribes are going up for a council of war upon the mightiest campaign ever undertaken by man—the conquest of the whole world for our King, Jesus Christ.

It will be my joy to tell of the great convocation to the Christian Century family.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

Glasgow, June 12 1910.

Is There Room?

The statement made by Cecil J. Armstrong, in his resignation from the pastorate of the church in Troy, N. Y., has given the event far more than passing interest and significance to all thoughtful observers of the work of the Disciples. In the letter of resignation, read before the church, Mr. Armstrong says:

"My reason for making this statement to you is the growing consciousness, the first dawn of which was during my student days, that doctrinally I am out of harmony with the consensus of conviction of this congregation and of our church as a whole. I have believed for years that I was true to the "spirit" of our plea, if not to the "letter." But from the general trend of events among our people, and from remarks and expressed convictions that many of you have made—though in no spirit of unkindness, I am glad to say—even that belief has been shattered and the deep conviction has entered my soul that, until I have made a frank statement to you, I am misrepresenting you in this pulpit.

Upon the fundamentals of Christianity we are in perfect accord. I believe in the Fatherhood of God, the divinity of Jesus Christ, the Holy Spirit as God operating in the affairs of men, the brotherhood of man, and that the Bible contains a unique revelation of God to man.

Upon other matters, however, we differ. I am no longer in accord with you upon the subject of baptism, the means of bringing Christian Unity to pass, and the value of Higher Criticism. I feel that upon these matters we differ irreconciliably. I know that some of you are in accord with me. I also know the overwhelming majority do not agree with me. In a congregationally governed church, such as ours, the majority must rule.

"It is not necessary that I go into detail to state my doctrinal position. Suffice it to say that I have accepted many of the conclusions of higher criticism, and am in perfect accord with the modern emphasis upon the social, rather than the doctrinal message of Christianity. I also believe that our church's work as a promoter of Christian Union—which has been my one object in filling a pulpit among our people—is about completed. God has so moved upon the church universal that unity, in the vital sense, if not the organic, is practically achieved. I firmly believe that the continued emphasis upon what we are pleased to call "first principles," presents, not only a very mechanical view of salvation, but a humiliating instance of a divisive propaganda by a church whose only reason for existence is the promotion of Christian Unity."

Is there room for such a man among the Disciples? There can be no doubt that this clear, frank statement shows Mr. Armstrong to differ in his belief from many, and perhaps the majority, of the Disciples. Does this difference necessitate his withdrawal from the ministry of the Disciples? The question is a vital one, involving, as it does, an interpretation of the history and present mission of the Disciples.

There are those who see in this action of Mr. Armstrong a cause of congratulation, because one who might have taught doctrines differing from those generally accepted is out of the way. The enemy has been thrust out of the ranks. Better, he has withdrawn, "relieving" the defenders of the accepted standards from responsibility for his removal. The conception of the church lying back of this is that of a static institution, with a definite statement of belief not to be changed through ages. If this be the true conception of the church, then Mr. Armstrong has done the only thing that an honorable man could do. The safety of the church is served by his withdrawal.

But another view of the matter may be taken by those who think of the church, not as a static institution, but as a dynamic organism; who think of her task not as the defense and propagation of a definite statement of faith, but to ever seek to discover anew and to re-interpret the fundamental realities of our holy religion. From this point of view there is welcome room to all such men who are loyal to the plea for Christian union, and the fundamental teachings of the Christian religion, but who feel the need of facing the facts presented to us from many fields of scientific inquiry and of taking account of them in doctrinal statement. It will, moreover, be seen that upon the presence of such men depends the future life and usefulness of the church. The pain caused to the body by their presence is the pain of progress. There may be mistakes, but they are the mistakes of life and not of death. Men of this type there must be in the church, that is, and is to be, a living, growing institution.

Is there room for such men among the Disciples? This question presents the crisis that is upon us. If the Disciples think of themselves as set to the task of defending a definite statement of truth, or mode of baptism, this spirit must get itself expressed in a static creed and organization. The pulpit of such a church will gain scant hearing from coming generations. It will seek English-speaking congregations, while delivering its message in Hebrew. But if the Disciples think of themselves as a changing, living, growing organism, if they think of Christian Unity and not immersion as their primary plea, then shall they successfully readjust themselves to the changing life about them and carry their message with power to all peoples. In increased leadership and power shall they find the fine fruition of their history.

To the latter course our whole history impells us. It is the conception that was in the heart of the "Fathers." Some men who find themselves differing from many of their brethren upon such questions as Mr. Armstrong has named, remain with the Disciples because they believe that thus they best serve the Disciples and the Kingdom of God. Other men find themselves so differing, and after some years of observation conclude there is no room for them among Disciples, who seem to them to be set to the defence of teachings which no longer make their appeal. These men are impelled to leave the ministry of the Disciples, either ceasing to preach, or seeking places of greater freedom.

Which ideal shall dominate? The Disciples of this generation must answer. Upon their answer depends the future life of the church. Is there room for men like Mr. Armstrong, or must these withdraw, leaving the field to those who can accept certain creedal statements, which to men of Mr. Armstrong's mind do not appeal? H. F. B.

Christian Conversation

"The lips of knowlede are a precious jewel."

In spite of the assertions to the contrary, a man's speech reveals what he is. The fool will speak folly and the wise will utter words of wisdom. The warning of Jesus that men shall give an account of their idle words in the day of judgment drives us back to the source of our words, the life of thought and feeling and action. The idle word comes from an inpoverished life.

Sincereity is a mark of Christian conversation. We have good reason to be indignant at the man who is trying to conceal his real aims. Lying has been called intellectual highway robbery. By pretending to be what we are not, we rob others of what they are entitled to and in the end destroy the confidence of man in man. We make unsafe the highways of intellectual life. The sincere man gives us himself and that is the best gift within the power of any man. Success and happiness are largely dependent upon the willingness of men to open their hearts one to another. It is not life at all to be shut out from the aims and sympathies of the world. The insincere man is doing his best to destroy that which is of most worth to himself and to other men. His selfishness is of the meanest sort.

The sincere man may be blunt and brutal. He may think that moral surgery is never useful unless its knife is dull and rusty. In fact, coarseness and disregard for the feelings of others are often mistaken for sincerity. The lips of the Christian are oiled with kindness. There is a reverent regard for the personality of friend and acquaintance. It is granted that the listener has some sense and that he is trying to find the truth. If the speaker is a preaecher and a Christian, he tries to understand those errors he is compelled to combat. He follows the road by which they have come to their present ideas and attitude and he thus gains the sympathy without which no man's words are true and strong.

Cant is a substitute for thought and moral earnestness. It is sometimes used with such vigor that the speaker deceives himself and thinks he is a very devout man and a moral hero. Cant is the use of words that had a meaning for former generations and are now living upon their ancient reputation. They may be good words which can be filled with meaning for us by careful study and they may be words for hich wwe can find no use. In either case, cant is unbecoming to a Christian. The Christian belongs to the preesent. He uses common experience to illumine the pages of Holy Scripture. He does not have to receive the ready-made theories of his fathers without trying them in order to see how they fit into his circumstances. It is anti-Christian to allow a present opportunity of service to pass by simply because the speech of another generation is on our lips and keeps us from learning the words to describe the duty before us.

The scientist emphases the importance of the tentative attitude toward truth. He tells us that we ought to be ready to modify our conclusions at any time, and that we ought to be actively engaged in the search for new facts and more adequate statements of the ways in which facts behave. The Christian has as much reason as the scientist to assume the tentative attitude. In his conversation he must not be dogmatic. He is not truly Christian if he takes it for granted that his knowledge is complete and final. He loses power to influence others in proportions to his dogmatism. The things of which he is most certain will be commended to others by his modesty. A satement that is put forth as containing the whole truth may be rejected, while it would be accepted if it were represented as containing a part of the truth. Even if some one were to arise and give the whole truth about the greatest matters of life, we should ask him to be moderate in his announcement of it.

Moral earnestness enters into Christian conversation. There is a dogmatism in which the Christian may indulge and for which no one has a right to criticise him, and that is the dogmatism of personal experience. He has tried to follow Christ. He knows what Christ is to him. He knows how temptation has been met, how evil habits have been overcome, and how he has come out of the gloom of doubt. On such questions he is able to speak with authority. He ought to be ready to accept assistance in getting an understanding of what he has experienced, but he must not weakly allow some other person to give him the meaning of his religion. He must tell others what it means to him.

World Missionary Conference

Christian Strategists from World Battlefield Hold Council in Edinburgh

BY CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

"About the biggest thing that ever struck Scotland," said my Edinburgh host as we sat together in his drawing room talking over the conference which had brought me to his city, and on account of which a thousand Edinburgh homes have been thrown open to entertain delegates from all parts of the earth.

Yes, and more than that, was the Archbishop of Canterbury's response at the session that evening, for, said he, "if men be weighed rather than counted this assemblage has, I suppose, no parallel in the history either of this or other lands."

This assessment of the strategic and prophetic character of the World Missionary Conference is the common judgment of the entire body of 1,200 delegates. Every one feels the presence in the conference of a power not ourselves, deeper than our own devices, which is making for a triumphant advance of Christianity abroad. And not less are the delegates thrilled by the sense that the conference foreshadows a new era for the church at home.

Indeed one is safe in saying that there is no home problem which the church is today facing which is not forced to the foreground in the consideration of missionary expansion. And it is coming home to many with the force and surprise of a revelation that these home problems—the problem of Christian union, the problem of Christian education, the problem of a socialized Christianity, and even the academic problems of criticism and theology,— wait for their solution until they are carried into the white light of missionary passion.

But I must not indulge in this kind of writing now. There will be time enough later on for these reflections. The readers of the Christian Century wish to see the conference itself, and I will try to set it forth as well as I can with my pencil, in a forenoon of self-denying absence from a most tempting session.

Place Adapted to the Purpose.

The Assembly Hall of the United Free Church is the meeting place. It is not the largest hall in Edinburgh, but is admirably adapted to the purposes of this conference. It must be remembered that this is a Conference. It is not the same sort of a missionary meeting as that held in Chicago in May when 5,000 men gathered to hear great missionary addresses. The purpose of that Laymen's Congress was to quicken missionary enthusiasm, to develop a missionary conscience, to make the church feel her duty to carry the gospel to the ends of the earth.

This meeting in Edinburgh is a gathering of missionary specialists, in the main, who come together to exchange views on the ways and means of executing the Lord's command to preach the gospel to the whole creation. The missionary conscience is assumed here. The church's duty is taken for granted. Every delegate is already an ardent missionary believer.

But the past 100 years of missionary campaigning has brought to light an almost endless number of problems and difficulties about which these missionary workers—both those at the front and those administering the enterprise at home—have good reasons to hold divergent opinions. These problems form the subject-matter for the discussions of the conference. A large hall like the Museum in Edinburgh or the Auditorium in Chicago, is too vast for effective discussion of problems. Hence this Assembly Hall, seating the 1,200 delegates on the main floor, with galleries on four sides for wives of delegates and representative visitors, especially missionaries, is just suited to the purpose.

The First Session.

Let us go in at 9:45 some morning and observe and listen.

They are singing, "Crown Him With Many Crowns" as we enter, and then a prayer is offered by Bishop Brent of the Philippine Islands. He speaks with God in the simple speech of a child, and one knows whence is the secret of the great faith and enthusiasm that has called him to give his life to the establishment of pure Christianity in America's new possessions in the Orient.

The chairman is Mr. John R. Mott. Of course we should now say "Dr." Mott, since he was thus decorated last Tuesday by the University of Edinburgh. The vice-chancellor characterized his name as one "honored and revered in all the universities and seats of learning throughout the world, for it is the name of a dauntless crusader who has found his mission in the advancement of the spiritual side of university life, of a great leader who has for years exercised an extraordinary ascendency over the students of all countries." Mr. Mott was elected as the chairman of the conference in committee, which means, that he is the real executive chairman of the gathering, governing its sessions from day to day.

Yonder among the delegates to the left is Lord Balfour, former secretary for Scotland in the British Cabinet and a leader in church and state. He is the president of the conference and has led in the two years' preparation for the great gathering. His presidential address on Tuesday evening sounded a great note for the unity of the church.. "The hope has sprung up in my mind," he said, "that unity if it begins on the mission field will not find its ending there. It is a thought not without its grandeur that a unity begun on the mission field may extend its influence and react upon us at home and throughout the older civilizations. Surely there is much more that should unite us than keep us apart."

Naming Some Distinguished Visitors.

In a seat half way down the aisle there sits the Archbishop of Canterbury, the head of the Church of England, in his knee breeches and gaiters, democratically taking his place beside a Methodist missionary from Korea. Across the aisle is Professor E. C. Moore of Harvard, whom a daily paper this morning described as "the very antithesis of the typical Yankee," and behind him Lord William Gascoyne-Cecil, son of the late Lord Salisbury.

That eager looking, bold-browed man on the other side of the area, watching the speaker and listening to him with an intentness bordering on fascination, is the Hon. William J. Bryan of the United States. He spoke yesterday on the significance of the educational ideal in mission work. People were glad to hear him. He spoke well—splendidly, indeed. He said that Christianity's character was nowhere better revealed than in its willingness to run the risk of educating the inferior people of the world. Our religion does not fear the light. Mr. Bryan is speaking many times in Edinburgh. He is announced to speak in Glasgow in a day or two and will visit other cities, bearing the inspiration of this great meeting to those who have not been able to attend it.

Just two more rows in front of us is the Hon. Seth Low, ex-mayor of New York City and formerly president of Columbia University. He is highly regarded in the conference. Sitting beside President A. McLean of the Disciples' Foreign Missionary Society, is Missions-inspector Pastor J. Warneck of Germany, world-wide authority on the animistic religions. Behind Editor J. H. Garrison, of St. Louis, is Dr. Robert E. Speer, Presbyterian missionary secretary in the United States, whom the University of Edinburgh honored with the degree of D. D. last Tuesday, in company with the Archbishop of Canterbury and President T. Harada of the great Christian University, Doshisha, in Japan, who is sitting near the front.

There is George Sherwood Eddy, a young man of wealth who is supporting himself in mission work in India, and speaking as effective a message to this conference as he did to the Chicago Laymen's Congress a few weeks ago. The familiar face of S. B. Capen, president of the American Board, calls our attention to Dr. J. M. Buckley, "the Bishop of Methodist Bishops," Rev. S. M. Zwemer, Presbyterian missionary to Arabia, Bishop W. H. Tottie of the Church of Sweden and President W. Douglas MacKenzie, of the Hartford Seminary, who sit in a row.

To the right of that post, a bit under the gallery, sits Bishop Anderson of Chicago, and two seats away is the saintly face of Rev. Alexander Whyte of First St. George's Church, Edinburgh, whom more American preachers love than any other living pulpiteer.

It is a great assemblage of the church's greatest men. But all are on the same level. Germans, French, Americans, Englishmen, Scandinavians, Japanese, Chinese, Hindoos, Africans—all are here and mingle together in an easy equality. Missionaries, preachers, teachers, editors, satesmen, business men—all come into the hall and sit where they happen to find a place, with no scale of precedence arranged for. It is an unparalleled confluence of the big men of the Kingdom of God.

The most admirable feature of the conference is the thoroughness of the preparation that has been made by its leaders. A vast deal of thinking was done before the delegates assembled. You will note that many members hold in their hands a rather unwieldy document as the president rises to announce the work of the day. That document is the proof-sheet report of a commission of experts who have been at work for two years gathering materials on the problem which is to be the subject of discussion today.

Work of the Eight Commissions.

There are eight of these commissions. To each of them the conference devotes one day, taking as the basis for its discussions the report prepared by the commission, the proof-sheets of which were put into the hands of some of the delegates some time before they left their homes for Edinburgh. Note the subjects with which the commissions deal: Carrying the Gospel to all the Non-Christian World; The Church in the Mission Field; Education in Relation to the Christianization of National Life; the Missionary Message in Relation to Non-Christian Religions; The Preparation of Missionaries; The Home Base of Missions; Missions and Governments; Co-operation and the Promotion of Unity.

The very titles show the vastness and sweep of the missionary enterprise. And some conception of the work of these commissions may be gained if we look at the report of one of them in some detail as revealing as illustrating the character and method of the other seven. Commission I., under the chairmanship of Mr. John R. Mott, has as its subject the evangelization of the world. Dr. Robson, of the United Free Church of Scotland, and Dr. Julius Richter are vice-chairmen. Associated with them are missionary experts such as Dr. Dennis, of New York, Dr. Eugene Stock, of London, and Bishop Montgomery, secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, of the Church of England. In addition to these are missionaries in active service, and representatives of the British and Foreign Bible Society, the Student Missionary Movement, and the Y. M. C. A.

Three sections of this commission have been at work—one in London, one in New York, and one on the continent. After agreeing upon certain questions dealing with vital missionary problems, these questions were sent to over 200 representative missionaries and leading native Christians all over the world for their deliberate replies. So large was the response to these that for this one commission thirty clerks were kept busy for three weeks in order that one set of replies might be sent to each member of the commission. Each member reported to the chairman, who had a draft report of the whole prepared and sent for revision to the sections of the commission sitting in Great Britain, America, and on the Continent. After full and careful criticism, the draft report has been revised, and it is this carefully prepared report which is now published as a paper of the conference.

At the Conference on Saturday.

Let us assume that we are visiting the conference on Saturday. The subject for the day's consideration is, The Missionary Message in Relation to Non-Christian Religions. It is a live question to every missionary. And since the science of comparative religion has grown up in the past quarter century, is a live question to every thoughtful person. We will hear some interesting talking. Let us hope that it may lead to fuller light!

Seven minutes is the limit for a speech. Chairman Mott is inexorable in enforcing the rule. Professor D. S. Cairns, of the University of Aberdeen, chairman of the commission dealing with this subject, opens the discussion by calling attention to the salient features of their report. What attitude shall the messenger of Christianity take toward the religion of the people with whom he works? is the point of the whole problem. Concluding, he said:

The situation which the non-Christian nations presented at the present moment was something like the spiritual situation which confronted Israel in the days of the rise of the great prophets. Israel had been getting on comfortably enough with the traditional religion and the inherited faith, until suddenly a shadow fell upon the whole Israelitish life. It was instinctively felt by her spiritual leaders that in the traditional religion there must be more than they had already attained, a reserve spiritual force which would enable the nation to meet the new and formidable emergency which had risen; and in the long and illustrious succession of Hebrew prophecy they saw the endeavor of the spiritual leaders to meet that new emergency by the broadening and intensifying of the nation's sense of the living God. Did not the evidence disclose that today the Christian church was face to face with a formidable situation? As one read the reports one seemed to be looking into the great workshop of history. One saw the forces that were making nations, that were making religions, and those who had eyes to see saw the forming of something very vast, very formidable, and full of promise. The inevitable question arose—Is the church at this moment fit and spiritually ready for this great emergency? Was it equal to the Providential calling?

Pricked by this question delegates from all over the house sent up their cards to the chairman, asking to speak.

The first group of speakers talk on the Animistic religions, the sort of religion possessed by the backward and childlike races such as inhabit Africa. Rev. Dr. Wardlaw Thompson, missionary to Africa, contrasts the attitude of highcaste, cultured Hindoos toward the missionary with that of the primitive or barbarous peoples, where the missionary was admittedly one of a superior race. This docility of the inferior race is at once the missionary's opportunity and peril.

As an illustration of the diverse ways in which the animistic peoples approach Christianity, a speaker tells of one who became a Christian, moved at first by the desire to secure a decent burial for his body. All the speakers make vivid, however, what the Gospel means to the animistic tribes—that it breaks for them the spell of terror and introduces them to a life which is a jubilee of liberty and joy.

Problem of Chinese Religions.

From the animistic the conference goes with a leap to the problem of Chinese religions. There the life of the nation has been moulded by ancestor-worship to a cohesion which has outlived the changes of 5,000 years; and Christianity, when it demands that a man surrender that, demands that he become an outlaw from his own nation.

Rev. Dong King-en, a Chinaman, in picturesque, flowing, native garb, urges the necessity of Christianity making itself more indigenous to China by making its converts study their own language and literature. This theme—the necessity of Christianity making its contact with a heatheen people at such points as to insure its becoming an indigenous religion and not just an accidental importation —becomes the thesis of the day.

A striking contribution is made by Rev. Dr. K. Chatterji, a converted Hindu. With his patriarchal gray beard, a benign expression and a complexion which might be of the West, he states in beautiful and soft English what difficulties a Hindu experiences in becoming a Christian. He had long stumbled at the doctrine of Atonement. The Hindus have a vivid sense of punishment due each individual for his wrongdoing, and it is inconceivable to them that another should suffer tor their sins. At a previous session a speaker had called for the preaching of the "old-fashioned Gospel in the old-fashioned way." Dr. Chatterji gives the effective reply. He makes the conference realize the great harm done by unethical representations of the doctrine of the Atonement, and how pathetically missionaries are handicapped who do not appreciate the inner life of the people whose religion they wish to supplant.

Dr. Campbell Gibson, Presbyterian missionary to China, a master spirit in the conference, testifies to the responsiveness of the Chinese mind to spiritual truth. The Rev. Mr. Lloyd, Foochow, gives as his opinion that the idea of God as Father presented the most natural point of contact with the Chinese mind because filial piety was the highest of all the graces in China.

The Rev. Dr. Mackichan, principal of the Wilson College, Bombay, emphasises the importance of approaching the mind of India along the avenues of its own thought. This does not mean that they are to adapt the content of their message to suit Indian thought. Their philosophy is based on metaphysical thinking of the highest order; yet it has not reached a saving conclusion. They have had to tell the Indians that they sympathize with their failure, and that Christ satisfies their unfulfilled longings.

Christianity Among Other Religions.

So the discussion runs on during the whole day. Probably forty persons speak. Yet Chairman Mott announces at the end that he had in his hand forty-two names which time would not permit him to call upon. Dr. Robert E. Speer is given fifteen minutes to make the closing speech, as vice chairman of the commission. He fearlessly counsels the frankest comparison of Christianity with other religions. This because we are sure—absolutely sure—that such a comparison can result only in the enhancement of the glory of our holy faith.

Many other things are said. What I can write is but a sip of the overflowing cup of good things. The theme of Christian unity is running through the whole conference like a subterrannean stream. It breaks through the ground of any subject the conference may be considering,and bubbles on the surface for a time. It is almost the exception for a speaker to sit down without deploring our divisions. The missionaries are literally plaintive in their appeal that the church of Christ re-establish her long lost unity. But tomorrow is to be given over to a discussion of the whole subject, and my heart thrills with expectancy and eagerness to hear the great words that I cannot doubt will surely be spoken.

And my first impulse, of course, will be to tell The Christian Century readers all about it.

Christian Union in the Local Congregation

Results Attained by "Membership in the Congregation" Plan at Hyde Park Church, Chicago

BY E. S. AMES.

The Hyde Park Church, during the past seven years employed a plan of "Membership in the Congregation" by which it has solved for itself the practical problem of Christian union. Every year the number of persons in this relation has increased and the fellowship involved has become more and more satisfying. At a time when the union question and the baptism controversy are being considered with new zest, it may be of value to take into account an actual experiment and some definite facts of a concrete character.

At the present time there are over thirty members of the congregation. They are from various denominations—Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Episcopalians, and Baptists. There are some who have never been members of any church. These members contribute to all financial interests and to all activities of the church. They participate in missionary work, in Sunday-school instruction, in neighborhood enterprises and the rest. They serve on the official board, and hold offices in the various societies. Not one has ever withdrawn on account of any dissatisfaction, and all have made friends for the church.

The Uniting of Families.

One of the most significant and beautiful results has been the uniting of families in the religious fellowship. It has happened more than once that a wife who was a member of the church has been joined in practical Christian service and regular attendance at church by her husband through his becoming a member of the congregation. In some cases the husband was a member of the church and the wife became a member of the congregation, or again membership in the congregation has been the common meeting ground when both have been members of other churches. In other instances persons whose friends were in the church entered the congregation and thus preserved in the religious life the natural associations which often mean so much but which religion has not always wisely fostered.

It sometimes happens that people have so completely identified the church with conservative doctrines and practices that they cannot bring themselves to take full membership in church organization. They feel that their acceptance of the church in that way would be interpreted as an endorsement of more than they can consistently acknowledge. But these persons often recognize the practical good accomplished by the church and are glad to be identified with it in a kind of non-ecclesiastical way. Besides it is understood that those who come from other denominations do not necessarily cease such denominational connection, or withdraw from their local church. In the majority of cases, however, such relations have not been actively sustained. As a rule the less technical, less formal relation of membership in the congregation is more attractive than membership in the church to persons who have been interested in the Ethical Culture Movement, Theosophy, Christian Science and similar societies.

Settled Baptism Controversy.

This membership plan has settled the baptism controversy completely by referring it entirely to the individual. If one insists that only immersed believers shall be members of the church, then this plan meets his demand, for none are called members of the church who have not been baptized by immersion. If, however, another considers baptism of little or no importance, then he does not care to go through a form which signifies so little to him when he can have a practical working relationship as a member of the congregation. It has not been our experience that the members of the congregation feel themselves placed in any inferior position. We all hold that religion is a matter of the spirit, of the character and will and that no outward form can make any vital difference in a man's relation to God. Therefore no one in the seven years of this practice has ever assumed that the difference between the two kinds of membership was of any significance except to those who had a subjective feeling about it. On the contrary those who contend that unimmersed persons should be called members of the church not only unduly magnify church membership but they confront the necessity of deciding whether those not baptized at all shall be received as full members. At the present time none of the evangelical bodies will admit to membership in the church a person who has never been baptized, but many do receive such persons into the congregation. As a matter of actual experience no local church in an immersionist body has ever successfully operated the plan of receiving into full membership of the church all the types of persons who are received as members of the congregation here and in a number of Baptist and Disciple churches. The question which is more important than the contention between immersion and sprinkling is that between baptism and no baptism. But not many informed representatives of a truly spiritual Christianity are doubtful of the final verdict. They are more concerned to find a practical basis which shall conserve all the vital forces as much as possible without doing hurt to any one's honest conviction. So far as it has been tried the plan of membership in the congregation has accomplished this.

Edward Scribner Ames, Ph. D.

Union and Immersion.

In addition to the features already mentioned, there are other considerations which add to the significance of this plan for union. Among the Disciples there is a growing realization of the futility of advocating union on the basis of immersion. At the centennial convention recently a distinguished layman advocated a modification of the terms of membership with a view to greater practical efficiency. Since that time the Christian Century has opened its columns to the freest discussion of the subject from every point of view.

In the issue of May 12, 1910, a correspondent asks this question: "Would you advocate the reception of an unimmersed Congregationalist who presented credentials of fellowship from a church of that order, without requiring him to be immersed?" The editorial answer was: "Yes. Such a person is a Christian, a member of the church of Christ, already in the fellowship of all members of the church of Christ. Any congregation that denies him the fullest fellowship in a sectarian congregation, narrower in its basis of union than the Church of Christ."

Loyal to Disciples and Bible.

A notable fact concerning these developments is that such plans are supported by men who sincerely believe themselves to be thoroughly loyal to the original and ideal plea of the Disciples. They recognize the spiritual authority of the Scriptures. They know that the modern knowledge of the Bible shows it to advocate the religion of the spirit as superior to the religion of the letter. The teaching of Jesus not only frees his followers from bondage to a legalistic system, but also makes it encumbent upon them to call men to the inner, free religion of his gospel. The movement back to Christ makes it impossible to stop this side of Pentecost for the most authoritative statement of the essentials of Christianity. And when one goes to the living words of Jesus himself, there are no conditions of membership in his company except the will to do his will. It is everywhere the attitude of mind and heart which determines a man's acceptability in that gracious circle. Those who invoke the authority of the Bible as sanctioning an external rite as "essential" have to reckon with the fact that other men of as great devoutness and learning believe sincerely that the fullest devotion to the highest level of biblical religion involves the discontinuance or baptism as a saving ordinance along with other superstitions.

Hopeful of Union.

There is yet evidence that the ideal of Christian union is sufficiently vital to triumph over the outworn exegesis which is at present the greatest doctrinal barrier to a consistent practice of union in the local church. The general idea of federation has had many advocates. It is only necessary to realize that federation must be a matter of local, congregational achievement. A federation of denominations whose local bodies do not recognize each other's members as worthy of fellowship in their communions is absurd. It is like Russia's recent advocacy of international peace in the midst of her own bloody wars. Membership in the congregation is a working solution of this very real problem in its concrete form.

But most important of all is the fact that this plan enables the churches which employ it to organize the Christian forces of the community more effectively. The church is called on now as never before in its history to deal with the vast problems of crime, poverty, disease, civic corruption, education and world-wide righteousness and peace. These urgent needs as they press with ever increasing insistence upon the attention of Chris-

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, JULY 10.

Theme for the Day.—A Fresh Beginning.

Scripture.—Therefore shall ye observe this day throughout your generations.—Ex. 1:17. This is the day which Jehovah hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it.—Ps. 118:24.

Every day is a fresh beginning;
Listen, my soul, to the glad refrain,
And, spite of old sorrow and older sinning,
Take heed with the day and begin again.
—Susan Coolidge ("New Day.")

Prayer.—Holy Father we Thy children come to Thee in the opening of this another day of Thine own making. It comes to us fresh from Thy hand, and calls us to a new and holy sense of Thy power and love as expressed in nature and in the daily comforts of our lives; but most of all in the privilege of worship that this good day brings. We feel like making a new start on our way to the eternal life. We are not at all satisfied with our progress hitherto. We should like to do nobler things, and Thy help we mean to try. Grant us Thy favor in this new endeavor. We ask in the name of the Savior. Amen.

MONDAY, JULY 11.

Theme for the Day.—The True Sacrifice.

Scripture.—Hath Jehovah as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of Jehovah? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams.—1 Sam. 15:22.

The tumult and the shouting dies—
The captains and the kings depart.
Still stands Thine ancient sacrifice,
An humble and a contrite heart.
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget.
Rudyard Kipling ("The Recessional").

Prayer.—Our Father, we know that something is due to Thee from us. We share the feeling of the ages that we must present to Thee something that makes evident our sense of obligation and our failure to attain to Thy favor. Yet we know that Thou carest not for burnt offerings nor sacrifices of blood. The sacrifices of God are a broken heart. A humble and obedient spirit, O God, Thou wilt not despise. Accept, we beseech Thee, our gratitude for Thy daily mercies, and for the blessings which enrich our lives. Help us devote ourselves as living sacrifices to Thee, which is our reasonable service. We pray in Christ's name. Amen.

TUESDAY, JULY 12.

Theme for the Day.—The First of Human Kind.

Scripture.—And God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.—Gen. 1:27.

Two of far nobler shape, erect and tall,
Godlike erect, with native honor clad,
In naked majesty seemed lords of all:
And worthy seemed; for in their looks divine
The image of their glorius maker shone
Truth, wisdom, sanctitude severe and pure.
—John Milton ("Paradise Lost").

Prayer.—O Thou great Creator and Preserver of all things, we read with wonder the story of Thy work in natue as it is written in the records of the past, in the book of life about us, and in the Scriptures. In our own hearts we know in our best moments that we are made in Thy likeness. Whatever may have been the time or manner of our human beginnings, it is Thou who art our Maker. May we read the story of history with fresh appreciation of its divine character in the light of Thy relation to its origin and progress, and may we seek to realize for ourselves and our fellow man something of Thy purpose for the race. In Christ's name. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 13.

Theme for the Day.—The Pursuit of the Highest Good.

Scripture.—The way of the wicked is an abomination to Jehovah; but he loveth him that followeth after righteousness.—Prov. 15:9.

So then let us follow after things which make for peace, and things whereby we may edify one another.—Rom. 14:19.

Launch your vessel,
And crown your canvass,
And, ere it vanishes
Over the margin
After it, follow it,
Follow the Gleam.
—Tennyson ("Merlin and the Gleam").

Prayer.—On this new day we come to Thee Gracious Father, to thank Thee first of all for life and all the good it holds for us. Each day brings us some fresh token of Thy favor. But not alone in the things we enjoy is Thy love made known. Thou hast also revealed to us a destiny far more wonderful than our utmost dreams could have pictured. Give us courage, we pray Thee, to fulfil this high purpose by obedience to Thy will, and consecration to the holy ends of life. Aid us in our endeavors after the best that the present and the future can bring. With undismayed spirits may we follow after the ideals of righteousness and true holiness, never losing sight of the light that leads us on. We ask for the sake of the Christ. Amen.

THURSDAY, JULY 14.

Theme for the Day.—The Children's Hour.

Scripture.—What shall be the ordering of the child, and how shall we do unto him?—Judg. 13:12.

Train up a child in the way he should go, and even when he is old he will not depart from it.—Prov. 22:6.

Come, ye children, hearken unto me; I will teach you the fear of Jehovah.—Ps. 34:11.

Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupation,
That is known as the Children's Hour.
—Longfellow ("The Children's Hour.").

Prayer.—Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. As little children we would come to Thee, for Thou carest for us even as a father for his little ones. We thank Thee for the children in our homes. Thy gifts they are to us, and every day we bring them to Thee in our prayers, that we may know how to bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. We want them to be happy and useful. We want them to know how good a thing life is when it is lived in the fear of God, and the love of the things He approves. May the hours which all the household spends in common work, or study, or pleasure, be the best of the day, and may the evening time bring us the sheltering sense of membership in the Great Family of God. We ask in Jesus' name. Amen.

FRIDAY, JULY 15.

Theme for the Day.—The Death of Moses.

Scripture.—So Moses the servant of Jehovah died there in the land of Moab, according to the word of Jehovah. And he buried him in the valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor: but no man knoweth of his sepulchre even unto this day.—Deut. 34:5, 6.

That was the grandest funeral that ever passed on earth;
But no man heard the tramping or saw the train go forth.
Noiselessly as the daylight comes when the night is done,
And the crimson streak on ocean's cheek grows into the great sun;
Noiselessly as the Springtime her crown of verdure weaves,
And all the trees on all the hills open their thousand leaves;
So, without sound of music, or voice of them that wept,
Silently down from the mountain's crown the great procession swept.
—Mrs. C. F. Alexander ("The Burial of Moses").

Prayer.—Father of life and of love, we look up to Thee today with wonder at the long way through which Thou hast led Thy children. Down the centuries Thou hast brought them, and the story of their journeyings is one continued message of Thy paternal care. Thou art from everlasting to everlasting, and Thy years fail not. One generation goes and another comes, but Thou art evermore the same. Thou buriest Thy workmen, but carriest on Thy work. Grant to us lives of fruitfulness and power, like Thy servant of old. And at evening time may there be light. Amen.

SATURDAY, JULY, 16.

Theme for the Day.—The Craving for the Whole of Life.

Scripture.—He hath set the world in their heart.—Eccl. 3:11.

For all things are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come: all are yours, and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's.—1 Cor. 3:21-23.

I caught the sparrow's note from heaven,
Singing at dawn from the alder bough;
I brought him home, in his nest at even,
He sings the song, but it pleases not now;
For I did not bring home the river and sky;
He sang to my ear,—they sang to my eye.
—Emerson ("Each and All").

Prayer.—Loving Father, we bless Thee for the joy of this new day. We undertake its work with deep thankfulness that we have our appointed tasks and familiar duties. We are grateful for the smallness of the place in which we are set, for it makes our work simpler and less difficult. But we also thank Thee for the breadth of vision which we enjoy because we are Thy children. Thou hast set the world in our hearts. Every interest of human life is somehow made our own in this wide comradeship with all men. In this wholeness of interest we grow like Thyself, and all the world has a share in our affection and concern. Help us to make this a true preparation for the unlimited joys and duties of the life eternal. We pray in Jesus' name. Amen.

A SERIAL STORY

CHAPTER IX.

Mis Mother's Prayer.

When Donald stepped out from the railway station of Brigend in the early morning, he noticed that a strong frost lay over everything. Since this new trouble had fallen upon him, he had found himself much given to brooding. Every voice of nature seemed speaking to him, telling him of something in himself that might have been different had he but been true to his higher nature. As he turned homeward he looked away across the open country. How often had he seen all objects in view dull and blackened in wreaths of murky smoke from tall chimney stacks rising here and there all over the land. Today the silver veil of the frost haze lay over everything and glorified all. How dazzling the white garment looked on the roofs of those cottages, where it lay, soft and delicate as peach bloom, under the level rays of the low sun. And the grass by the wayside, crisp and white, in its inimitable beauty, might well have been dressed by unseen fingers for the footsteps of a fairy bride. How strong it looked, too, in the grasp of the Frost King, just like a proud nature under the rude hand of adversity. But those nasturtiums on that garden hedge! Only yesterday, how brave and young they looked—today blackened and drooping! Ah, the beautiful frost, the strong frost, the cruel frost! What a picture of temptation. Temptation—some men, the strong ones, pass through it and their characters are but glorified. Others, the weak ones, in its breath lie blackened and crushed, even as these tender plants in an early frost. If called upon to express his thoughts, Donald might not have been able to do so—none of us can. For what is thought after all but feeling, that elusive something which cannot be clothed in the rude elements of language.

Donald's reverie was brought to a sudden close by his arrival at his father's shop door. Before he thought of himself he had half stepped in. By a quick glance he noted that work was going on as usual. The youngest apprentice was sweeping out the shop floor, which was well besprinkled with water. James Douglas, and the elder lad were putting up parcels at a great rate for next day's vans. With a sudden flush of shame on his handsome face Donald quickly turned away and hastened round by the back entrance. Jeanie was already in the kitchen helping the maid, Sarah, to get breakfast. She looked up from the basin of eggs she was beating lightly and tried to smile into her brother's questioning eyes.

"You are just in time for breakfast, Donald."

"I had a cup of coffee at a stall before leaving the city, Jeanie. I don't much mind now about breakfast." He left the kitchen as he spoke and she heard his footsteps as he hurried along the passage leading to the dining room.

"These eggs are beaten well enough, Sarah, add half a teaspoonful of finely chopped parsley and six dessert spoonfuls of milk; fry just a light brown, you know." Jeanie spoke as calmly as if she considered breakfast the most important thing on earth. Then she followed Donald into the dining room. softly closing the door behind her she stood for a moment looking at him in silence. She noticed with a pang of regret that he looked haggard and careworn and that the merry light which used to dance in his eyes was gone.

"Donald, why did you go away?"

"Rather, why did you recall me?"

"Did you not know that your flight, as I may call it, was an insult to my friend, Elsie?"

"Not at all. If I mistake not she is not a girl of that sort. She came here for your sake not for mine."

"I know. All the same, was it courteous of you to run away?"

"I suppose not. But knowing me as you do I think you might consider it the best thing I could do. A fellow under a cloud has no right to the society of such a girl as Miss Wallace."

"Many a good man has fallen and risen again. Are you not going to be one of them, Donald?" She spoke so wistfully that his face softened and his eyes glistened as he replied:

"I had hoped so, Jeanie, but everything seems against me."

"Tell me all about it, Donald. I have known since yesterday there is something else wrong. I have seen it in father's face and in yours." He looked at her steadily with that sad smile in his eyes which she had never seen there till the spirit of regret took hold of him.

"Was it for this you wired me home?"

"No, there is something else—I will tell you after breakfast."

"No. You will tell me now. I am weary of suspense, Jeanie. Let me hear what you have to tell, no matter what it is."

"Do not look so distressed, Donald, it may not be anything serious. Mother wants you. It was she who made me wire for you last night."

"Poor mother," he said softly, with white lips. "Could he not have spared her for a week or two?"

"Donald, won't you tell me—has father found out about—the money you lost?" She spoke in a terrified whisper.

"Ask me nothing. Where's mother?" She felt stunned. What new trouble had fallen on Donald? And why did he refuse to tell her, seeing that he had already taken her into his confidence. Ah, but had he told her all? There thoughts flashed through her brain like lightning, and it was in a cold voice she answered:

"Mother has been in bed since early in the evening yesterday." He turned quickly to leave the room. Then he paused, his hand on the door knob.

"Is father downstairs yet?"

"Yes, he and Elsie are in the breakfast room."

"Thanks." The next moment he was bounding upstairs two steps at a stride, his lips firmly shut over set teeth.

Before Jeanie went to the breakfast room she stole away into the kitchen, and pouring some hot water into a basin, she bathed her white face and rubbed it so thoroughly with a bath towel that presently she looked blooming as a rose. When she joined her father and Elsie it was with a smiling face and a laughing apology on her lips—

"Forgive me for having kept you waiting. I am mistress today, you know, in mother's place and of course I have many things to see after."

"Indeed, and you have not kept us waiting at all, my lady Jeanie," laughed Elsie. "I have done the honors in your place, as you can see."

"And a most capable substitute," smiled Mr. Graeme, as he passed his cup for more tea.

"That's just lovely, Elsie; help me too. I have often wished I had a sister. This is one of the things she would be good for."

"If you had no brother as well as no sister, Jeanie, you might have reason to wish. Think of me, without a soul to leave with poor mother save a distant cousin."

"Mony a lass wi' brithers micht hae reason tae envy you, Miss Elsie."

"Well, Mr. Graeme, I would just love to have one, at least."

"Weel maybe somebody else's brither would be just as guid tae you some day. But take my advice, be verra carefu' what kind o' a brither you choose." The girls laughed merrily, as Elsie declared she would certainly follow his advice.

No sooner was breakfast over than Elsie snatched up a duster and ran off to the drawing room. The two girls had decided that such a lovely, frosty morning would turn out a splendid day for cycling. So Elsie declared that the sooner the house could be set in order the better.

Jeanie waited till Elsie had fairly started work upstairs. Then she went into the shop to inquire if the postman had yet come. It was of James Douglas she asked the question. Right well she knew that it was not yet posty's time. But she had another reason for her query. In a low voice she added:

"When the postman comes, James, whether he has letters for me or not, will you come into the breakfast room a few minutes? I want to speak to you." Scarcely raising his eyes from his work he answered:

"Yes, Miss Jeanie."

She was standing looking out into the garden, where the dahlias, with blackened leaves and drooping blooms, leaned earthward, shorn of all their beauty by one night's frost. The moment James entered the room, she turned round eagerly and looked into his eyes with such earnest entreaty in her own, that he blushed up like a girl in her presence, and waited awkwardly for her to speak.

"James, I want you to tell me, what is wrong with Donald."

"What has Donald told you?" he said, quickly recovering his composure.

"That is just it. Donald refuses to tell me. So I want you to do so. Somehow I cannot ask father. He seems too deeply troubled."

"Miss Jeanie, I don't see that you have any right tae bother yersel, aboot buisness maitters. It'll be a' richt soon, ye'll see."

"Then tell me all about it, James. Surely you can trust me. And, oh, do you not know I would do everything possible to save Donald?"

"I know it, Miss Jeanie. But do ye no' ken the auld proverb that says: 'Sorrow's soon enough when it comes'? Ye'l hear this—this thing that Donald's suspected o' soon enough."

"There is nothing so terrible to bear as suspense, James. You have told me too much to draw back now, if you would not break my heart."

"It'll gie ye a sore hert, I know," he took her hands unresistingly in his as he spoke, "but as ye say I hae said too much tae go back, an' believe this, Jeanie, if the whole world were my ain, I would lay it an' my hert along wi' it at yer feet, if it would bring back the glad licht tae yer eyes." She could not mistake the tenderness of his words and manner. But she only drew away her hands gently as she replied with a sad smile:

"You were always one of my best friends, James. As such, I trust you now to tell me the whole truth, whatever it may be. Keep nothing back. I would look on kindness of that sort as the most bitter cruelty."

"Verra weel, Miss Jeanie, I'll tell ye all."

He turned away from her as he spoke and gazed stupidly out of the window. Away along the garden wall under his very eyes, the blackened dahlias hung, but he did not see them. Though he did not look into her face, he was conscious of nothing else but the pain there, while he told her all he knew about the forgery.

When Donald reached the door of his mother's room he paused for a few moments as if too much frightened to enter. For an instant, he raised one hand to his brow, then he turned the door handle softly and entered the holiest place in the home, his mother's room. She seemed asleep as he stole a-tip-toe to her side. How silvery white her hair looked under the lace cap and how pallid was the face, dearer to him as yet than any other on earth. What would he not give to be able to give his mother's loving heart joy, by telling her that her boy had never been guilty of any deed for which that sweet face might have cause to blush. While he stood thus gazing at her she opened her clear, blue eyes and gazed at him as if she would read his very soul. Then raising herself to a sitting posture, she stretched out her arms and the next moment he was sobbing on her breast as he had done many a time in childhood over his boyish troubles. Only for a very brief space did he yield to her embrace. Drawing himself away quietly, and speaking with wonderful calmness he said:

"Lie down, mother dear, you will catch cold, the morning is very frosty." He drew the bed clothes snugly round her and then seated himself on the edge of the bed, facing her. It is well that mothers have never been made elders of the church. Many an erring son has had reason to be thankful for this.

"And now, mother, tell me why you sent for me." Donald spoke in a low voice, and he could not hide the trouble in his eyes from the fond, sad ones looking into them so yearningly.

"First, my son, let me go back a long, long way, and tell you some things that mayhap it would have been wise of me to tell you long ago. You were a child of many prayers, Donald. As you may have heard. Your father and mother were married long years before you were given as a comfort and a joy. Well Donald, in my gratitude to God for his goodness to us, I said that our one son should be a meenister. But when Jeanie came and you had no brother, your father overruled me, saying that his ae son would have to succeed him in the business. I opened my heart to Mr. Sinclair about my desire for you, and his answer was that unless a man felt constrained like Paul, to preach the gospel, he should in no wise be set apart for that high calling. You may remember when you were fifteen I spoke to you about the meenisty—" he merely nodded his head and she continued. "You didn't seem inclined for it. So I yielded to your father's wish and felt satisfied that it was God's will that you should serve Him in a different sphere from that which I had longed to see you in. But I never forgot my son, that a man can be 'diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord.' So, my prayer for you, my son, all along the years has been this: 'Lord, make my son true to Thee—so shall he be true to himself and true to his neighbors.' Has my prayer for you been answered, Donald?" He hung his head and was not ashamed of the tears that fell from his eyes.

"Mother, they may be answered for me, for all time to come."

"Is it the wish of your heart, my boy?"

"Before heaven, it is, mother."

"When did you begin to think about it, dear?" she inquired wistfully.

"For months past, mother, I thought it was Mr. Sinclair who led me to think of pure and good things. Now I know it was your prayer."

"Thank God, my son." He stooped again and kissed her tenderly. The light of hope was once more shining in his eyes.

"Donald, your father told me yestreen about this forgery. I told him I would never believe you guilty. You will tell me the truth now and lift this great load from my heart?" How could he let this dear mother remain in doubt even for Jeanie's sake?

"I knew it, I knew it," she exclaimed in an ecstasy of delight while she clasped her hands in fervent thanksgiving.

"All the same, mother, everything looks black against me. I do not wonder that father suspects me. We know of no one but James Douglas and myself who could go into the office unnoticed."

"Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished. Now leave me, my son. I'll rise and dress myself and eat bread, for the Lord has lifted the burden from my heart."

His mother's faith in him seemed to lift half the burden from Donald's heart, too. He turned away from her presence feeling that the world had still some gleams of brightness for him. The text of scripture his mother had just quoted, seemed to lift the suspicion from Jeanie, that had haunted his brain so doggedly since he had heard of the crime. Jeanie, his true-hearted sister, could never be one of the wicked doomed not to go unpunished. He went down the stair as he thought of it all, and even as her name flashed through his brain, she stood before him. But he had never seen her with that look on her face before, not even when he had confessed to her his folly at the gaming table. She was pale as death. Only her eyes flashed with burning anger as she stood before him on the stair-head and whispered:

"I have heard it all, Donald—the shameful forgery. Did you only tell me of half your debts, when I had to humble myself for your sake?" (To be continued.)

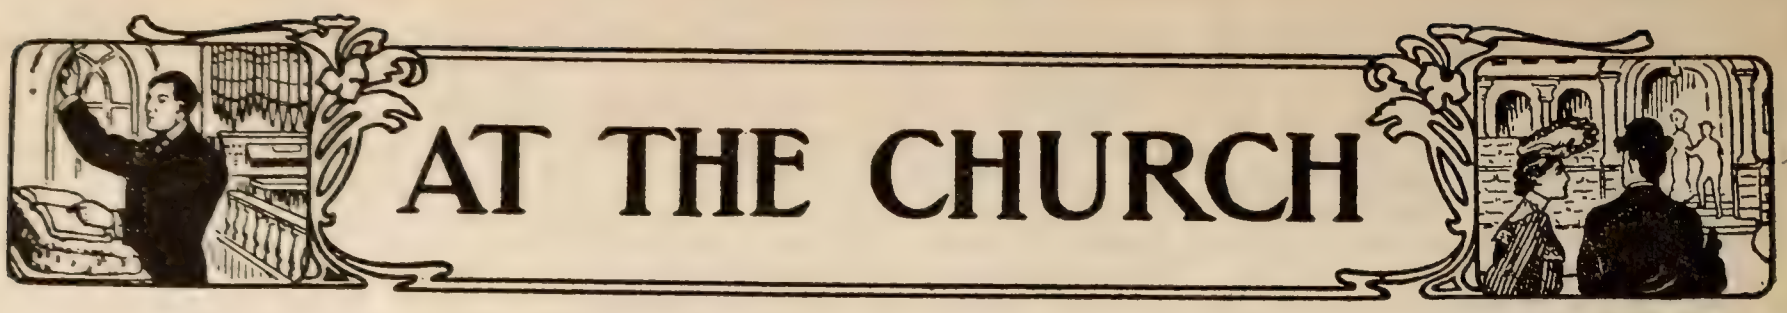
Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES

THE CHRISTIAN USE OF LETTER-WRITING.

Topic, Juy 17. Ps. 45:1; 1 John 2:12-15.

Perhaps the best example of the Christian use of letter writing is seen in the New Testament epistles. Perhaps the most effective form of communication is a heart to heart conversation. In this means the power of personality is brought into play and used most effectively for the advantage of the cause advocated. This, of course, was for a long time the only possible means of communication is heart to heart conversation. Finally characters were employed to represent the sounds employed in language. This enabled communication at long distances. Its efficiency has increased with each passing century until now it is one of the principle means of communication. Writing is used to great advantages in all departments of human activity. In commerce, in industry, in art, in education, and why not in religion? It has been so used in all these things. In the early days of Christianity it was employed with great advantage. In the beginning the workers were few, and letter-writing was one of the chief means employed for the extension of the kingdom. Paul wrote letters to most of the churches which he established. He used them as a means of defending his own character against the defaming Judiziers, to rebuke the sins of the disciples to whom he wrote, to settle disputed, to impart the proper instruction, to strengthen faith—in a word to extend the kingdom. Peter and James did a similar thing. An John tells us, that he wrote the fathers might know Jesus ,to the young men becaues they were strong and had overcome evil, and to the little children that they might know the Father.



Those who came after the apostles did the same things. In these days of persecution which followed letter writing was a great means not only of extending the kingdom but a great source of information as to the movements and fortunes of fellow disciples as the forces of evil pursued them. The missionaries have always used the same means in all their work. They reduce the language of the people with whom they are at work to writing. They then translate the scriptures into the native tongue, cast them broadcast and at the same time send their own vital messages to their fellow-werkors and converts. They are thus enabled to direct the work at long range and greatly multiply their working power.

Why can we not do much the same here in our Christian work? There are those who for some weeks or months, have not been in the Endeavor or chuerh services. Better go and see them if possible. But the next best thing is to write them a warm friendly letter. People like to be told that they have been missed. They know then that you have thought about them, and they must know that you must have thought about them a great deal if you sit down and write them a chatty letter and remind them that you would like to see them at the young people's meeting again. Then there are times when messages of sympathy and condolance are of greatest value. Then there are fellow Christians who have moved away. You may have had doubts as to their Christian loyalty. A good letter saturated with the Christian spirit will do much to strengthen a faith, or quicken a moral resolution.

Christian Union, Etc.

tians compel the elimination of irrelevant and secondary issues. In the last century the missionary appeal of the heathen world has driven the sects into coöperation and into substantial agreement. This tendency has been most apparent where the distress was keenest, namely, on the foreign field. Perhaps the first-hand conflicts of the missionaries fit them to be the best interpreters of Christianity. What these representatives of the church have experienced abroad is being felt deepest now by those who set themselves to deal with the great social evils at home. At it is felt that the very issues of civilization are at stake there will be a closer union of Christian people. There will doubtless be a freer movement of individuals from one denomination to another and a more vital interdenominational organization of all agencies. Of necessity there will come a decadence of the barbarous conception of other churches as non-Christian. Any local congregation which undertakes to deal with the real evils of its community will find itself taking a more kindly and appreciative attitude toward all the earnest people who are willing to coöperate for the common end. In the measure in which it welcomes them to some kind of vital, working relationship will it approve itself to those who test religion by its fruits rather than by its forms and ordi-nances

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

At Caesarea Philippi*

The disciples whom Jesus chose to be his interpreters after his departure, and in regions to which he could not go, spent some three years in this school of preparation for their great life task. They went about with the Lord in a sort of traveling school of the prophets. All the time Jesus was teaching, preaching or healing, he was giving to the disciples his chief attention. Their education in the things of the kingdom was his one great concern.

At the end of this period of instruction, Jesus took them away from the scences of his more hurried work and gave them their examination. It was still uncertain whether they understood sufficiently the nature of our Lord and his work to be trusted with the wirld-wide ministry of evangelization. Did he dare to send them out? Would they know enough of the truth he had taught them to make safe their commission to so great a work?

The School of Christ.

To test this very point Jesus took them to that region far to the north, where they would be beyond the reach of home influences and familiar association. There he could talk with them freely, and they would be inclined to speak with him in free and unconstrained ways.

It would have been easy to set the disciples a formal lesson of instruction concerning the person of Christ and his mission. He could have told them that he was the Messiah, the Son of God, and they would not have questioned it, but would have gone on repeating it to the end of their lives. But would it have meant to them all that Jesus meant it should? Must he not let them work out the great problem for themselves? If they solved it alone, he could trust them never to forget it or miss its significance.

The Land of the Jordan.

So in these northern regions, beyond the borders of Jewish territory, in the section made memorable both by the gushing of the Jordan full-grown from its rocky source, and the worship of the Greek god, Pan, Jesus fell into familiar conversation with the disciples. He spoke of their journeys together, of their many experiences with the people, both in small groups and in multitudes.

He said to them, "You have had much opportunity to know what is in the minds of the people regarding me. What do they say of me? Who do they think I am?" Probably Jesus knew quite as well as the disciples what the people said, and cared very little for the common estimate of his work. But it was an approach to the eternal theme which gave the disciples no hint of the great question that was to follow, or how much the answer to it meant to Jesus.

The Public Opinion.

They answered freely that the people said many things about him. Some thought he was John the Baptist, of whom all had heard, but of whose death not so much was known. Some thought he must be Elijah come again, as the prophecy of Malachi had foretold. Still others believed that Jeremiah or some other Old Testament prophet lived again in the Galilean teacher.

"And what do you think?" said the Master. And in that question he passed from the inconsequential gossip of the highway to the most vital in all his work. It mattered not at all what the people thought of him. Their opinion could easily be corrected in the future. But what the disciples thought, after all those busy months of instructions, was of incalculable importance. The time of Jesus' work was nearly spent. He had only a few days more to tarry with them. Suppose they too could answer in the easy, superficial manner of the multitude. "Oh, we too think you are a great teacher. Perhaps, indeed, you are one of the prophets come back to us; Isaiah or another." Jesus would have known from that reply that the whole fabric of his life work was in ruins. Everything depended on the ability of the disciples to understand and interpret him. With what anxiety, then, must he have waited for their answer.

Peter's Answer.

But that answer came instantly from the lips of the one who might be trusted to speak whenever there was anything to be eaid. That was Peter's chief fault and virtue. He always spoke when there was a chance, and spoke with reflection. What he said could then be trusted to be his most natural and unreflective conviction. And what he said in such haste the other disciples could be counted on to believe. Only they were not so free of speech as he.

With what joy then must Jesus have heard the outspoken fisherman declare, "We know who you are. You are the promised Messiah, the Son of God who came into the world." The Master, in sheer joy at the confidence with which Peter affirmed this truth, exclaimed, "Blessed art thou, Simon, son of John for no man has told you of this; but my Father in heaven." Jesus did not mean that Peter had received a revelation but that the very work of Christ in the world had been the Father's means of making known to men the Son of his live. There is something pathetic about the joy with which Jesus hailed the assurance of Peter and the other disciples that he was the divine Savior who should come into the world. To find himself thus believed was a satisfaction beyond all further question.

Jesus' Blessing.

Then Jesus hastened to say to Peter that his confession was worthy of more than passing note. As he had been the first to express his confidence in Jesus' divine leadership, so he should be the first to make that truth known to all men. His name was "Peter," a stone. So the truth which he had uttered was like a "rock," unshaken and eternal, the truth of the divine mission of the Savior. Against the powers of death and the grave it was to stand forever.

Peter's Commendation and Rebuke.

Of course, Jesus conferred on Peter no power that the other disciples did not share. Nor did any of the disciples have any authority save that of witnesses to make known to all men the facts that Jesus came to reveal. The church has tried to make out some sort of succession from Peter, but quite in vain. All the pretensions of Rome are but fictions. It is not the apostolic succession for which the world cares, but the apostolic successess. That is the one thing needful today, the spirit which made those first witnesees so mighty as interpreters of the Lord.

If one wishes an example of the mistakes that the disciples made concerning the Lord, we have it in this very study. Knowing that he could trust them now, Jesus felt that he ought to tell them of the sufferings that were soon to fall upon him at the hands of the Jewish authorities. Peter could not endure such a disappointment to all of their hopes. The expectant was too full of joy for the twelve to give up their interest in the political dreams of the time. Peter protested that such a program as Jesus had mentioned was out of all adjustment with the plans they had in view.

Then the Master turned upon him with such severity as must have withered his freshly budding ambitions. Jesus told him that he understood the plans of men, the selfish ambitions of politicians, but not the world-wide ideals of the kingdom of God. The Roman church has sounded out the words of honor to Peter, but has conveniently forgotten this rebuke to the same disciple. The Master's scorching and indignant reproof, in which he spoke of Peter's hopes as a temptation of the devil, are as true a part of the Savior's teaching as the words of commendation.

Taking Up the Cross.

The final section of the lesson reveals something of the sacrificial nature of the work of Christ. The cross is no mere ornament, but a true symbol of the great passion that Jesus brought among men. In the age when men were most eager to rule the world by power of gold, there came One who cared for neither, but only wished to give humanity a new vision of life. He told men that if they really wanted to live, they must give up the things on which most people set their hearts. He meant by this that true success and happiness are found only in love. sympathy and service. Men have not yet learned that lesson, but they come to see its value in ever clearer forms.

The Son of Man said that he would come not only in the humble guise of a teacher but as a leader of the powers of God in the world; and that those who were then living in the world would see the beginning of his coming. That marvel the disciples saw in the starting forces of the new age soon after the day in which Jesus talked with them at Caesarea Philippi. Since that time he has been coming year by year in the growth of human ideals, the pervasion of the world with his purposes, and the triumph of his spirit among men. And still he comes, as we give him place and room; and still the truth he taught becomes clearer, that whoever should gain the whole world but lose his life, his chance of working with God, would be the loser beyond all reckoning.

Church Life

—The sane "Fourth," did you spend it so?

—The author of the article, "Christian Union in the Local Congregation" says that it at least has the advantage of being "based upon reality." It is a noteworthy contribution to the problem of union.

—The first letter from Editor C. C. Morrison, appears in this number of the paper. It will be a pleasure for the readers to follow these descriptions of the great interdenominational missionary meeting at Edinburgh.

A second letter is received just as we are making ready for the press, and we take out other interesting material making room for Mr. Morrison's description of the great meetings of this world conference on the world conquest.

—The reduction of the number of pages issued each week is made only for the vacation months. There will be no depreciation in the quality of material offered our readers, indeed, because of the limited space we shall have to be all the more discriminating. News items should be brief and real news. Contributors will be asked to "boil down" their articles.

D. B. Titus who is holding an evangelistic meeting at Twin Falls, Idaho, dedicated the new building of the church June 12. W. L. McCullough, pastor of the church is just recovering from a serious operation.

W. A. Moore, of Tacoma, preached the baccalaureate sermon at the Ellensburg State Normal School on June 12. His pulpit was filled in the morning by W. F. Cowden, and in the evening by R. C. Sargent.

The Christian Temple Sunday-school, Baltimore, Md., Peter Ainslie minister, made a Children's Day offering of $457.13, which goes toward the support of Miss Edna P. Dale, Wuhu, China, their living link.

The Central Sunday-school, Indianapolis, Ind., gave a handsome Childreu's Day offering of $348.66. A. B. Philputt is the minister. The church supports Dr. M. E. Poland, Nantungchow, China.

The church and Sunday-sc[illegible] at St. Augustine, Ill., gave $125 fo[illegible] missions. This is far more than [illegible]r been received from this church befo[illegible] N. L. Collins is the minister.

The Foreign Society has received forty gifts on the Annuity Plan from as many friends in the state of Ohio, and the gifts amount to $44,205. This sum will be increased.

A new church is to be erected at LeRoy, Ill. The excavation is already about completed. The membership of the church numbers about 300, and they will erect a $20,000 house of worship.

The First Church, Springfield, Ill., held its last meeting in the old building Sunday evening, June 26. While the new $100,000 building is being erected the congregation will hold its meetings in the Masonic Temple.

J. F. Findley, recently of Fort Collins, Colo., attended the New York state convention at Rochester, enroute to New York, whence he sailed for Europe the first of July.

C. E. Elmore, state evangelist, has just closed a meeting with the church at Sumter, S. C., of which Mark S. Peckham is the pastor. There were sixteen additions to the church during the meeting.

N. H. Robertson, after four and one-half yaers of unusually successful work at Colfax, Ill., has resigned to accept a call to another church. We are not as yet informed as to name of this church.

L. E. Murray who has been supplying the pulpit of the Vermont Avenue Church, Washington, D. C., during the protracted illness of F. D. Power, goes from there to Anderson, Ind., where he will supply temporarily.

At the Memorial church, Chicago, June 30, Mrs. Lulu Tyler Gates gave "The Fortune Hunter," under the auspices of the Christian Endeavor Society. The entertainment was for the benefit of the piano fund of the Chicago Baptist Hospital.

The church at El Paso, Texas, has combined the Sunday-school and the morning preaching service. The sermon follows immediately after the study period and there is an organ interlude between sermon and communion service.

The Lyons Street Church Grand Rapids, Mich., has called Thomas Adams of Bethany, Neb., to succeed E. B. Barnes, who goes to Richmond, Ky. Mr. Adams has accepted the call and will take up his new task sometime in August.

The new treasurer of the Foreign Society, C. W. Plopper, has filed his bond, and now has his hand on the throttle. He ranks high as an accountant, and is a business and Christian man of the highest integrity. He has been with the Foreign Society nearly ten years.

The annual meeting of the Arlington Street Church, Watertown, N. Y., H. H. Cushing pastor, was held June 21. Reports showed twenty-two accessions during the year, an increase of twenty-five per cent in Sunday-school attendance, church debt reduced and a general good feeling in the church.

The First Church, Fresno, Cal., Ray O. Miller pastor, besides current expenses has raised the following sums during the current year: Foreign missions, $600; C. W. B. M., $250; benevolence, $125; Bible-school work, $85; state work, $300; besides debt on the parsonage of $1,320. Mr. Miller supplies for the First Church, San Francisco during July.

Dr. Herbert L. Willett on his lecture trip through the West made a brief stay in Denver, Colo. While there he addressed on Wednesday evening a union meeting of all the Christian churches in Denver. His subject was "The Work of the Disciples in the New Century." Dr. and Mrs. Willett returned to Chicago July 4.

The Twenty-second Annual Convention of the churches of southern California will be held July 27-August 7, at Long Beach. C. W. B. M. has July 27-29; Brotherhood day, July 30; union meeting of Christian convention and Baptist Assembly, July 31; Bible-school, August 4; Ministerial and Educational Day, August 5; Christian Endeavor Day, August 6.

During July F. F. Walters, pastor of the First Church, Joplin, Mo., is preaching the following series of Sunday morning sermons: "The Shepherd Psalm," "The Shepherd Lord," "The Shepherd's Out of Doors," "The Shepherds' Banquet," "The Shepherds' Escorts." Mr. Walters is having large audiences. The music of the church has been in charge of Frank J. Held whom Mr. Walters commends for evangelistic singing.

Charles M. Fillmore, Indianapolis, Ind., has written an article on the control of the liquor traffic, which he calls "The Conflict of the Ages." The article won a $50 prize offered by Charles Eckart, Auburn, Ind. The article was published in "Clean Politics," of which Mr. Fillmore is editorial contributor. The Hillside Church of which Mr. Fillmore is pastor, is entering upon a campaign for building a new church.

The returns from Children's Day are simply great. The children gave $49,968 in the month of June, a gain of $16,519 over the corresponding month last year or about 48 per cent. The schools can reach $100,000 and we believe they will before September 30. If you have not already done so please send your offering today. More schools are giving than ever before. There has been a gain in the number of contributing schools of 348.

The church at Blandinsville, Ill., is making an unusually good summer record. The Bible-school average attendance for June, 250; 360 being the highest and 227 the lowest, for the month. The preaching services are well attended. Children's Day was celebrated by music furnished by the children, and a sermon adressed to chilren. The pastor's men's Bible class now enrolls over 150, with an average attendance of over ninety. C. R. Wolford is pastor.

The East End Church, Pittsburg, J. R. Ewers, minister, will have morning service only, during the month of July. The bulletin board of the church bears this notice: "Studies in Social Relations." July 3, "Myself"; July 10, "My Family"; July 17, "My Business"; July 24, "My Social Set"; July 31, "My Church." This church has just raised $1,200 for foreign missions. During the summer the church will be completely repaired and a gymnasium put in.

The calendar of the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, announces the following sermons to be delivered by the pastor, Edward Scribner Ames, during the month of July: "Education and Patriotism"; "The Stranger Within the Gates." "The Passion Play"; "The Providence of God." Mr. Ames will be absent from the pulpit during August and September, but there will be no interruption in either the Sunday-school or the church services.

Harry Foster Burns, acting editor of the Christian Century during the absence of the editor-in-chief, is supplying the pulpit of the "Union Church in Christ," Monroe, Wis. This is the pioneer union movement between the Baptists and Disciples, and is working perfectly. There is a fine union spirit in the church, and a firm belief in the possibility of the extension of the good work to other cities. The Sunday-school of this church has recently introduced the Bethany Graded Lessons over which the teachers are already enthusiastic.

"Children's Day observed by the church at Troy, N. Y., June 12. Offering $330, which will be divided between Foreign and State Societies. Cecil J. Armstrong is pastor.

In the absence of Dr. Willett from the Memorial pulpit, Chicago, June 19, Arthur J. Hall, director of Religious Education in the church, preached morning and evening.

John Ray Ewers, pastor of the East End Church, Pittsburg, gave an address before the iPttsburg social union banquet on "The Kansas City Plan of Church Co-operation." The banquet was held June 25.

Perry J. Rice, pastor of the church in El Paso, Tex., recently preached a sermon which given large space and very favorable editorial comment by the local press. The preceding week a prominent business man had been shot by his landlord in a quarrel about the non-payment of rent. The victim who was usually prompt in his payments had gambled at the races and lost and was therefore unable to meet his business obligations. Mr. Rice forcefully placed blame upon the heads of all who had favored the race track for the city, and by his directness and courage caused a stir of conscience that went into every home of the city. Such is the high calling of the minister.

The church at Angola, Ind., laid the cornerstone of their new building, Sunday, June 27, at five o'clock in the afternoon. In the procession that moved from the "square" to the building site were members of the G. A. R., Woman's Relief Corps, King's Daughters, Masonic Lodge, Order of Eastern Star, Odd Fellows, Rebekahs, Knights of Pythias, Pythian Sisters, and Company B., Third Regiment Indiana National Guards. Pastors of the other churches of the city were given place on the program. The principal address was delivered by L. E. Brown, pastor at Lebanon, Ind., and president of the Indiana Christian Missionary Convention. Vernon Stauffer is pastor of this prosperous church. It is expected that the building will be ready for dedication about November 1.

William D. Ryan, for four and one-half years pastor of the First Church, Ashland, Ky., surprised his congregation Sunday, June 26, by reading his resignation, to take effect September 1. A local paper says: "Mrs. Ryan has won a warm place in the hearts of all the people of Ashland, and is without doubt one of the most brilliant preachers in the state." Mr. Ryan is a graduate of Drake and Yale Universities. During the term of Mr. Ryan's service in Ashland 258 persons have been added to the membership of the church, a new parsoange built, and a lot purchased for a new church building, toward which $12,000 has been pledged. The plans adopted look the erection of a $40,000 building. Mr. Ryan has made no announcement of his future plans.

The church at Eureka, Ill., has adopted the following report of its committee on plan of benevolent offering:

1. That the church adopt the plan of weekly pledges, to run for one year, for all benevolences.

2. That the benevolent fund on hand at the end of each quarter, not otherwise designated, be pro rated according to a per cent found by averaging the offering to our general board for the past four years.

4. That the executive committee of the board appoint a missionary committee of three who shall have the general charge of dividing the membership in blocks of 12, one or two of each block to be responsible for the pledges of his block. This general committee is to have full oversight of all benevolent offerings.

5. That the "duplex envelope" be adopted.

The Front Rank Statement

Front Rank Certificates have been issued to the following states for the number of Schools indicated: Indiana, 8; Oregon, 4; Colorado, 3; Iowa, 2; Illinois, 1. Total, 18. Many other applications are at hand which show some slight incompleteness concerning which the applicants have been notified, and in most of the cases the schools are rapidly making the record complete. All applications should be made through the State Bible School Superintendent if possible.—ROBT. M. Hopkins, Bible School Secretary, American Christian Missionary Society.

A Mission Prayer Circle

The National Bible School Secretary has issued a Mission Prayer Cycle which will give definite topics for prayer throughout the year. The topics are ready for the last six months for 1910, and will be devoted to American Missions embracing the day for the offering. The first six months of 1911 will be devoted to Foreign Missions including Children's Day in June. Every Bible School is urged to use this Cycle even though your gifts are small you can surely pray that the gospel may be preached in all the world. The topics for July are "The Evangelization of America that the World May be Won to Christ"; "The Great Need for Laborers"; "Our Colleges where Our Laborers are Trained"; "The Immigrants coming to Our Land"; "The Slums of the Great Cities."

Use the definite topic as announced for the day in the Bible School service. It will be found best to call on some person in advance for this special prayer in order that it may be an intelligent and effective one. Have the prayer very brief and pointed and if possible in the opening exercise in order that the teacher may explain it to members of the class who may not understand. The Missionary Committee should see that the topic for the day is conspicuously posted on the blackboard or bulletin board. Encourage the school to pray individually for the same topic each day during the week.

A leaflet containing further suggestions and helpful explanations of the topics may be had free upon application to the Bible School Secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society. Let every school join in this united circle of prayer on each Lords Day for these' definite requests of our Father in Heaven.

ROBT. M. HOPKINS, Bible School Secretary American Christian Missionary Society.

Mrs. Elizabeth Schnell

On May 2, we laid to rest our long time friend, Mrs. Elizabeth Layman Schnell, wife of Professor H. S. Schnell of Indianapolis, Indiana. Death had made our hearts sad, our touch tender, and our every service sacred. We left her sleeping under a profusion of flowers, the tokens tributes of love, that now spoke in symbol the life she had lived. Our tongues were dumb, our sight seemed to fail us, utterly and our reasoning had lost her cunning. Faith only remained undaunted, erect, amid the runis of life's hopes. Sight told us that our friend had gone on alone and that we must return without her; but it was not so. Our paths may separate but our lives, like rivers joined must run on together until the end. In this instance it is well, for her life was a pure limpid stream. She had a genius for goodness; an atmosphere refreshing, a nature that was sunshine, a magnetic circle that drew a host of friends from every walk of life, holding them fast she thue went forth to "Join the choir invisible,

Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence;
Feed pure love;
Beget the smiles that have no cruelty.
To be the sweet presence of a good diffused
And in diffusion evermore intense."

Franklin, Indiana. WILLIAM MULLENDORE,

From the Chairman of the Committee on Unification

To the Editor of the Christian Century:

My attention has been called to the suggestion occurring once or twice in the papers, and also made in private correspondence by different individuals, as well as at least by two of the general Boards, that the committee of seven on unification should report its findings to the public through the papers before the meeting of the general convention at Topeka. I beg to be allowed to say for the committee, through the columns of your paper, that the matter of making the report of the committee public was fully discussed at our last meeting and it was decided that as we were a committee of the general convention it would not be proper to give publicity to our report pending the meetingof that body. We were the more disposed to this as the two or three most important matters embraced in the committee's report were already subjects of public discussion.

In view of the great interests involved, however, and to avoid any misinterpretation of motives, I may, as chairman of the committee, I think, state that the report will recommend a general convention of the Churches of Christ to which the various missionary organizations shall report and to which they shall be responsible. This general convention shall be a delegate body, giving it not only moral but legal sanction and enabling it to properly supervise all the missionary and philanthropic interests of the church. As to the reductin in the number f general missionary organizations, the committee will recommend that there be a foreign, a home, and a woman's society with one great annual offering for each from the churches and also from the Sunday Schools. The rest of the report consists of details that would be of only secondary interest to the brotherhood at this time. The great questions are, do the churches want a general convention with delegated powers as such, and do they want a reduction of the number of our missionary societies and offerings? If they do, all details can be easily arranged. If they do not, then there is nothing to arrange.

ALLAN B. PHILPUTT.

Indianapolis, Ind., June 30, 1910.

Regarding the Centennial Report

Several inquiries regarding the Publisher's Note in the Centennial Convention Report have reached me.

As it was necessary to discontinue the Centennial Bureau as soon as possible after the convention, proposals were asked from several publishing houses on taking over the manufacture, marketing and ownership of the book. The bid from the Standard Publishing Company was $1100 better than the next and was the only one that met the expenses incurred in the volume's preparation.

In the negotiations between Brother Errett and the undersigned it was agreed that the introduction should relieve the Standard Publishing Company of responsibility for some of the book's contents. In my judgment, the introduction covered this point.

On account of Brother Errett's absence from Cincinnati just at that time, it was about six weeks after the introduction was sent in before I learned, by receiving proof of the publisher's note, that he felt it necessary to make a special statement.

To avoid keeping the advance subscribers waiting longer for their books and inasmuch as the note simply reiterated over the publisher's own signature his well-known opposition to the speakers named, the matter was allowed to pass without being referred to the other members of the committee.

The Montana Convention

The Montana Christian Missionary Convention was held in the Shortridge Memorial Church in Butte, June 14-17. If not the largest and best it was certainly one of the largest and best ever held in the state. There was in attendance from outside Butte, more than sixty delegates. This will seem small to those who are accustomed to larger things, but to those of us who have for years been far out on the firing line, it seems large. The spirit of the ocnvention was fine—all that could be desired. Optimism was in the air. Good-fellowship was all-prevading. Not a frown was seen on any face. Not a cross word was spoken. Every office and honor received was unsought.

The report of Secretary Raum was the best evvery heard in a Montana convention. In the results achieved and monies raised all previous records were broken. The amount of money raised quadrupled the amount raised last year. Under his preaching more than 100 persons were brought into the churches of the state. Two new churches were organized and five fine preachers located. Fifteen fine openings for new work in the state were reported.

Under the inspiration of the work done and the opportunities for still larger things the convention laid larger plans. A little less than $2,000 was raised the past year. The churches and Sunday schools represented resolved to double this next year. It is almost a certainty that this will be done. If, as it is hoped the A. C. M. S. will double the amount raised, Montana ought to have $6,000 to $8,000 with which to enter her open doors this year. What these open doors are like can be appreciated only by the informed. Montana is just being discovered. For purposes of their own the railroads have had her hidden under a bushel. They are taking her out now and setting her on a hill where she is rapidly becoming the synosure of all eyes. It has just been discovered that she has the finest climate, the richest soil and the most of both of any other spot of the same size in the world, and a constant and constantly increasing stream of home seekers is flowing into her. Recently one train dropped 900 settlers at one station in Eastern Montana. Where two years ago there was only vivrvgin soil there are today towns of from 500 to 2,500. It was resolvved in the convention to try to turn our people in this directoni. An empire is in building. Let us get in on the ground floor. The local conditions are most favorable. Raum is a whole team in himself, and the churches are well manned. One could not but be impressed with the fact that the work in Montana is in the hands of clean and capable men.

The two notes sounded in the convention were permanency and progress. Long pastorates and long strides were the two things urged.

The program was a good one, covering a wide but fertile field. It was a little too lengthy and too crowded for the best results, however.

Our visitors from abroad, the best known of whom were Doctor McCash, Mrs. Atwater and J. H. Mohorter, were much appreciated contributors to the success of the convention.

The next convention goes to Corvalis which is situated in the midst of the famous Bitterroot Valley near Missoula. W. H. BAGBY.

You Can Have a Model Kitchen as cool and white as a dairy. No smell, no smoke, no heat, no dust. No old-fashioned contrivances. The

New Perfection
WICK BLUE FLAME

is the latest practical, scientific cook-stove. It will cook the most elaborate dinner without heating the kitchen.

Boils, bakes, or roasts better than any range. Ready in a second. Extinguished in a second. Fitted with Cabinet Top, with collapsible rests, towel rack, and every up-to-date feature imaginable. You want it, because it will cook any dinner and not heat the room. No heat, no smell, no smoke, no coal to bring in, no ashes to carry out. It does away with the drudgery of cooking, and makes it a pleasure. Women with the light touch for pastry especially appreciate it, because they can immediately have a quick fire, simply by turning a handle. No half-hour preparation. It not only is less trouble than coal, but it costs less. Absolutely no smell, no smoke; and it doesn't heat the kitchen.

Cautionary Note: Be sure you get this stove—see that the name-plate reads "New Perfection."

The nickel finish, with the turquoise blue of the enameled chimneys, makes the stove ornamental and attractive. Made with 1, 2 and 3 burners; the 2 and 3-burner stoves can be had with or without Cabinet.

THE BETHANY GRADED SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

INTERNATIONAL COURSE

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR

Purpose—The purpose of the Graded Lessons is: To meet the spiritual needs of the pupil in each stage of his development. The spiritual needs broadly stated are these:
1. To know God as he has revealed himself to us in nature, in the heart of man, and in Christ..... 2. To exercise toward God, the Father, and his Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, trust, obedience, and worship..... 3. To know and to do our duty to others..... 4. To know and do our duty to ourselves.

COURSES	Age of Pupils	AIM	PUBLICATIONS
BEGINNERS		To lead the little child to the Father by helping him: 1. To know God, the heavenly Father, who loves him, provides for, and protects him. 2. To know Jesus the Son of God, who became a little Child, who went about doing good, and who is the Friend and Saviour of little children. 3. To know about the heavenly home. 4. To distinguish between right and wrong. 5. To know his love for God by working with him and for others.	Lessons prepared by FRANCES W. DANIELSON

Second Year	5		Teachers' Text Book—Part I, II, III, IV Large Pictures (9x12 inches) Beginners' Stories—(Illustrated folder for pupils) Part I, II, III, IV	Ready (October, 1910)
PRIMARY		To lead the child to know the heavenly Father, and to inspire within him a desire to live as God's child: 1. To show forth God's power, love, and care, and to awaken within the child responsive love, trust, and obedience. 2. To build upon the teachings of the first year (1) by showing ways in which children may express their love, trust, and obedience; (2) by showing Jesus the Saviour, in his love and work for men; and (3) by showing how helpers of Jesus and others learn to do God's will. 3. To build upon the work of the first and second year by telling (1) about the people who chose to do God's will; (2) how Jesus, by his life and words, death and resurrection, revealed the Father's love and will for us; (3 such stories as will make a strong appeal to the child and arouse within him a desire to choose and to do that which God requires of him.	Lessons prepared by MARION THOMAS
First Year .	6		Teachers' Text Book, Part I, II, III, IV (With picture supplement) Primary Stories—(Illustrated folder for pupils)—Part I, II, III, IV	Ready

The Curriculum Outlined Above Furnishes a Comprehensive Course of Religious Instruction

Comprising as it does not only the biographies, history, literature, and teachings of the Bible, but also lessons on the history and heroes of the Christian Church, of missionary enterprises, philanthropic movements, and moral reforms.

In order that the truths taught may be assimilated and the spirit and qualities of Christian character developed, various forms of self-expression are suggested, beginning with simple hand-work done by the little child, and culminating in important lines of Christian service possible to young men and women.

The series of lessons for each year begins in October, and the work that is essential to the completion of the aim and the integrity of the course as a whole, is found in the nine months corresponding to the public school year—October to June. The lessons for the remaining three months of each year are valuable in themselves, and either supplement the work of the preceding months, or prepare for that of the following year.

The courses for each grade or year are permanent and will be available for use in the same grade with successive classes each year.

The Lessons for the Summer Quarter beginning July 3, will prepare the school for the greatly enriched course beginning October 1. Send today for order blanks and samples.

Important Statement.

If young men who can preach acceptably, and wish to make further preparation for their work, would have faith enough to come here and enter school, they would be able to get preaching points in a short time. There are a hundred churches or more within reach of the school that are now ready, or could be worked up by a little effort, to support ministerial students.

Oratory is Not Dead.

Who said oratory is a lost art? Some days ago, when the island of Porto Rico was under discussion in the house of representatives, a Kentucky congressman concluded a speech thus: "It is for this little spot, nestling in the southern seas, we are legislating; it is earth's mirror of Eden—the photograph of the beautiful Isle of Somewhere, described in song. It is before us as a tiny infant stretching forth its arms, pleading to be lifted up into the bosom of the mother country. For myself I am unwilling to see this little island ever feel the grinding heel of the oppressor again." (Loud applause.) This little gem, like the sparkling tail of a skyrocket, lights up the gloom of the Congressional Record, and makes us feel with Keats that the poetry of earth is never dead.

SOMEWHERE

Where Are the Great Spirits Who Have Entered into Life?

There took place in this city the other day a ceremony that had an impressiveness beyond the ordinary meaning of such events. It was only the act of laying the cornerstone of a new building. To be sure the building is to be massive, costly, serviceable. But so are many other structures. It is to be dedicated to the work of education. But that too is a commonplace in these days. It is a memorial edifice. But that is not unusual.

What made that cornerstone laying a matter of special note was the life and character of the man for whom the building is to be named. Standing in the presence of that newly-founded structure, one was compelled to take fresh inventory of the life of which it is to speak to generations that are yet to come.

There is a kind of immortality which is conferred by loving memory and public regard. A noble building, like this, or a costly shaft, or any work of art or of utility, gives a man a certain title to the future. And then there is the survivorship of character. A man lives on after death in the good work he has done. In such a mood George Eliot speaks of the

"The choir invisible of those immortal dead
Who live again in souls made better by their presence."

Yet nothing of this satisfies the mind that seeks to grapple seriously with the problem of being, and to penetrate in some measure the mystery of the future. And it was just here that the lesson of that cornerstone service became impressive. We had known the man of whom the building was to speak. His eager and compelling mind had given us all new visions of the splendor of the soul of man. In large degrees he had made us what we were, and when he left us it seemed as if the world had changed its motion.

Where was he in that solemn moment when we stood with uncovered head to hear the ritual of burial, or again when we saw the stone move into its appointed place, bearing its treasured story of his life and deeds? In what room of all the Father's house is he at work today, with his tireless and commandnig passion for supreme achievement? With what new and loftier enterprises is he now concerned, he who hurried on and left us panting and breathless half a world behind?

In the presence of such a life the theory that death ends all becomes of all philosophies the least convincing. If such a spirit as his can go out into the darkness with no further search for knowledge, and no further quest of high and noble effort, than there is no sense nor rhythm in the harmony of life; and nature, that seems so provident and jealous of all that she has formed, would be the most wasteful of spendthrifts.

There are many voices that grow insistent in the assertion that life cannot survive the decay of the flesh. And one cannot easily escape the pull of materialism when the obvious and calculable assets of bone and nerve and fluid are reckoned up. What else is there? asks the student of tissues and joints. How can there be a melody after the harp has fallen into fragments?

Yet in spite of the baffling mystery, before which science stands questioning or skeptical, there remains the larger problem of personality, and its persistence. Somehow, quite aside from the affirmations of our holy faith, there remains the feeling that what had begun with such promise and continued with such power cannot come to such a pathetic end.

It is the necessity of nature and of the great economies of life that the enterprises of the soul should not be like the passing amusements of idle and purposeless children. God does not mock our lives with such vain fancies. There must be a pathway through the wood. The solemn promises that nature and God have made to the soul must needs be kept. Shall not the judge of all the earth do right?

And so one comes back to that wonderful story of the Garden and the Tomb. It is not very clear, and there have been many questions as to the manner of the event. But in the light of the great imperatives of the universe and of the wise and provident character of nature and of God, it seems as if that story is not only the divinest but the truest of the ages. In what manner Jesus made himself known to the disciples we cannot be sure. The very wonder of the event made the words of the witnesses tremulous and vibrant. But the fact was beyond all questioning. They know now both the certainty and necessity of the life to be. "If it were not so, I would have told you."

The return of Jesus in such a manner as to convince the disciples that he had conquered death, is the confirmation of that divine necessity in the life of man that death is not the end, and that the economies of God may be trusted. The fact of survivorship is then but a question of character. The life that is worth continuance will not be frustrated.

The time and manner of that entrance into life must remain a part of the riddle for whose explanation there is as yet no speech nor language. But the certainty remains. Regarding it the Master speaks with an emphasis that is not to be mistaken, and Paul and all the saints affirm, "We know."

And in the meantime what of these great spirits who have entered into life? Is it possible for us to follow them in the mysterious journey that they take? No. The program of the life to be has never been issued in any language of earth. It is enough to know that we shall receive a copy when the light is sufficient so that we can see to read it.

Shall we know our friends in heaven? Why not? We know them here. Shall we know less when life has been made perfect?

Do they know us now, and are they still concerned in the life and the struggles we endure? Why not? If there is any lessening of the bonds that unite us and them it can only be because of divergences of character that tend always to separate.

May we pray for them? Why not? If they went upon a journey here did we not lift for them the incense of unceasing prayer? Why should we cease to remember them before the throne of God, now that they have fared forth upon a longer way?

And so one comes back to that simple service of the cornerstone and stands anew with reverence and thankfulness before it. For it has made more real some of the great truths of the Christian faith. They seem not so much the words of authority now as the solemn assurances of all the universe. And somewhere in that universe, at work in high and holy tasks, that friend and leader is today; and companionship is not severed, and prayer has a new meaning as one thinks of him.

How can I cease to pray for thee? Somewhere
In God's great universe thou art today.
Can He not reach thee with his tender care?
Can He not hear me when for thee I pray?
What matters it to Him who holds within
The hollow of His hand all worlds, all space,
That thou art done with earthly pain and sin?
Somewhere within His ken thou hast a place.
Somewhere thou livest and hast need of Him;
Somewhere thy soul sees higher heights to climb
And somewhere still there may be valleys dim
That thou must pass to reach the hills sublime
Then all the more because thou canst not hear
Poor human words of blessing, will I pray;
O true, brave heart, God bless thee, wheresoe'es
In his great universe thou art today.

A Saner Fourth

A new manner of celebrating the Fourth of July has come into use this year in many places, greatly to the improvement of the occasion, and the avoidance of those boisterous and ear-splitting demonstrations which have usually disgraced rather than honored Independence Day. The annual death-roll from accidents, and the damage to property resulting from needless fires, have awakened the nation to the senseless character of much of the Fourth of July hilarity of the past. There is very little patriotism exhibited in the burning of powder, the racking of nerves, the conflagrations, the maiming and deaths that have so largely held carnival in connection with the nation's birthday. That sort of thing is nearer pat-riotism than patriotism. This year the movement for a "sane Fourth" so far took form that many communities entirely forbade the use of the more dangerous kinds of explosives and resorted to more temperate measures in the observance of the day. In this city a great military and civic parade was held, in which the different divisions of the army and navy were brought under the public notice. Troops were brought to Chicago from the forts within reach, naval reserves were called out, the state and city governments were represented, the different industries came out in companies, and floats gave fitting illustration of the discovery, history and development of the city, state and nation. The educational value of the day was very great, the noise of the usual sort was reduced to the minimum, and the entire community breathed a sigh of relief at the passing of old barbarism in connection with the Fourth. It is probable that both state and city enactments will be provided within the year forbidding all return to the danger and riot of the former time.

A Disgraceful Incident

The disgraceful incident that took place at Reno, Nevada, on the Fourth has one or two encouraging features to cheer the hearts of decent people. The state of California, that has hitherto been the ground of prize fighting almost without restraint, went distinctly on record, by the courageous action of its governor, as unwilling to bear longer the stigma of such events. The promoters of the fight were compelled to go to Nevada, the last of the states to consent to the desecration of its fair name by this relic of barbarism. But there are encouraging signs that even Nevada is by no means willing to remain in this solitary disgrace of holding its door open to divorce scandals and prize-ring brutalities. The better class of its people are militant in their demand that these iniquities shall cease. It is not too much to hope that America has seen the last of such affairs as made use of the nation's birthday to give two toughs the dismal privilege of knocking each other into the scrap pile. Not the least of the evil effects of such incidents is seen in the race hatred stirred up throughout the nation by this battle beween a white and a black. Were the unhappy effects confined to the place of the fight, it would even then have been bad enough. But when it is proposed to duplicate the exhibition in all parts of the land by means of the moving pictures, the results for demoralization go beyond conjecture. The mayors of many cities and the governors of several of the states are already on record as opposed to any permission to put the pictures on display. If the citizens who love decency will uphold the hands of such officials, a blow may be dealt that will go far to send the whole brutal business into the limbo of disgrace and oblivion.

The Centennial Report

We wish to say to the large number of correspondents who have written indignant protests against the character of the so-called "Centennial Report" of the Pittsburgh Convention, that we think no further comment need be made upon the matter. The petty animus of the publisher's note is both characteristic and amusing. As pointed out by most of those who have written us, the real responsibility for the publication of such a volume and by such a house lies with the Centennial Secretary. Members of the Centennial Committee have written, and in person have voiced, the most explicit and emphatic disapproval of the affair. Bro. Warren is incapable of any designing or unworthy motive in connection with the report. It is the more needful therefore that he should make such explanation as the facts warrant concerning an episode that is little less than a brotherhood disgrace. The statement made last week that the vote was allowed to go in without the approval of the Centennial Committee in order to save time can satisfy neither the Committee nor the readers of the book. The only members of our brotherhood who have not suffered from this farcical ending of a notable gathering are the two men whose utterances are singled out for emphasis in the volume. Malice, like ambition, sometimes "o'erleaps itself, and falls on the other side."

Religious Education: Why Needed?

If it be a question why the church should be an educational institution, the simple answer is this: In no other way can the church accomplish its mission. The task of the church is not exhausted in the salvation of isolated individuals, whether they be few or many. Under God the church is to bring in the heavenly kingdom, and this requires the salvation of social institutions. The church itself is a social institution, its task is a social task. It hopes to make possible a perfect individual in a perfect social order, than which there is no bigger work in the world.

We know that a task so great and so difficult can never be accomplished by incoherent and disconnected exhortations, by a hurried and hasty evangelism, by a blow now and then and here and there, by shooting the arrow of truth at a venture. There is need of thoroughness, of comprehensiveness, of thoughtfulness, of organization and system, of a wide-reaching program of service. But this means that the activities of the church must be organized from the educational point of view. That is to say, the church must take up the task of changing human life and human society by the gradual process of instruction and training. It must begin its work at the cradle, and keep patiently industrious until the habits and ideals of life have become fixed. But such an undertaking as this requires that the church have all the preciseness and thoroughness and comprehensiveness of a modern educational institution.

In the spread of the gospel, in the conquest of the world for Christ, we have always recognized the necessity of means. With this thought in mind, the present agencies of the church have been brought into existence—the Sunday school, societies, clubs, etc. All that the educational point of view asks is that these agencies be brought to their maximum efficiency, that they know what should be accomplished and what may be the best methods of procedure. It is the profound conviction that human life and character are built up by the gradual processes of religious education, and that in this way alone can we hope for substantial results in social progress and social reform.

The Visitor

The entire season from the fifteenth of May to the last days of June is taken up with school and college commencement execises in the calendar of our land. There is no people on earth that devotes so much time to the school as do the Americans. England has much older educational foundations, but does not devote itself with any such enthusiasm to the work of public instruction. The universities of Oxford and Cambridge were in operation centuries before the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth, or the Cavaliers at Jamestown, but Yale and Harvard have sent forth their influences more deeply into the national life. The universities of Germany have become the models for imitation in the organization of great instructional plants, but the educational policy of America is far more definite and effective than that of the Fatherland. Every community awakens once in the year at least to the serious importance of the work that its public schools and other institutions of learning are accomplishing. Every year the launching of the Argo is repeated, as the choice youth of our towns and cities sail away in quest of the Golden Fleece of personal achievement and public service. There is no enterprise so expensive as this, nor any to which the people so willingly devote their money.

To some of us the commencement season brings the pleasure and instruction of many graduating occasions. The plan of having the members of the class of high school or college graduates deliver the orations, read essays, recite class history , forecast class futures and compose class poems, has given away, for good or evil, to the plan of having some speaker from elsewhere interpret the ideals and methods of education to the class and the community. Perhaps this change robs the commencement time of some of its former interest, at least to the parents and friends of the graduates. But it furnishes the school officials with an opportunity to have the aims and ambitions of the educational system explained to a community that is greatly in need of a right understanding of just what it is that the school is seeking to accomplish. There is nothing of which people are prouder or more ignorant than the schools to which they send their children through a long series of years. They have a firm and proper conviction that it is the thing to do, but they do not care to trouble themselves too much with the actual conduct of affairs. In too many instances even the members of school boards limit their interest quite largely to the financial conduct of the schools; leaving the careful study of the needs of the children to the teachers. In general it can be said that the teachers of the pubblic schools of America are highly competent for the task. But they need beyond expression the intelligent co-operation of school boards and parents, in order that their work may be really effective.

One thing that strikes every observer in the field of school activity is the interest which the foreign members of our communities take in securing for their children the advantages of the schools. They are quick to see that the greatest privilege which America offers them is that of free education. Even those who resent at first the operation of the truant laws, which deprive them of the opportunity of keeping their children at work, as they might in the old world, soon see the advantage that lies with the policy which compels every parent to send his child to school. It may cut off something from the earnings of the family to take the children out of the mines and factories, but it is a gain in health, in family standards of living and in general campetence, which the least thoughtful comes early to appreciate. In a Missouri town I had a chance to see this interestingly illustrated. When I arrived in the place in the late afternoon, I saw soldiers drawn up at the station, and on inquiry I learned that a strike on the part of the foreign workers in one of the local industries had compelled the calling out of the troops to preserve order. The feeling between these Italians and their employers was very bitter, and race prejudice led to more or less active sympathy with the company on the part of most of the people of the town. Yet I discovered with interest that those foreigners were among the most interested members of the audience at the graduating exercises that evening, and their children had honorable places in the roll of scholars and graduates. A common interest blotted out for the moment the race and class lines that usually appear.

It is a matter of remark how rapidly the completeness of urban school equipment is making its way into the most remote districts. It is not an unusual thing to find city schools with buildings and apparatus that rival the best colleges. In the possesion of scientific material, equipment for manual training and for instruction in domestic science they seem to leave nothing to be desired. But the remarkable thing is that just such competence of material and buildings is to be found in very many of the smaller places and even in country communities. On a recent visit to a group of engagements in the copper country of the upper peninsula of Michigan, along the southern shore of Lake Superior, I was astonished to find how well provided the schools were for the most satisfactory work. It was apparent that the influence of the three great state universities of Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota had gone throughout the region, and made anything less than the best impossible. Many of the older localities cannot for a moment compare with the newest parts of the north and northwest in this regard. It is not only in such cities as Iron Mountain, Calumet, Bessimer and Duluth that high standards prevail, but in country districts, where a country high school has been built, the same thing may be seen. At Crystal Falls, Mich., a town of only a few hundred people, there is a district high school, one of several in that peninsula I am told, that is a surprise and delight to visit. Its commanding site at the top of the hill, its admirable buildings, its provision for further expansion in the possession of ground adjoining, and its really surprising art displays of masterpieces, reproductions of classic and modern statuary and painting, the gifts of successive graduating classes, reveal the high educational ideals of the men and women who have been the leaders in the work of public instruction, and the generous manner in which the community has responded to their call for adequate funds to provide such plants. It is good to see that in spite of the popular and superficial demand for so-called "practical" studies,—by which too many foolish people mean the studies that have only a bread-and-butter value—there is a strong sentiment of devotion to the great disciplines that enrich life, and make men and women competent not only to earn their living, but to be useful, cultured and happy citizens of the Republic.

I think no musical instrument in the world is like the utterance of speech in one whose voice is well trained, whose mind is rich with emotion, and who is accustomed to describe in graceful and appropriate language one's own experience in life. The conversation that flows in the quietude of the family, like the tinkling of a brook under the shadow of green trees; the conversation that flows like a river whose banks are efflorescent, and which holds its way deep and tranquil—such conversation may become a habit, not only in the sense of not being hurtful, but in the sense of having a beauty which is pleasurable.—H. W. Beecher.

Christian Walking

How does the good man separate himself from the bad man? Both are nourished by the same food, warmed by the same sun, and killed by the same diseases. They travel together the public highways, they go together to market, and both have the right to sue and be sued in the courts. They are not separated by social strata. Black scoundrels move in what is known as good society and among the outcasts are brave and pure souls. Grafters are sometimes sent to represent the people in legislatures and innocent men have been sent to the penitentiary. The good and the bad meet together in the house of God and unite in singing hymns of praise.

The moral separation of the good and the bad is not absolute. The heroic Luther had glaring faults. Judas had conscience enough to drive him to suicide. Men may be morally near one another on some questions and far apart on others. Progress depends upon their ability to work together where they have common aims. If a man represents us politically, we cannot afford to withhold our support from him on account of his religious beliefs and give it to another who agrees with us in religion but holds political views abhorrent to us. In choosing a minister we consider his moral and religious qualities rather than his political affiliations. When we go to church, we expect to have our faith strengthened and purified and our ideals made clearer to ourselves and to others. To assist in calling a minister who is known to be unfitted for this service is un-Christian.

God is said to weigh actions. He gives them their proper value. So does the man who is like God. The effort to conserve the natural resources of the nation is an effort to weigh actions. Men are asking that we consider the effect of present consumption of material upon the welfare of future generations. The agitation against certain unsanitary habits and conditions of living is a demand that men consider their health and the health of all who are yet to live upon the earth. If spitting on the sidewalk endangers the life of a neighbor or a stranger, men who weigh actions will not spit on the sidewalk. To a man of thought the present judgment of mankind upon his conduct is of little importance. He thinks of the attitude mankind will take when his work is done. He knows that his errors of judgment will be forgotten if he succeeds at last. The fool fears the ridicule of the moment more than the shame of failure.

The readiness of the gospel is that of faith, courage, self-control, moral insight, and social sympathy. We cannot foretell what situations will confront us and tax our powers to the limit. If we try to prepare for every emergency by adopting a system of rules to be followed everywhere and always, we invite trouble. If we are stupid enough, we can follow our rules and enroll ourselves among the martyrs when misfortune overtakes us and look on with complacency when our conduct distresses other persons. If, however, we have any power to get at the meaning of actions, we cannot be satisfied with a system of casuistry. But there is always need for faith, courage, and sympathy. It does not matter how new and strange the situation may be, we can acquit ourselves well if we have the right sort of spiritual life.

"Make straight paths for your feet, that that which is lame be not turned out of the way, but rather be healed." How shall we make straight paths for the lame? Straight moral paths are made by persons of high resolve and definite moral achievement. It takes a person of this sort to use the Bible effectively. The thief and the liar may profess to believe the Bible "from cover to cover," but they are not great moral lights on that account. There is nothing edifying in the indignation of a moral leper at the doings of the "higher critics"! Nor can we make it easier for men to do right and harder for them to do wrong by denouncing the sins of the antedeluvians when we are blind to the sins of the present generation. And there is just as little to be gained by telling what could be done if the world had been made on a different plan. The good man makes the best of the present situation. By his example he teaches patience and the importance of doing the thing that helps just a little.

Midweek Service, July 20. Ps. 1; Prov. 4:26; Eph. 6:15; Heb. 12:14.

When you stand at a sorrowful bit of the road,
And a hand you loved has loosed its clasp;
When streams are dry that in sweetness flowed,
And flowers drop from your listless grasp;
E'en now take heart, for further on
There are hope and joy and the dawn of day,
You shall find again what you thought was gone;
'Tis the merry heart goes all the way.

Social Survey

BY HARRY F. BURNS.

Progress in Municipal Government

The League of Municipalities of Wisconsinn is meeting in Fond du Lac this week. Mr. Seidel, Milwaukee's Socialist mayor, will make an address, an event to which the members of the old parties are looking as an opportunity for attack. The chief subject for discussion is the commission form of government, of which Galveston and DesMoines are shining examples. A committee has been at work upon the question and will report at this meeting. At the last meeting of this league, Cambridge, Mass., sent her landscape gardener to address Wisconsin mayors on the improvement of the healthfulness and beauty of the city. The address was received with greatest interest. Several cities of the state, as Madison, Milwaukee, Janesville, are working upon comprehensive plans for park and boulevard systems, with a grouping of the public buildings of the city in a spacious central park. In all this work the cities of the United States have much to learn from the experience of German and English cities, where at great expense after the cities had been well developed, a new plan of building the city has been introduced.

A Federal Health Bureau

Tardily are the people of our day coming to see that sickness and death are not only of individual but of social concern. The sickness of a man who works for his living, and every honorable man does, represents distinct loss to his family. The loss is sometimes tragic, forcing the mother from the home and the children from school to become breadwinners, and condemning them to a hand-to-mouth existence. For the family this is tragic. But society cannot say, "this is none of my concern." This tragedy is a social loss. It means that one who has been a producer for a time at least ceases to produce. It means, or may mean, that one more family is brought to the verge of dependency. The man who was a burden bearer has become a burden. It is estimated that in the United States 500,000 persons each year are brought to poverty's door and forced to remain in the conditions of unskilled labor by the tragedy of accident and disease. It is these recruits every year that prevent the army of unskilled workers from growing smaller in this land of opportunity. It is from these ranks that we draw those whom we recognize as social dependents. It can thus easily be seen that the care of the health of the people constitutes a vast social problem. It is a legitimate task for social action, and no cry of "paternalism," or "socialism," can blind us to our duty. The recognition of this need led President Taft, following the example of his predecessor, to recommend to Conress in his annual message, the establishment of a National Bureau of Health. Were it not so tragic, it would be humorous, to think that a people so intelligent and progressive as we are, should have given so much attention to the preservation of our national resources, forests, water supply, and soils, and should only in these last days come to think of brain and brawn as worthy a place in this list; or that we should as a nation have been careful to discover and teach the best methods of farming, and stock raising, and should have forgotten until today that a man is worth more than a sheep. But our individualism with its fear of all social interference is at last retreating before the convincing results of constructive social policies.

Caring for the Health of City-Dwellers

If it is necessary for the nation to take care of the health of its members, it is much more necessary for the city. Here the people live lives of greatest interdependence. At a thousand points the city-dweller's health may be sacrificed to the negligence or carelessness of others. Alone, he cannot protect himself. He must therefore be protected by social organization. It is natural therefore that our cities should lead in measures for protecting the health of their populations. The health department of the modern city is a large and complex organization. It must oversee the proper disposal of the city's waste, the securing of a pure water and milk supply, control contagious diseases, provide for pure air for home and factory; it must discover the causes of unnecessary mortality, and seek to overcome them; it must gather vital statistics and conduct campaigns of education in hygiene and sanitation. Such a work involves serious questions of engineering, medicine, chemistry, bacteriology, and administration. From any of these fields the head of the department of health may be chosen. But whatever his profession he must have marked administrative ability. Such a man is hard to find. No man in America is today attaining more notable success in this difficult field than Health Commissioner W. A. Evans of Chicago. With years of the best training and successful practice in medicine, Dr. Evans came to this office at the age of 43, and has devoted himself whole-heartedly to the health interests of the city. His determined and persistent campaign for a pure milk supply has attracted wide attention, and has been largely successful. The Chicago health office was the first to stand unequivocally for the pasteurization of all milk offered to its people. No less notable is the campaign now being waged for pure air. To this Dr. Evans has given special attention during the past year. This is the unsolved problem of city sanitation. But the Chicago department does not hesitate; it seeks to make use of all known devices, and to set itself definitely to the task of the advancing knowledege in this important field.

Education and Health

Professor Irving Fisher, in the "Report on National Vitality: Its Wastes and Conservation," which he prepared last year for the National Conservation Commission, says that he believes that pure air, pure milk, pure water, proper sanitation, and attention to the known laws of health, if provided for all children, would reduce the mortality of infants 47 per cent, and that of young children (ages 2 to 8) 67 per cent. If this estimate be correct, it means that from 100,000 to 200,000 children die in the United States each year from causes that are preventable. "Applying the same method to the diseases which carry off each year older children and adults, Professor Fisher estimates that 49 per cent of the deaths due to the diseases of youth and middle age (ages 23 to 49) are preventable, and that 28 per cent of those due to advanced age (medium 52 to 83)." The author then concludes that 42.3 per cent of the deaths which now occur might be prevented, or, more properly, postponed. It is estimated that the average life in the United States is now 45 years. Professor Fisher sees the possibility of increasing this to 59. The men who are most optimistic about these possibilities, pin their faith, not to the advancement of science, but to the application of preventive measures now known. This must come through education affecting individual conduct and state and municipal action. A fine illustration of this educational work is to be seen in Chicago this summer. It is well known that infant mortality in the city in the summer is appalling. Much of this is due to the ignorance of mothers who consider beer, sauerkraut and sausage, proper food for babies. Many of these mothers can not read even in their own language. Here is the difficulty of the education in hygiene. The Chicago health office has determined to meet the situation, and has employed Ralph Wilder, cartoonist for the Record-Herald, to devise posters which will teach by picture. One of these presents in contrast the baby that is kept clean, fed on pure milk, etc., with the one that is dirty, and fed on beer, sausage, and other solids. The pictures are in bright colors. In bold type are the words: "Don't Kill Your Baby!" Such determined effort speaks eloquently of the skill and benign purpose of Chicago's health commissioner.

The Health Commissioner

But people who read need to be taught to care for their health. The Chicago health department accordingly issues a weekly bulletin, seven thousand of which are distributed to physicians, social workers, schools, and other interested persons each week. These bulletins give a brief summary of the condition of the city's health, with picturesque exhortations in regard to the dangers of the particular season. Among these particularly striking are the brief, pointed sayings of Dr. Eevans. A recent number of The World of Today publishes the following:

Closed windows are open avenues to consumption.

Strong drink makes weak men.

Your lungs can't be washed, but they can be aired.

Filth for flies and flies for fever.

When you don't know what to eat, eat nothing.

Dry-dusting moves dust; it doesn't remove it.

One fly swatted in May is equal to a million swats in July.

So-called chest protectors are targets for colds and coughs.

Breathe freely and fully; the more you expand your chest, the less you will contract colds.

A fat man is usually a cheerful man. He was cheerful before he was fat. (A hint to thin men.)

Floods of sunshine in the home may fade carpets, but it puts the bloom of health upon your cheeks. Take your choice.

Twenty Minutes After Nine

The Experiences of a Boy Seeking a Job in a Great City

BY A. F. CALDWELL.

Mr. Wilbur turned from his writing—the last letter was finished—and reached for the book his son Len had laid down on the library table, when he had come in for supper. After a hasty glance at the title of the volume he held in his hand, a troubled expression spread over the father's face.

"It's just like—Len," he said slowly, laying the book back on the table. "When will that boy acquire the habit—which he so woefully lacks—that of observation and accuracy! It is strange such a characteristic should be wanting in him; he certainly does not inherit it from his parents—that's sure."

Mr. Wilbur left the room, and went across the hall to the foot of the stairs.

"Len!" he called.

"Yes, sir," came back the boy's cheery voice.

"Come down a minute, please!"

"All right, father," and Len hurriedly closed the door of his room.

"What book did I tell you to call at the office and get, this afternoon?" asked Mr. Wilbur, slowly, as his son came running down the stairs.

The boy thought a moment.

"Why, the one—on the right hand—of the lower shelf, over your desk—Butler's 'Business Methods,'" and Len looked up, inquiringly. "Wasn't that what you—wanted?"

"No; and did I tell you it was the right hand of the shelf?" cross-examined his father.

"Come to think—of it," replied Len, his frank, handsome face flushing slightly, "it wasn't; 'twas the left—hand. I remember—now. "I—got the wrong—book?"

"Yes," and Mr. Wilbur's voice was serious. "And the work I wanted to get done, this evening, I can't do now. It will hinder me a good deal—more than you imagine—in my plans for tomorrow. I can see no excuse for the trouble your heedlessness has given me; there is none."

"I'm sorry, father," and Len cast his eyes on the floor. "Ned Holbrook was waiting for me outside, while I ran in for the book, and I never thought what I was doing—I was in such a hurry."

"But you ought to have thought," insisted Mr. Wilbur, not unkindly. "It's largely just this thoughtlessness that accounts for your lack of observation and inaccuracy. Somehow, you go on the principle that anything will do—no matter what—so long as you do something; as your getting Butler's 'Business Methods' for me, instead of Atwood's 'Commercial Statistics'—as I asked you to—testifies.

"You'll never hold the place, Len, with Winship & Bragdon—if you get it—unless you cultivate the habits I have so often referred to. Accuracy—being sure of a thing—is indispensable stock-in-trade for every young man, or anyone else—for that matter."

"I—I'm going to—father," earnestly.

"When?" and Mr. Wilbur looked searchingly at his son.

"I'm going to begin—now!"

"So you've told me before, Len. But I hope if Winship & ——"

"Have they said anything about the vacancy there?" interrupted Len, eagerly.

"Yes; indirectly," replied Mr. Wilbur. "Mr. Bragdon called me up over the 'phone, this afternoon, and asked me to tell you to meet him at his home, 225 McClery street, Wednesday evening, at nine o'clock. And that isn't ten minutes after," meaningly.

"He was to be out of town until his office was closed, so he explained; and accordingly couldn't see you there. But he said he wanted the matter settled, so he fixed a date for the evening."

"It's a mighty swell place. S'pose I'll get it, father?" and there was an expectant look on Len Wilbur's face.

"If you do ——"

"I'll remember, father; indeed, I will. I couldn't afford not to—in such a position as that," divining what Mr. Wilbur was about to say.

"You'll have to be on your guard constantly, my boy, if you succeed. For habits—such as you lack—are not easily formed; nor are poor ones any more easily broken," and his father laid a hand affectionately on his son's shoulders.

"I—I know!"

A happier boy couldn't have been found in Colfax, than was Len Wilbur, the following Wednesday. Somehow, he felt that Winship & Bragdon had already decided to give him the coveted position in their office, and that his meeting Mr. Bragdon in the evening was simply a matter of formality. Hadn't the head of the big banking firm and Len's grandfather been school-boys together, and hadn't he always been on intimate terms with the Wilbur family, since that time.

"There's only one other fellow—of all the applicants—that stands the ghost of a chance getting in over me, and that's Mark Wheeler. But father's long friendship with Mr. Bragdon gives me a pull—that he doesn't have. I'd take my chances—even if it wasn't for that fact—against his," reflected Len.

On Wednesday evening, he was ready for his appointment with the banker, long before eight o'clock. He planned to take the eight-thirty Crosstown car. This would bring him within four blocks of McClery street; the rest of the distance he could easily walk.

"Time goes awfully slow!" thought Len, impatiently, as he stood in his room, waiting for the car. "I never saw it drag so—before."

Before Len left the house—a half an hour later—he went down to the kitchen closet, to get some camphor for a bad cold-sore he had on one of his lips. He knew exactly where the bottle was kept, and so decided he didn't need a light. Besides, it was nearly eight-thirty then, and there wouldn't be time to bother!

"I might miss my car, if I fussed too much," he thought, hurriedly.

Groping his way in the dark, Len soon found the bottle—it was on the top shelf of the closet—and taking out the moist cork, he pressed it to his lip. He held it here a moment, and then in the dark turned out some of the extract on his handkerchief. This he applied to the cold-sore for a few seconds, and then hastily wiping his face, he put the handkerchief back in his pocket, and returned the bottle to its place.

"That doesn't smell like camphor," thought Len. "It must be awfully weak, not to——"

Suddenly he stopped and listened.

"It's the——"

Len rushed from the house and out to the street.

"Just in time," he panted, as he swung himself on to the moving car. "I came mighty near losing it!"

As Len entered the car, all the pessengers—as from some sudden impulse—looked up and smiled. The boy felt his face growing red, and he became more and more embarrassed, as the people in the car kept glancing around at him, evidently to their great amusement.

"I'd like to know what's the matter with me—anyhow!" thought Len, indignantly. "I should think I was a free show—by the way every one looks at me. I'm thankful there's one on the car—that's got some manners!"

"Isn't he a—sight!" Len heard a boy, several seats from him, say to his companion, and then they both shook with suppressed merriment.

"Well, laugh at me—if you want to!" Len said angrily, beneath his breath. "It only shows your ill breeding."

"Fares!" called the conductor.

Len had hardly time to get his nickel out of his pocket, before the conductor stood beside him.

"Had the blues—today?" he remarked, smiling.

"No! It's nobody's business—if I had!" added Len, resentfully, but in a low voice.

Every eye in the car was again turned in Len's direction. The conductor's face wore a broad grin, as he passed on.

"I——"

Len was scarlet.

"It's such a funny ring!" a woman in the end of the car was saying. "Do you suppose he knows ——"

The last of the sentence was lost, as the car bounded noisily across the suburban tracks.

"Knows—what!" was Len's mental query. "She looked directly at me. Such impudence I never heard of. I haven't much further to go—thank goodness; not in this crowd!"

At Talbot Square Len left the car.

"Glad I've furnished you some amusement," was his parting shot to the conductor, as he jumped to the ground.

On reaching the sidewalk, Len looked at his watch.

"Got ten minutes—yet," he said. "It's just ten of nine."

The first man he met, as Len started in the direction of McClery street, eyed him curiously, and he had hardly passed before he turned around and smiled.

"He hasn't any better manners than the rest of them had!" Len had suddenly looked back and had met the stranger's questioning gaze. I can't see what's so laughable about me; I'm dressed just as I always am!" and he started on at a rapid pace.

On the corner Len met a newsboy.

"Well, if you aren't—a guy!"

"Say, what's the matter with you—or me!" demanded Len, angrily.

"Don't you—know!" and the boy giggled.

"Certainly—I don't," replied Len, with all the dignity he could assume.

"Better look in the glass then," and the newsboy went on, chuckling.

"Idiot!"

The next door was a drug store, and Len hurried in.

"May I borrow a mirror, a minute?" he asked.

The clerk smiled, and passed him a small hand glass.

"What is the matter—with me!" exclaimed Len, in astonishment. "My face——"

A deep blue ring completely encircled it, passing around both cheeks and forehead. It had been put on with his handkerchief, while in the kitchen at home, before catching his car.

"What have you been using on your face recently?" asked the clerk, interestedly.

"Nothing."

"Sure?"

"Not that I know of!"

Just then Len took out his handkerchief; on it was the same color that he bore on his face. He looked at it in great perplexity.

"All I've put on it is—camphor," he said, to the clerk's look of inquiry. "I did it in the dark—just before I left home."

"But that isn't camphor," returned the clerk. "It appears to me like bluing—or indigo," making a closer examination.

"There was a bottle——"

Then Len remembered that the last time he had used the camphor, he hadn't returned it to the closet shelf where his mother kept it. And he recollected, too, that there was a partly filled bottle of bluing on the same shelf—and this he had used on his face.

"No wonder—the folks—laughed!" and Len himself smiled grimly. Then turning to the clerk, "Can I get this off—here?"

"Why, we'll—try."

It was twenty minutes after nine, when Len rang Mr. Bragdon's bell.

"Hope I'm not too late," thought the boy, to himself.

"Someone else is with Mr. Bragdon now," replied the servant, who had come to the door. "Won't you step in and wait? Perhaps you're the one Mr. Bragdon was expecting at nine o'clock."

"I had an appointment at that time, but owing to an accident—wasn't able to get here," explained Len.

At nine-thirty, the door opened, and Mr. Bragdon and Mark Wheeler stepped into the hall.

"I'll do my best to please——" It was the young man speaking.

Len felt his mouth become suddenly dry. "That means——"

"Good evening!" Mr. Bragdon had returned from the door where he had gone with his caller. "I had given you up—your coming; and thinking that you had changed your mind in regard to the position, I offered it to Mark Wheeler."

Len uttered a lame apology, and directly left the house.

"But remember, my boy," suggested Mr. Wheeler, on Len's rehearsing to his father his experience of the evening, "that our failures—if we are ourselves responsible for them—are sometimes our best friends. And you can make it so in this case—if you will."

The Minister's Service

The Service than Can Not Be Neglected

BY F. M. SHELDON.

Recently a layman remarked that some ministers are being paid more than they are worth. He is right. But the number of whom this is true is exceedingly small. The demands upon the minister are greater now than ever before. It is very difficult to get through details and side-issues to the real work.

So many things claim the time and attention of people that the church must put her claims in an attractive and convincing way and simply insist upon her place in the life of the people. The church that hesitates or apologizes concerning its mission and message is lost; it will simply be crowded out. This means that the minister must know the absolutely fundamental nature of the need which the church is to supply and give no uncertain sound with reference to this all-important work. People are crowding the church out. The drift must be stopped. And the ministers who are to stop it must speak with accent of certainty which belongs to the prophet.

But it is impossible to do the work of a church today wholly, or even in largest part, from the pulpit. Preaching to people in the mass never has and never can take the place of the quiet hour alone with individuals and little groups, in which the strong claims of Christianity, its transcendent beauty, its imperative call to service, its commanding ideal, its full adequacy to every life experience and its incomparable transforming and saving power, are considered in an intimate and personal manner, impossible to the general public service. It is easier to preach and spend the time running a complex machinery and be therewith content. But there is no substitute for bringing the message and claims of Christianity, the opportunity and obligation of the Christian life directly and definitely to people, through personal conference.

The central work of the minister, in the pulpit and out of it, is so to acquaint people with God and his way of life, that they will become positive laborers with Him in building the kingdom, in establishing the universal brotherhood. Preaching and personal work should secure a verdict and definite action in favor of a life in fellowship with the Father. The church is to secure life-results. People must be brought to definite decision and action with reference to the God-life.

You say that this means conversion. Well, there is nothing more surely needed. Not a narrow, vague, purely emotional experience, but a change of ruling life-purpose, such as brings us into oneness of mind, spirit and work with Jesus Christ. The desperately wicked, the respectably wicked, the negatively good, the indifferent and the self-righteous all need just this change, and one about as much as the other.

People are lost when God cannot find and use them to do what He created and clearly intended them to do. They are lost to God, to the end for which he created them, to their own best selves and to fellowmen. Multitudes are where God cannot thus find and use them. These people should be saved, that is, brought where God can use them to do all His will here and now. This is the work of the church and of the minister. We must permit nothing to sidetrack this main work.

With the July Magazines

McCLURE'S.

The leading article in McClure's is given the alliterative title: "Toilers of the Tenements." There is abundant illustration and a vivid description by Elizabeth Shepley Sergeant of tenement conditions and workers in East Side, New York, "where people live 1,000 to the acre." The article deals with the following trades in which children are employed: artificial flower making, making "willow" plumes, garment finishing, cigarette wrappers, tassel making, embroidery and lace making, bead stringing, and what will most concern many readers, the making of human hair. This industry, recently called into being by the increased demand by the women of America for false hair, is as yet not adequately controlled by law. The process and dangers to health of America through the importation of Chinese hair are discussed by the author. Besides this there is the usual number of short stories, a summary of results attained in "white slave investigations" and a further discussion of comments aroused by the publication of George Kebbe Turner's interview with President Taft in the June number of McClures.

HAMPTON'S.

Hampton's opens with a presentation of the proof of Peary's discovery of the North Pole. The proofs are in the clear cut story told by Robert E. Peary and the photographs taken. It is not too late for the story to be read with interest. Then there is the "Chantecler" drama in verse by Edmond Rostand, continued from last month. An article of general human interest is "A Fighting Chance for the City Child," by Rhetta Childe Dorr, being a description of many forms of relief work for dependent children in New York City.

LIPPINCOTT'S.

Lippincott's devotes far more than half its space to "The Lady Thalia," a complete story in the one number. This story is by Henry C. Rowland, author of "Grimes Takes Command," "Sea Camps," etc. Following this story are several short stories such as "Granfather Bixby Nurse," by Mary Roberts Rinehart; "The Toss," by A. R. Goring-Thomas; "The Eternal Feminine," by Elsie Singmaster; and "The triumph of Jim's Dad," by James William Jackson. The publishers of this magazine are using the best paper, and workmanship that gives the completed copy a distinct attractiveness and satisfaction to the reader.

CENTURY MAGAZINE.

The Century Magazine comes to hand with "The Mystery of Rowing" as the leading article, by Walter Camp. It is a story of the development of rowing and the present intercollegiate races. It will be found good reading for the summer, especially by those who have ever touched the oar in the race. "The Devil's Advocate," by Brander Mathews, is a discussion of the function of the literary critic, with suggestions as to what he would say about three writers—Ruskin, Carlyle, and Samuel Johnson. The article is a readable one. The sane Fourth comes in for a brief discussion, and "The Reaction in Russia" occupes several pages. "The Creators—A Comedy" is the longest story of the number.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

Religious Education (for June) contains a series of short addresses, on practical topics relating to the work of religious education. Some of them are: "Character and Culture," "Relation of the Churches to Universities," "The Public School and the Family," "The Proper Housing of the Sunday-school," "Story Hour in the Home," "Religious Education in the Y. M. C. A.," and Religious

A BOSTON BOY.

Wilfred Frederick Kelley, a Boston Latin school boy of the class of 1911, has been chosen by Mayor Fitzgerald to read the Declaration of Independence at Faneuil Hall on the Fourth of July. He lives at Roxbury, near where he was born 16 years ago.

In the Latin school he received, in 1906, a prize for excellence in modern studies and a prize for excellence in declamation; in 1907, a prize for general excellence in conduct and studies; in 1908, a prize for exemplary conduct and fidelity. In his five years at the Latin school, he has been absent only one day. He has always been at the head of his class; he expects to go to college, after he has finished his Latin school course.

"My dear," said a gentleman to his wife. "Our club is going to have all the home comforts." "Indeed," replied she. "And when is our home going to have all the club comforts?"

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, JULY 17.

Theme for the Day.—The Will to Serve.

Scripture.—Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ.—Gal. 6:2.

In all things I gave you an example, that so laboring ye ought to help the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, that he himself said, It is more blessed to give than to receive.—Acts 20:35.

Be thou the guardian of the weak,
Of the unfriended, thou the friend;
No guerdon for thy valor seek,
No end beyond the avowed end.
Wouldst thou thy godlike power preserve,
Be godlike in the will to serve.
—J. B. Gilder ("The Parting of the Ways").

Prayer.—Father of life and light, we adore Thee for the gift of the new week and of the new and holy day. Our hearts take fresh courage at the thought of all that this day means in the history of the world. We accept it as one of Thy great gifts to us, and we would use it as a means of strength to enable us to serve Thee by serving our fellow men. May this be the burden of our thought as we enter Thy house today. And may the worship in which we join bring us nearer to Thy fulness, and to the fulness of life in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

MONDAY, JULY 18.

Theme for the Day.—The Companionship of Death.

Scripture.—With kings and counsellors of the earth, who built up waste places for themselves; or with princes that had gold, who filled their houses with silver. . . . There the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary are at rest.—Job. 3:14, 15.

Yet not to thine eternal resting place
Shalt thou retire alone, nor could'st thou wish
Couch more magnificent. Thou shalt lie down
With patriarchs of the infant world—with kings,
The powerful of the earth—the wise, the good,
Fair forms, and hoary seers of ages past,
All in one mighty sepulchre.
—W. C. Bryant ("Thanatopsis").

Prayer.—Our Father, we have come into the world for the high and inspiring purposes of Thy ordering, and we know that soon we must go our way, the way of all flesh. If it were not for Thy abiding companionships we should be terrified at the thought of death. But we are confronted with the promises of Thy holy Word, and the hopes of the immortal life. We do not know what experiences await us beyond the narrow portals we call death, but we are sure Thou hast great and honorable service for us in the life that is life indeed. May our daily lives be so spent in good activities that we shall be worthy to enter the noble company of those who have become children of eternity. We ask this in the name of Christ. Amen.

TUESDAY, JULY 19.

Theme for the Day.—The Mystic Temples of Life.

Scripture.—Know ye not that ye are a sanctuary of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man destroyeth the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, and such are ye. —1 Cor. 3:16, 17.

O Father! grant thy love divine
To make these mystic temples thine!
When wasting age and wearying strife
Have sapped the leaning walls of life
When darkness gathers over all,
And the last tottering pillars fall.
Take the poor dust Thy mercy warms,
And mould it into heavenly forms!
—O. W. Holmes ("The Living Temple").

Prayer.—Good Father and Friend, out of the wonder of life we have come, and Thou hast given us our bodies and our soul. To Thee our account must therefore be rendered for these sacred possessions. Help us to make ever the best and wisest use of such rare gifts. May both body and soul be kept clean and worthy of Thy approval. Their use is ours, but the ultimate account must be made to Thee. May no ignoble contact soil either of these fair possessions, but may we count them holy as the instruments by which some part of Thy good work is to be done in the world. Aid us, we beseech Thee, to get some of that work of Thine perfected today. In the Redeemer's name we make our prayer. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 20.

Theme for the Day.—A Daily Prayer.

Scripture.—Give me neither riches nor poverty; feed me with the food that is needful for me.—Prov. 30:8. Give us day by day our daily bread.—Mark 6:11.

I pray not that men tremble at
My power of place and lordly sway;
I only pray for simple grace
To look my neighbor in the face
Full honestly from day to day.
—James Whitcomb Riley ("Ike Walton's Prayer").

Prayer.—Lord of our lives, we often ask too much of Thee, and fail in thankfulness for that we have received. We do not mean to be ungrateful, but our wants are many, and it is hard to remember all that we have, when there is so much more that we seem to need. Give us first of all a sense of thankfulness for the mercies of each day. And then help us to understand that our real wants are few after all, and that we only require enough for one day at a time. Teach us that if we keep this truth in mind, our wants will seem less great and insistent, and our possessions will grow to be many past all our telling. We pray in the name of the Savior. Amen.

THURSDAY, JULY 21.

Theme for the Day.—The Everywhere-present God.

Scripture.—The God that made the world, and all things therein, He being Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither is he served by men's hands . . . seeing he giveth to all life and breath and all things.—Acts 17:24.

I thank thee, Sun, thou hast a smile
That reaches to the heart, direct and sweet,
Without the ministries of scene and ceremonial.
Shine on these, all these in shivering need,
Shine on these, and teach them that the God
Of life and light dwells not alone
In temples made with hands, but that the path
To him from every soul, in every farthest
Corner of the earth is as direct
As are thy rays to me.
—J. G. Holland ("The Marble Prophecy").

Prayer.—O Thou eternal Father, we bow before Thee in humility at the thought of Thine unchanging glory and power. Before the mountains were brought forth or ever Thou hadst formed the earth and the worlds, even from everlasting to everlasting, Thou art God. And Thou art with us everywhere. We cannot escape from Thee, and we would not; for Thou lovest us with the love wherewith Thou lovest Christ. May the sense of Thy presence with us at every moment of our lives bring to us a great fear and a great joy. Thou art too holy to look upon sin; help us therefore to be pure. Thou art too tender not to pity the weak; be compassionate therefore when we miss the highest good. And help us to bring to all men the solemn and happy knowledge of Thy presence. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

FRIDAY, JULY 22.

Theme for the Day.—The Humility and Innocence of Infancy.

Scripture.—Naked came I into the world. —Job. 1:21.

Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall in no wise enter therein. Mark 10:15.

Naked from out that far abyss behind us
We entered here:
No word came with our coming to remind us
What wondrous world was near.
No hope, no fear.
—Edward Rowland Sill ("The Future").

Prayer.—Our Gracious Lord and Master, we come to Thee as little children, for as such we have come into the world, and as such Thou dost desire us evermore to come to Thee. In spite of all our strength, our skill and our goodness, we have the weakness, the ignorance and the folly of childhood. But Thou art a very loving Father, and we run to Thee when we come to find out our helplessness. Dear Lord, may the refuge of Thine arms be always a comfort to our souls, and may the evening hour find us ever ready to seek that shelter and rest in that protection. We ask for Jesus' sake Amen.

SATURDAY, JULY 23.

Theme for the Day.—The Penalty of Unfaithfulness to the Past.

Scripture.—It shall come to pass if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of Jehovah thy God . . . he will give thee a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and pining of soul.—Deut. 28:15, 65.

Thou shalt be filled with trembling and sorrow, the cup of astonishment and desolation.—Ezek. 23:33.

Those baffled and dislaureled ghosts
Will curse us from the lamentable coasts
Where walk the frustrate dead.
The cup of trembling shall be drained quite Eaten the sour bread of astonishment.
With ashes of the hearth shall be made white
Our hair, and wailing shall be in the tent.
—William Vaughn Moody ("An Ode in Time of Hesitation").

Prayer.—Holy One, who hast given us life and all its benefits, we acknowledge our debt to Thee and to all the past. We look with humbled astonishment at all the work our fathers have done, and we understand something of the burden that lies upon us to be faithful to the heritage of the ages. Help us not to disappoint those who have gone before us in the pathway of service and progress. May we understand how terrible is the sin of breaking faith with those who have labored and suffered that we might enter with greater dower of blessing into the gates of life. Make us faithful to our land, to our homes and our own souls, that so we may fulfil the high purposes that have been left us, and may leave to our own children names and possessions enriched by lives of sincerity and noble effort. Amen.

A SERIAL STORY

Donald Graeme

CHAPTER X.

Hard Fighting.

It was well for Donald that he had first been to that stronghold of love, his mother's arms, ere he met his angry sister. Instead of cowering before her scathing words, as she expected him to do, his face lit up suddenly with the light of new hope.

"Then you didn't do it Jeanie—you didn't do it for me?" She looked at him in amazement mingled with scorn.

"I did not think you could be so wicked and so cowardly, Donald. Is it possible that you could think of laying on me the blame of this crime?"

"Oh, Jeanie, how you misunderstand me. But we cannot speak here. Come to my room. I must explain."

While they climbed the stairs she was struggling hard to keep back the angry words that were trembling on her lips.

"Now what have you to explain?" she said, with forced calmness as she stood leaning one hand on the back of the chair he had set for her.

"The first thing I want to tell you is, Jeanie, I never committed the forgery. The next thing I wish to say is, that if you were not tempted to do this deed for me, then you have lifted a load from my heart that has been well nigh crushing me to death these few days."

"You would have made a fine actor, Donald. It's like proving an alibi, I suppose. If you suspect another of the forgery, you could not possibly be the guilty one yourself."

"I see you believe me guilty, too, Jeanie."

"I wish I could do otherwise. Considering what you, yourself, told me of your past, do you wonder that I take the worst view of this affair? But the worst of it is, Donald, that you would try to fasten the crime on me."

"That is where you misunderstand me, Jeanie. Your name has never passed my lips in connection with the crime. But you know you obtained one hundred pounds for me, how, you refused to tell me, just about the time this forgery was committed."

"So I was in your mind, when you told father that you feared for someone else?"

"How could I help it, Jeanie? You had got just the same sum of money for me as he has been defrauded of. But I took all the blame to myself if you had done it. Father and Mr. Sinclair bound me up to silence about it all, so long as Miss Wallace should remain with us, that is why I did not tell you about it from the first. If I had only had your word that you never did it, I could have denied it with my whole heart. As it was, the fear that you had been tempted to do it for me, kept me from speaking out boldly, as I should have done. This much I will say for myself, Jeanie, if you had done it, I would bear the blame—the fault would have been mine—all mine." She was touched by his words, and she realized too, that he had good grounds for suspecting her. She replied in a calm, despairing tone of voice after a moment or two of silence:

"Donald, I admit that it was not altogether without reason that you suspected me of this terrible fraud. It would have been wiser of me, I see now, if I had told you at first, that the money I gave you was simply a loan from a friend. Nothing good ever comes, I see, of having secrets."

"Oh, Jeanie, if they had only let me tell you the moment I heard of it, how different everything might be for me now. Was it father himself who told you?"

"No—it was James Douglas."

"James Douglas? The duffer, it was he who first compelled me to say I would not tell you till Elsie should leave. He would spare you as long as possible, indeed!"

A soft color suffused her face and made even her tears becoming.

"You need not blame James. I simply made him tell me. I just drew him on till he could not help himself. But he is very sorry about it all. And he is your friend, Donald, indeed if he were a brother, he could not feel more concerned for us all."

"Yes, yes, I know it. And he will do all in his power to trace the guilty one, too. You have not seen the forged cheque, I suppose?"

"No, I could not think of going to father about it till I had first seen you—oh, Donald, if I could but be sure you are innocent."

"I have only my word, Jeanie—and it does not seem of much worth."

"Did you really tell me of all your debts when I helped you in August?"

"Everyone, Jeanie. And I have never once been in that set since."

"You would not surely suspect James Douglas?"

"Nobody does—though you are all ready enough to suspect me."

"Do you wonder that my faith in you was shaken, Donald?"

"No, I do not blame you. Certainly my past folly has become a bitter enemy. But did father or Mr. Sinclair know aught of that past? They both seemed to think me guilty from the first."

"You forget that your suspicions of me kept you from affirming your innocence as you would otherwise have done. Your apparent want of straightforwardness was the strongest witness against you."

"I suppose so. All the same my father's attitude towards me has been such, since he discovered this fraud, as I did not think he could evince toward his bitterest enemy."

"We do not know what our father is suffering from the thought that his one son could be guilty of so vile a deed. Think of how upright he has been himself all his life."

Aye, uprightness—that's it. I tell you Jeanie, many a man is damned by his own uprightness."

"Oh, Donald, don't talk so wildly."

"It is true, Jeanie, quite true. There are man so upright that they think they need nothing more than they have earned for themselves for safety. And woe to the man who does not come up to their standard of right. If ever I have strength to win through the dark cloud which now hangs over me, it will not be through the sense of my father's high integrity, but through the power of my mother's prayers, and of her faith in me. If she did not trust me still, even in this darkness, I would not care what might become of me."

"The victory that is gained by hard fighting, Donald, is always most prized. You will not show the white feather, no matter how much odds may be against you. Never forget that, 'Men may rise on stepping-stones of their dead selves to higher things.' I have been hard on you, too—cruelly hard, I feel it. But forgive me, you know how I would rejoice to see you set free from this charge. And you know, too, that should your name never be cleared, you will still be dear to me as ever."

"You are better to me than I seem to deserve. Indeed I do not blame any of you for thinking me guilty. The whole circumstance is so wrapped up in mystery, that I see no loop-hole of escape." Jeanie's tender heart was its true self again as she looked into his despondent face. Quick as thought she saw that it would be wise to lead his thoughts back to his mother.

"Donald, I am very, very glad that mother trusts you. What does she say about it?" His face brightened in an instant as she hoped it would.

"She says that the real culprit shall be found out. I have not used her words, but this is the sense of them."

"Let us hope that her words are a proph ecy. Mother gains her wisdom from the source, Donald."

"I know. But then, we have talked to no purpose long enough. Miss Wallace has fallen upon evil days with us. You have to leave her too often to herself."

"She has been busy helping me with the rooms. I think now she is reading by herself in the drawing room. Won't you go in and chat awhile? I promised father to give him an hour with the books in the office this morning." She had no sooner spoken than she knew what a mistake she had made. Her brother's face suddenly flushed up in anger.

"It is well that my father has a daughter whom he can trust in his office. But what do you think, Jeanie, if I am not fit to be trusted in my father's office and shop, am I fit society for an innocent young gorl, like your friend?" The bitterness in his voice told her how his heart was aching. Laying one hand gently on his arm she said softly:

"I thought there was to be hard fighting, my brother."

"Hard fighting, to conquer a fellow's ill luck?"

"No, to conquer self. A strong man is satisfied with no less." She ran off and he stood a brief space where she left him.

"A strong man," he repeated. "She hasn't lost all faith in me yet." Then he turned and walked down stairs to the drawing room. Half an hour later Mrs. Graeme put in her head at the door.

"My sakes, are you two young things sitting here by the fire with sunshine like April's wasting itself outside? Donald, have you no thought? I am sure Elsie is fair dying for a sight of the bonny Clyde away round below the manse."

"Would you like to go, Miss Elsie?" He spoke very gravely.

"I shall be delighted. Books are all right in the right time, but as your mother says. sunshine like today's should not be wasted. Thank you, Mrs. Graeme, for breaking in on our book chat."

"I knew you would like it. Be sure you go by the manse road, Donald."

"Yes, and we might go in to see how the apples are looking. It is quite time they were all gathered." She spoke laughingly as she ran off to put on her outdoor dress. It was well she did not see the gloom that settled on his face the moment she left the room. His mother's fond eyes saw it well enough, and though keen pain was gnawing at her heart, she kept a bright face beaming for her boy.

"Donald, you'll come back in good time for dinner?" The words recalled him to himself. He looked down into her sweet calm face, and his own brightened as the thought flashed through his mind: "Mother is fighting hard too." He stooped and kissed her without a word, for Elsie's steps were at the door. She went down the stair with them, repeating the warning as they went that they were to remember dinner time. Then she stood at the hall-door and watched them till they turned the bend of the road.

"Poor laddie," she said as she shut the door softly, "it's a great blessing that Elsie's been here in his time of trouble. Providence has no better way of pouring balm into a young man's wounds than through a good lass's eyes."

Jeanie bent wearily over accounts for what it was only one. Her father noted the tired look on her face and reproached himself for asking her to engage in what seemed be distasteful work. He did not know that the contracted brows and anxious expression of her eyes were due to the same cause which had embittered his own thoughts during the past few days.

"Ye hae done enough for me today, Jeanie. Ye are a real help tae me, lassie. Rin awa' noo tae yer friend Elsie. Maybe ye'll hae time for a spin on the bicycle afore dinner. It would blaw the cobwebs o' the office frae aboot yer brain." She laid down the pen and looked at him wistfully.

"Father, I want to talk about this forgery." He turned round on his chair with a start.

"Did your mither tell ye? She promised me she wouldn't—yet awee."

"Mother did not tell me."

"Donald?" he said with black brow.

"Nor Donald, father. It was James Douglas."

"I see. I didn't think that Jamie had sae lang a tongue. He micht 'a kenned ye would hear it soon enough."

"I made him tell me. I was not blind, you see. For three days everything has seemed wrong. Donald woe-begone. You looking black as thunder. My mother taking to her bed yesterday. I would be very stupid indeed not to notice that something grave had happened. My mother made me wire for Donald last night. When he came this morning by first train, I was ready to hear the truth from him. But he would tell me nothing. So I sent for James and he just had to tell me, so don't blame him."

"I don't blame him, Jeanie. If Jamie could save ye frae sorrow or disgrace he would be fain tae do it. I wish he was yer brither lassie, instead o' the wastrel that is."

"Perhaps you are blaming Donald in the wrong."

"Guilt is pictured in his face."

"I cannot believe it, father. Whatever other faults he may have, Donald always spoke the truth."

"So I hae thocht. An' if he's innocent now, why does he stammer and shuffle an' no speak oot an' clear himsel'?" She thought a moment and then took a bold step for Donald's sake.

"Donald has told me why he did not deny this thing with all his might when you first accused him of it."

"Then ye hae spoken to him aboot it?"

"Yes, so soon as he left mother's room. I met him on the stairs. We had a long talk. His heart is breaking."

"An' with guid reason, too, nae doot."

"Father, I did not think you could be so hard on Donald."

"The higher a son is in a faither's estimation, the lower must he fall it found unworthy. What reason did he give ye for not declaring himsel' guiltless o' this forgery?"

"It may seem strange to you, father, but I do not wonder at it. He feared that I had been tempted to do it."

"Has your ae brither stooped tae schemin' an' leein' as weel as fraud, Jeanie?"

But wait till you hear all father. Just about the time that this forgery was committed, a friend of mine—it doesn't matter who—does it?"

"Na, na, Jeanie, I can trust your word."

"Well, a friend of mine was in great distress for just one hundred pounds. Donald and I talked it over. I did find a way of helping my friend but Donald did not know how. Now the moment he heard of your loss he at once began to fear that I had been tempted to do the wicked deed. But do you know, father, how noble Donald is? He declares that had I done it, he would have borne the blame himself to save me." Her face shone with hope as she pled her brother's cause. It was only then, indeed that she fully realized how much good lay hidden away among the rubbish in Donald's character.

"I'm glad ye hae telt me this, Jeanie. It's a bit gleam in the darkness. Heaven sen' it may no be a will o' the wisp. The question is, if Donald has na done this thing, who has?"

"The truth may all come out yet, father. Donald says that mother believes it will."

"Yer mither? Oh, ay, I know. It was the hardest task o' my life tae tell her. But I could'na keep it frae her. The eyes o' her look richt through me. Sae I had tae tell her a'. But I think it saved my brain from goin' wrang lassie. She just brightened up and her eyes were shining as they did when she was a young lass like you, Jeanie. An' she says scornfu' like:

"What, oor Donald, the child o' mony prayers, do a thing like that? I'm fair ashamed o' ye for thinking it Dauvid—'though her words seemed foolish, looking at facts, yet they took a load aff my hert, lassie.'

"Mother is seldom wrong, father. She looks at things always in the kindest way."

"Ay, lassie, it's true. I've sometimes thocht that the kirk makes a gran' mistake in appointing the elders frae among the faithers o' the people. The mithers, the guid ones, hae mair o' the speerit o' the Master." She was overjoyed to see that he was softening towards Donald, and she followed up her advantage cautiously:

"Would it not be well to ask Donald back to his work, in the meantime—till more is found out?"

"Better let things alone as they are yet, lassie. He had'na got a holiday for a lang while. If things come na straight soon, it'll be better tae let him hae his will an' gang aff tae Canada. Dinna think me hard, Jeanie. I would gui' a' I'm worth tae be able tae believe him innocent."

"I know," she said, in a faint voice, then she added eagerly: "Show me this cheque, father." He unlocked the safe and taking it out he placed it in her hands. She looked long and earnestly at the endorsement. Her color came and went and her eyes dilated as she looked.

"I have seen a hand like this somewhere, father, somewhere—" she pressed her fingers to her temples—

"Richard Smith," she repeated, slowly, "whose is it? whose is it?"

"Donald's maybe," he said bitterly.

"No, not Donald's father. He never wrote this. Mother was right. Oh, I'm glad, I'm glad." Her stern father showed no gladness. He simply judged her acting for her brother's sake.

"If ye know that Donald hasn't written that signature, dootless ye can tell who has."

"Look at this r, look at that t, and that h. I have seen them many a time. But, oh, it seems impossible, quite impossible."

"Tell me whom you suspect, Jeanie," he said dryly. He might have been less skeptical had he but noted her agitation. But his eyes were blinded by the thought that all the time she was trying to screen Donald.

"Father," she said in a low, frightened voice, "I do suspect someone. Who, I will not tell even you, till I know more."

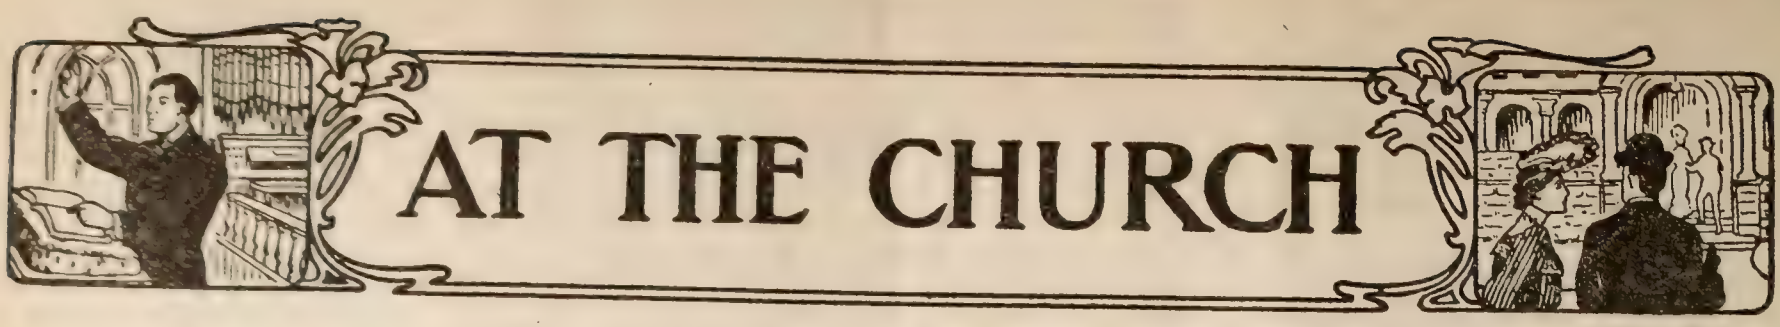
An Illustrated Children's Sermon

One of the English weeklies gives a description of a unique service on Children's Day in Dr. J. H. Jowett's Birmingham church. After a brief reference to the days when men brought out of their homes things which the Lord Jesus Christ would not like and made a bon-fire of them, he uncovered a large brazier filled with sticks and coal, and proceeded to burn up, in symbol, some of the evil things to be found in the human heart which the Lord would like to destroy. Calling to him a boy of eight, the preacher extracted from near his heart a white envelope in which was found a little black seed, a bad motive, hidden away under a pure and good deed. These he placed on the brazier. Next came a girl with a little packet of thistledown. It represented idle wishes: "I wish I were Queen Mary," "I wish I were Mr. Jowett, he does seem to have an easy time." These, too, needed to be burned. Then followed a girl with a basket of falsehoods, picked up in the school playground, at home, in the shop. Black lies were there, and white lies which the speaker showed to be black as ink when you got to the inside; half-truths, partly black and partly white, and exaggerations, shown as long strips of white paper, all through the length of which there ran a thin line of black.

Turning for a moment from the children, Dr. Jowett called to him one of the most popular of the Carr's-lane stewards, who carried a shovel full of hot coals, "gathered this morning near the doors of the Town Hall." They signified harsh, angry words "spoken to our stewards by disappointed visitors who had to be turned away." But among them the speaker espied two pearls—two words of thanks for all the trouble that had been taken.

Now there comes another girl with a small safe, labeled "Treasures collected from rich and poor." Lifting the lid, the preacher could see a red monster called Revenge, a horrid green form called Jealousy, and a fierce black creature called Malice. These, safe and all, were consigned to the fire.



Then, turning to one of his deacons, who is the headmaster of a higher grade school, Dr. Jowett obtained from him two penny papers for boys, from one of which he produced a tiny phial of poison, while from the other, which was just as full of fun and adventure, he secured a minute bottle of the sweetest scent. The first of these, unclean and poisonous, should surely be burned.

Then there came a dear little girl, herself like a flower, holding a bunch of white lilies, red anemones, and violets very close to her heart. Are these, then, to be burned? No, they signify the white blossoms of purity, and the red flowers of love, and the violets of modesty, and these are what the Lord Jesus wants his children to cultivate.

But now, what is the fire in which we may hope to burn up the evil in our hearts? Onto the platform came two superintendents. Each held in his hand a torch, one mounted on a white pole, the other on a red. These represented God's love and God's purity, which form the fire in which the evil of our hearts can be consumed.

—There were 150,000 children at school in India sixty years ago. There are 4,000,000 now.

—The German army has sixteen machine gun batteries, which it has had for some time, and which there appears to be no tendency to increase. It may therefore be assumed that they are designed to fit out the divisions of cavalry which will be organized in the event of war, one for each division.

Sunday School Lesson

In the Holy Mountains*

It was once the custom to locate the scene of the Transfiguration on Mt. Tabor, a conspicuous peak that rises at the side of the plain of Esdraelon. No doubt the fact that early in the Christian centuries an ecclesiastical community was organized on this mountain, which later developed into a Franciscan monastery, was the reason for attaching some marked scriptural importance to the site. Modern students of the life of Christ, however, incline to the opinion that there was close connection between the scene of the confession of Peter at Caesarea Philippi and that of the Transfiguration. This would locate the latter somewhere in the region of north Palestine, probably on one of the lower mountains of the Hermon group. If we lose something in the sense of nearness to the places made most sacred by the life of Jesus, we at least are given the satisfaction of feeling that the mountain that is most conspicuous in the landscape of Palestine and serves as a kind of white-domed St. Paul's Cathedral of the region, was the scene of this incident.

The Mystery of the Scene.

It is not easy to understand either the actual facts or the significance of the Transfiguration of Jesus. It could hardly be said that the Disciples needed this singular display or the glory of their Master in order to convince them of his real character. Already they had given clear proof that they knew who he was, and why he had chosen them as his messengers. Nor can we understand just the manner of this singular event. Perhaps it is enough to say that the glory of Christ's character became irresistibly visible and impressive, the moment he had fully disclosed to his followers his commitment to the great redemptive work of the cross. There was something so awe-inspiring, so convincing and complete in this revelation of his consecration to the need of humanity, that the disciples were overwhelmed by the splendor of the new truth and by the wonder of the Lord who made it known to them.

Yet it was probably no mere subjective experience on their part. The vision of the Christ and the two prophets of the past lingered with them through life. In later years they recalled it as one of the things to which they might refer at any moment when there should arise the suspicion that they had followed cunningly devised fables (2 Peter 1:16, 17). In that later hour they understood that, wonderful as the Transfiguration was in their experience and memory, it did not compare with that "more sure word of testimony" furnished by the life and witness of the Christian community, and least of all did he have the significance of that personal experience of the love of God which was like nothing so much as the rising of a day-star on the horizon of the believing heart.

Moses and Elijah.

There is something spectacular in the appearance of Moses and Elijah. Perhaps this is the most difficult feature of the scene for us to comprehend. The question as to how the disciples knew that it was Moses and Elijah yields instantly to the more perplexing inquiry as to why those two prophets should have been chosen to represent the glorious fellowship of Old Testament teachers. Neither Moses nor Elijah compare for a moment with the great spiritual leaders of the later Hebrew history. In comparison with Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah, Jeremiah or the great prophets of the exile their work was only secondary. Yet it is true that in the thought of the Jews of Jesus' day they had a more conspicuous place, because of the revolutionary character of their work. Moses as the leader in the exodus period, and Elijah the fiery antagonist of Ahab and the worship of Baal were more compelling and engaging figures than any of those preachers who addressed their message to an organized and conventional community in the later ages of the nation.

The naive and impulsive character of Peter is again made evident in this scene. Awed by the wonder of the place the other disciples were silent. But Peter impulsively voiced his conviction that something ought to be done to make permanent the value of that scene. He would like to erect three tents for the Master and the two prophets. Yet these words were only his effort to say something in a moment when he felt that something ought to be said. No notice was taken of the speech, but later events in close connection with it proved the real answer. The vision soon faded, leaving the disciples alone with the Lord.

The Height and the Valley.

As they came down from the mountain the disciples inquired of Jesus the meaning of the Jewish belief that Elijah was to come before the Messiah appeared. He told them that the best explanation of that promise in Malachi was to be found in the work of John the Baptist, who had already come and gone, making ready for the greater One who was to follow, and then yielding his place at the call of imprisonment and death.

In Raphael's great painting of the Transfiguration there are two sections, the one representing the scene on the mountain, the other the struggle in the valley below. When Jesus and the three approached the crowd that was gathered, they discovered a boy afflicted with insanity, and the father vainly entreating the disciples to cure the child. Perhaps Jesus looked at Peter as the meaning of the scene came over him. Such a look plainly meant that the tents he had proposed on the mountain were out of place as long as there was such urgent need of their presence in the valley.

Life's Transfigurations.

The disciples had been unable to do anything with this case of demon-possession. Their skill was insufficient, their invocations ineffectual. Jesus warned them that they would find more than once in their career as witnesses for him that it was no easy task to expell the evil spirits from human life. Only by paying the price of personal consecration, only by exemplifying the law of prayer and fasting in themselves, could they expect to overcome the evil against which their efforts were directed.

The entire scene of the Transfiguration is wonderful in its beauty and suggestiveness. The personal friendship of the three disciples with Jesus, the glory and mystery of that mountain scene, the wonder and terror of the disciples, the nervous and eager questioning on the way down from the summit, and the impressive scene of anguish, discocuragement, indignation and victory at the foot of the mountain, conspired to make a wonderful panorama in the life of our Lord. And the chief lesson of this series of events is to be found in the preparation which mountain visions afford for valley service. The men who have tarried always in the lower places, with their eyes undazzled by the wonders of divine power, are the men who have little faith and less courage. They who have been with the Master in the heights and have seen the splendors of heaven burst out from his presence know that all things are possible to the children of God. Most of our work lies in the valley, but there are times when we have the privilege of mountain visions. To keep these best moments as the inspiration of daily effort is the secret of happiness and power to the followers of the Lord.

Best of all is the certainty that the power of God brings just such transfigurations in the life of the Christian. In moments of suffering, of supreme goodness, of loving service for others, character takes on new values, and faces shine as the sun. These are but the foreshadowings of the life to be, when the glory of Christ shall be revealed in us.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES.

Topic July 24: A Life Lived With Christ. Gal. 2:20; I. John 5:1-12.

No man can live a life with Christ who has not been crucified with him. Not the physical crucifixion of the cross. That was the least significant of the crucifixion of our Lord. The big thing about it all was his devotion to his moral and spiritual ideals which led him to the cross. He knew that the Father's house could only be realized by fidelity to righteousness. Upon this point he never hesitated. Sometimes it called for a tender ministry at the bedside of the sick and dying; sometimes it called for the patient instruction of his disciples; again it was the fearless condemnation of vile sins in places high and low; another time it was the driving the money changers out of the temple, or denouncing the hypocracy and dishonesty of scribes and Pharisees. It was this fidelity which led him to his death upon the cross. But whether he was making his triumphal entyr into Jerusalem or standing before Pilate in the judgment hall he was ever true to the cause he espoused. His crucifixion then is the suffering of a martyr to a holy cause. He laid all things aside for its sake. His crucifixion was an example of his perfect self-denial and self-abandon. This must also be true with us. Until we have surrendered everything else for the sake of what is right,

Church Life

—Summer days.

—Many of the churches are announcing only morning services for July and August.

—Our readers will welcome this week the third letter from Charles C. Morrison, descriptive of the Edinburgh Conference.

The third letter from Charles Clayton Morrison, relative to the World's Missionary Conference, has not arrived at the hour when we must go to press. There can be no great certainty about the arrival of mail from such a distance. The letter will be given the readers of the Christian Century in our next issue.

—With the reduced number of pages during the summer we are compelled to omit the page devoted to "Our Readers' Opinions." We have much material on hand for this department and it will receive careful attention as soon as the paper is restored to its normal size.

The church at Martin City, Mo., is without a pastor.

The Second Church, Augusta, Ga., has called E. R. Clarkson as pastor.

Over 24,000 children raised one dollar or more on Children's Day and became members of the One-Dollar League.

About forty of our people attended the great World's Missionary Conference in Edinburgh, Scotland, in June.

The Second Church, Dodge City, Kans., dedicated its new building the tenth of July. F. M. Rains was in charge of the services.

M. H. Garrard, of Saginaw, Mch., has taken charge of the Grace Temple Church of Christ, Battle Creek, Mich.

The brotherhood of the church at Muncie, Ind., were addressed by Grant K. Lewis, July 12, when they had a fine banquet together.

John A. Stevens, Sulphur Springs, Texas, has been called to the church at Baton Rouge, for a period of four years.

Walter S. Rounds, Brooklyn, N. Y., supplied the First Church Warren, Ohio, July 10, morning and evening.

Robert Pagrum, pastor at Golden, Colo., reports four confessions July 3, making nine recent additions at regular services.

O. C. Bolman for three years pastor at Havana, Ill., has been called to the pastorate at Pekin, Ill.

The Boulder, Colo., Bible-school has made a wonderful growth in the past year. It has gained 127 per cent and now numbers 563 in the regular school.

There have been twenty-five additions to the First Church, Philadelphia, Pa., during the first three months' work of the new pastor, L. E. Sellers.

M. M. Amunson, pastor of the Sterling Place Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., is spending the summer in St. Thomas, Ontario. He may be addressed at 48 Rosberry Place.

O. G. Hertzog and wife, of Hiram, Ohio, expect to visit their daughter, Mrs. E. I. Osgood, of Chuchow, China, after the National Convention at Topeka, next October.

Lew D. Hill, Decatur, Ill., evangelist, and Charles E. McVey, singer are in a meeting at Green Top, Mo. The church is without a minister at present.

Edgar DeWitt Jones, pastor First Church, Bloomington, Ill., who is enjoying a European trip this summer, sends greetings from Oxford under date of June 26.

The churches of Liberty, Mo., are holding union Sunday evening meetings. The first meeting of the series was in the Christian Church with the Baptist pastor preaching.

E. C. Wilson, after three and one-half years' service with the Sherman Heights Church, Chattanooga, Tenn., has resigned and goes for a time to Rockwood, Tenn.

Southern Christian College has been organized at West Point, Miss. Grounds and buildings have been purchased and the first session will open September 17. R. A. Burton is president of the school.

A. F. Sanderson who recently resigned at Central Church, Houston, Texas, goes to Eugene, Ore., where he will be associated with his brother, E. C., in the conduct of the Bible University.

The Kansas City Times announces that James N. Crutcher, pastor of the church at Sioux City, Iowa, has been called to succeed T. S. Myers in the pastorate of The Temple Christian Church, Kansas City, Kans.

Sixty members of the Wabash Avenue Church, Kansas City, Mo., are pledged to give regularly and systematically for missions as they do for the current expenses of the church.

Rufus A. Finnell will assist in a meeting with the church at Bedford, Ohio, next October. This church has just received a gift of $7,000, which will be used in the erection of a new building. The pastor is E. C. Harris.

Last week the Foreign Society received $2,500 from a sister in Kentucky on the Annuity Plan, with which to erect a home for Dr. A. L. Shelton, Batang, Border of Tibet. This she does in memory of her late husband.

A. E. Dubber, president of the Northeast Colorado District of the Churches of Christ, and pastor of the church at Greeley, is planning to re-enter the evangelistic field, in which he has had notable success. Mr. Dubber may be addressed at Greeley.

Harvey Hazel, pastor of the Boyle Heights Church, Los Angeles, Cal., Sunday a. m., June 26, made a call for money to pay off the church debt amounting to $1,000. The church and friends responded with an offering of over $1,200. They will soon begin a new church.

Albert Buxton is hard at work in his new pastorate at the Broadway Church in Pueblo, Colo. He recently gave the convention sermon of the south Colorado churches, the memorial sermon on Decoration Day, and the baccalaureate sermon at the Central High School.

The congregation at Carlisle, Ind., dedicated a new house of worship July 17. The dedicatory sermon was preached by the pastor, L. V. Barbre. At two o'clock in the afternoon was a communion service with sermon by J. M. Vawter, pastor at Sullivan. The evening sermon was by S. D. Dutcher, of Terre Haute.

The report comes that a number of the boys in the Damoh Orphanage have recently been baptized, and that others will be soon. The work is prospering. Twenty-nine boys were admitted to the orphanage during the past year. The total number at Damoh in two hundred and sixteen. There were thirteen deaths.

A. L. Clinkerbeard writes that J. B. Boen, and Leonard Daugherty have just closed a meeting with the church at Ladonia, Texas, where Mr. Clinkerbeard ministers. There were twenty-one confessions and six uniting by statement during the meeting. Many men were reached by the meetings.

The convention of the northern district of Colorado was held at Windsor, June 22 and 23. This was the largest attended and most enthusiastic ever held in the district. The state workers present were Sec. L. N. Thompson, State Evangelist C. W. Dean and Bible School Evangelist C. Bower.

The Central Church, Portland, Ore., organized with ten members in 1903, has a present membership of 356, eighty-eight being added last year. A beautiful stone building, estimated to cost $20,000, is about completed. J. F. Ghormley is pastor of this vigorous young church.

The daily press announces that the Second Church, Muskogee, Okla., by a unanimous vote at a meeting held June 2, decided to dissolve its organization, and has made application to the court for recognition of this action. All bills of the church were paid before application was made for the dissolution of the corporation.

The First Church, Quincey, Ill., is putting in the summer working for a building fund, to give them a building adequate to the growing needs of the Sunday-school, which is one of the largest in the city. The committee is now soliciting for the funds, and hope to raise at least $25,000 by autumn. If they succeed in this they will proceed at once with building operations. Clyde Darsie is pastor of this church.

John P. Sala was installed as regular pastor of the Central Church, Dayton, Ohio, June 26. The services were in charge of N. W. Leezer, elder of the church. Dr. Funkhouser represented the ministerial association in an address, and Platt R. Lawton the local Y. M. C. A. Following these brief addresses, Mr. Sala read a statement of his faith and was formally installed as pastor of the church.

With a Sunday-school of 563 and growing congregations the church at Boulder, Colo., is compelled to erect a larger building. In the past year there has been 137 additions to the membership of the church. The men's Bible class, taught by A. L. Ward, has grown too large for any room in the church and has moved to the parlors of one of the large undertaking firms of the city. They had to do it lest they crowd all others out of the school. Mr. Ward has been with the church in Boulder for nearly three years.

Hugh McClellan, pastor of the Central Church, San Antonio, Texas, has established an office in the business district of the city, renting a desk in a real estate office, and going to this office every morning at 8:30 and remaining until twelve o'clock. Mr. McClellan expressed himself as pleased with the plan. It brought him in contact with many men whom he would not otherwise have met. Such a plan pursued for a number of years could but serve to give the preacher a much better understanding of the life of the business man of today, and perhaps a more virile message would result.

At the Missouri State Convention in Jefferson City, June 17-22, there were some important changes in officers for the coming year. T. A. Abbott withdrew from the office of state secretary, after years of faithful service, and D. Y. Donaldson, now pastor of the Wabash Avenue Church, Kansas City, was elected to succeed him. G. L. Bush was elected president for the coming year, and Palmer Clarkson, vice president. J. H. Bryan was chosen superintendent of the Sunday-schools, and R. E. Alexander superintendent of Christian Endeavor, with Paul Moore, president of the state brotherhoods. The convention next year will be held at Cape Girardeau.

A. F. Sanderson, who has been pastor of the Central Church, Houston, Texas, for seven years, has resigned, because of the convention that the time has come when he should make a change. The church insisted upon Mr. Sanderson withdrawing his resignation, but he has remained steadfast in his purpose to take up another work. The church has therefore with regret accepted the resignation and prepared a beautiful testimonial to the character and efficiency of the work which Mr. Sanderson has accomplished in their midst. They mention especially the wonderful advance in missionary offerings, the building of a new house of worship, and the standing of their pastor in the life of the city.

With the month of June G. B. Van Arsdall closed the first five months of his ministry with the Central Church, Denver, Colo. During this time there have been 106 persons received into the church, and only one Sunday has passed when there was no accessions. This has been the greatest year in the history of the church in their gifts to missions. The offering on Easter Sunday for all missions was $1,092, which was more than double any previous year. The Children's Day offering was $1,035. When it is considered that the school has an average attendance of less than 400, this is a remarkable offering. The C. M. Morris class of young ladies, with an average attendance of about seventy-five, contributed $400. Our seven churches in Denver are perfecting a plan of city mission work along the lines of the Kansas City work. Mr. Van Arsdall and his family will spend their vacation during the month of August at Williams Fork River in the mountains.

There is evidence of business sagacity in the announcements that go out from the Sunday-school of the Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City. A card recently mailed to members of the church and the school, with a national flag in one corner, and as head line, "From one Comrade to Another," carries the following announcement: "As you know, our church is going under needy repairs, and is also to be beautifully frescoed. In view of this, until things are completed, we have decided to meet in a tabernacle tent to be built and pitched at the corner of Independence and Benton boulevards, about a square east of the church. Next Sunday morning, July 3, will be the first meeting there. Mr. Small, who is supplying for Dr. Combs, will preach a Fourth of July sermon on 'The Philosophy of American Civilization.'" etc. This announcement is signed by a member of the official board acting for the body, and the superintendent of the Sunday-school.

A new church has been organized at Maryland Park, a new suburb of the national capital. There was no church of any denomination in the suburb. A Sunday-school was begun by a member of the Baptist church. Then came the desire for a church for the community. George A. Miller, of the Ninth Street Church, was invited to visit the little group and explain the position of the Christian church regarding union. The following Sunday he was invited to organize a church which should call itself simply church of Christ, and take the Bible alone as its rule of faith and practice. Two lots were given by the Ninth Street church, and the little band will proceed at once to the erection of a building. This is the tenth church of the Disciples to be organized in Washington and its suburbs, where twenty years ago there was but one church. Through all these years F. D. Power has been devotedly serving the interests of the cause at the capital. Our readers will be glad to know that he is about recovered from his recent illness and is again attending part of the meetings of the Richmond Avenue Church.

The Iowa State Convention at Boone, was pronounced one of the best. The C. W. B. M. sessions were given first place on the program and were well attended. The reports showed twenty-four new auxiliaries, with a present list of 203. Seventy-six auxiliaries were on the honor roll. The treasurer reported dues to national treasury $5,342.69; C. W. B. M. Day receipts, $2,738.56; Iowa special fund, $1,315.52; Negro work, $1,055.12; centennial fund, $4,756.98; other specials, annuities, etc., $7,280.47; paid out of state fund to national, $355.97. Total from auxiliaries to headquarters, $22.805.31. Young people's department to headquarters, $1,946.93. The officers the next year are: Mrs. Florence Haggard, president; Mrs. Alice Peak, vice president; Mrs. Leta Page Ashley, treasurer; Miss Anette Newcomer, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Ida Slayton, recording secretary. The I. C. C. sessions were full of life and hope. Officers for next year: B. W. Garrett, Des Moines, president; L. L. Taylor, Centerville, vice president; J. J. Grove, Ames, recording secretary; J. M. Lucas, Des Moines, treasurer; B. S. Denney, corresponding secretary.

Enthusiasm ran highest at the Brotherhood session, and banquet, the closing evening. The principal address was by F. W. Burnham, Springfield, Ill. The officers for the coming year are: Prof. C. N. Kinney, Des Moines, president; E. F. Leake, Newton, vice president; Dwight Lewis, Des Moines, secretary; and G. C. Hostetter, Des Moines, treasurer. The next convention goes to Ottumwa.

John W. Marshall has been engaged to assist D. F. Cross and the church at Turon, Kans., in a revival campaign during the month of September. O. M. Walker will have charge of the music.

W. A. Late, a young Australian just graduated from Hiram, has accepted a call to the church at Bloomingdale, Michigan. Both church and minister are looking forward to larger things.

J. C. Read, Chandler, Oklahoma, has accepted a call to the church at Salida, Colo. Mr. Read has had a two years' successful work in Chandler, and members of the church and the community gave him and his family a hearty farewell reception.

George A. Campbell, pastor of the church at Austin, Ill., goes with his family this week to Pentwater, Michigan, where the family will spend the summer. Mr. Campbell will return to preach Sundays during July, and will take his vacation during August.

FOR THE SUMMER QUARTER

Now is the time to send your order for the Bethany Graded Sunday School Lessons for the Summer Quarter, beginning July 1.

Many schools will install the Graded Lessons in the Summer so as to "get used" to them by the opening of the new season in October.

In October there will be four new courses added to the three that have been running the past year.

Next year will be a rich year for the Graded Schools. Get ready for it by introducing the Bethany Lessons July 1.

Samples Sent Free to Ministers, Superintendents or Teachers, upon application. Send today for our convenient order blank.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

no matter what the cost, we have not been crucified with Him nor are we living with Him. Indeed we must undergo such a crucifixion on order that we may live with him.

But let us not forget that important as it is this is not the biggest thing a Christian, who is sincerely trying to live a life with Christ, has to do. When once the surrender full and complete has been made there still remains the obligation of actively living the true life. That is to use Paul's phrase let "Christ live in you." That is, you make the spirit which marked the life of Christ characterize your life. The true Christian is constantly asking, not what did Jesus do, but what would he do in my place? What would he have me do? To have Christ live in us, is for us to carry the same spirit of fearlessness and fairness to all our problems and tasks that he did. The same sympathy and tenderness in the midst of need and suffering; the willingness to serve in the presence of an opportunity; the same fearlessness in the presence of danger; and the same faith in the Father in the time of defeat.

We, of course, are not in the midst of a physical suffering from persecution. We have a more subtle foe. Sin of the vilest sort ofttimes is concealed in the most pleasing forms. Apparently harmless and delightful it steals around us and we find ourselves in its toils when we least suspect it. We all have our particular tastes, desires, and ambitions. Many of them are difficult of realization for us. Here seems to us an easy way. Why not embrace? But is it right? Could the world stand if all men employed such methods? Here is the struggle, and the victory, if we be strong and alert. Such a life lived "in the flesh is lived by faith in the Son of God."

Victory in Sight

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first seven days of July amounted to $12,677, an increase over the corresponding seven days of last year of $2,247. This brings the total receipts of the year up to $239,115, an increase over the corresponding time last year of $38,345. These are cheerful figures. Bear in mind that we started on this missionary year to reach $400,000. This involves an increase of $49,315 over last year. Already $38,345 has been gained. If we can show a gain of $10,970 between this (July 7) and September 30, the $400,000 will have been reached.

Victory is in sight! We must not fail now. Let every friend rally at once. Send all offerings to F. M. Rains, secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Bible School Conference

The first summer Bible-school conference of the Bible-schools of the Christian church in West Tennessee convened at Humboldt, July 1, 2, and 3. The conference was in charge of E. S. Smith, state Bible-school evangelist, who is holding similar conferences in Central and eastern Tennessee in an effort to better organize and perfect the Bible-school work in the state. The conference opened Friday night with an address by J. E. Stuart of Union City, on "The New Bible-school Vision." Saturday addresses were made by Thomas A. Young on "The History and Present Worth of the Bible-school"; E. S. Baker, of Jackson, on "The Intermediate Boy"; A. B. Reeves of Paris, on "The Place of the Bible in the Bible-school"; L. D. Riddell of Memphis, on "Teaching Missions in the Bible-school"; E. S. Smith on "The Adult Bible Class at Work." In the afternoon R. L. Giddens delivered an address on "Our Financial Obligations," and in the evening Robert M. Hopkins, national Bible-school secretary, brought the conference to a close with a remarkably strong and stirring address on "What Is a Bible-school?" The most enjoyable and helpful feature of the conference was the open parliament in charge of Mr. Hopkins in which at various times during the conference were discussed such subjects as "The Graded School," "Teacher Training," "The Regular Teachers' Meeting," "Missions and Benevolences," and "The Adult Bible Class."

The conference is over; the many delegates have returned to their home schools; now watch for front rank schools in West Tennessee!

Thomas A. Young,
Minister Humboldt Christian Church.

State Christian Endeavor Convention

Waukegan, Ill., from July 13 to 17, will be the scene of a remarkable demonstration by the Christian Endeavorers of the state. Representatives of the 1,200 individual societies with a membership of about 35,000, will gather for spiritual and social development.

The general theme of the whole convention is "The Truth." Tvery phase of Christian Endeavor activities will be covered by experts. Among them will be Rev. Francis E. Clark, D. D., founder and president of the Christian Endeavor movement, Rev. James M. Gray, D. D., dean of Moody Bible Institute of Chicago; Rev. Dr. W. H. W. Boyle, of Lake Forest, Ill., Mr. B. C. Bonnarjee, a high caste native of India, now a Christian missionary, Hon. Nicholas L. Johnson, of Batavia, Ill., Persident O. B. Whitaker of Christian College, Merom, Ind,, Miss Helen M. Strong, of Lake Geneva, Miss Blanche G. Loveridge, of Dennison University, Granville, Ohio, Prof. H. S. Magill of Princeton, Ill., Rev. Dr. Stifler, of Evanston, besides the strongest Christian Endeavor workers of Chicago, as follows: Prof. E. C. Knapp of Chicago Theological Seminary, Rev. E. L. Reiner, Mr. Charles E. McBurney, Mr. A. Gladden Beebout, Mr. E. L. Van Keurin, Mrs. Mazie Campfield Dean, and A. G. Fegert. Mr. Walter R. Ceperly, president of the state organization, will make the closing address.

Bible Conference at Boulder

The second session of the Bible conference to be held in Boulder will meet July 10 and close July 17. Two notable series of addresses have been arranged for. Each will extend throughout the conference. First, George R. Wendling will give his series of six lectures on "Modern Doubt." Second, Rev. William J. Dawson will give a series of addresses on the following subjects: "Prayer, the Forgotten Secret"; "In Praise of Fanaticism"; "The Evangelism of Jesus"; "Fragments"; "Obedience to Vision"; "The Religious Difficulties of the Educated."

Rev. Robert W. Gammon, pastor of the First Congregational Church, Decatur, Ill., will give a series of five morning Bible studies.

Professor A. W. Moore, of the Chair of Philosophy in the University of Chicago, will give an address on "Some Ethical and Religious Aspects of Present Movements in Philosophy."

The Essential Significance of Graded Lessons

RULING PRINCIPLE

The new education puts the pupil at the center and requires the instruction to be adapted to his needs. The history of education shows that the pupil for a very long while was denied this central position. The question of interest belonged to the instructor, not to the instructed. But modern education entirely reverses this. The nature of the pupil, and the consequent needs of the pupil, receive first consideration. Modern psychology, particularly the study of the child-mind, has shifted the educational center from subjects to persons.

BEGINNERS

The series begins where the child's conscious thought always begins, with the parental idea, and presents God to the child-mind as the heavenly Father, and leads it to the conception of this divine fatherhood through the simple and familiar relations of the child to its earthly parents. The very reading of the topics which are the subjects of the lessons in the course for Beginners is like sweet and simple music, and to any heart capable of appreciating the simplicities of truth it will indicate how natural and simple religion is as belonging to the very nature of the soul, entering into its most germinal development and working itself out in all the processes of growth.

PRIMARY

In the Primary grade the same simple but great themes touched upon in the Beginners course are continued, but just sufficiently developed to correspond to the growing capabilities of the child's mind, including, but not going beyond the widening circle of the child's extending associations and experiences. Nothing is forced in upon the child that is unchildlike in character; truths which the child can comprehend and that have natural place in his life are presented and repeated with that reiteration which the child's mind requires, while the teacher is content to wait for the germination and silent growth of the simplest seeds of truth in the child's heart.

JUNIOR

In the Junior lessons the pulse of life begins to throb more strongly. The great subjects of religious thought begin to enter; the simple introduction to the great story of history begins; the wonderful stories of the Bible begin to exercise their fascination; duties growing out of natural relationships are recognized; the choice of good and evil, and the fateful results of such choices, are made to be seen and felt; and the thought of God's providence over individual life is given manifold illustration in the biblical stories. In the fourth year of the series a more careful study of the briefer of the four Gospels is entered upon, followed by a study of the most striking incidents described in the book of Acts, and closing with stories from that larger book of Acts, the lives of later Christian missionaries.

INTERMEDIATE

Here we find ourselves where adolescent life begins, when the child ceases and the man begins; when the stirrings of those ambitions which are to issue in great deeds begin to manifest themselves; when the sympathies and affections become more intense; when the great choices and decisions are made; when the heroic spirit becomes dominant and when ideals are set up; when the great temptations open their deadly assaults; when the reason begins to exercise itself: a period of strife, and tumult, and strain, of high resolving, of deadly peril, of glorious victory. To this fateful period our new series of lessons comes with definite and intelligent understanding. Christ forever knocks at the door of life in every stage, but more distinctly and strongly does he knock at the door of the heart of youth at this period than at any other time.

SENIOR

This is the period for constructive study. It is the altruistic period of life and its spirit is optimistic. The individual begins to define his relations to others and the duties growing out of those relations. The sense of obligation and responsibility grows, purpose becomes more definite and the formulation of a life program is undertaken. Consequently the steady aim of the study and instruction in this period is to help the pupil to find his place and work in the world.

NEW CONCEPTION

The new movement is the outgrowth of the larger conception of religious education. According to this new conception the factors entering into the process are much more varied than was formerly supposed. All truth belongs to religious education, from whatever source it may be derived. Moreover, the aim of all genuine education is the production of sound character, and all instruction must be directed to this purpose. Consequently into these new courses is to be introduced the study of great characters other than those included in the Scriptures. And the moral heroes of every generation will be summoned to illustrate and impress the great elements of noble character.

THE BIBLE

The Bible is used as the most valuable material in moral and religious instruction; and it is used with discrimination, with a clear understanding that we must select from it in the progressive education of the child such material as answers to the needs of the child at the various stages of his growth. The Bible is a great storehouse of spiritual food, but in its stores is food for the little child and the strong man. Henceforth we are to give to the child only that which belongs to the child and to the man only what belongs to the man.

Passing Controversies

Nothing is more characteristic of the Christian faith than the changes which take place in its outstanding discussions. For the story of religion is a story of controversy, and our own religion is no exception to the rule.

From the beginning men have fought every rood of the field of doctrine, and their confessions of faith have been the results of bitter warfare. This is the side of religion which is the least pleasing. Yet it is the surest proof of the value of spiritual experience, and of the vitality of faith which enables it to survive, and even to profit by the unlovely antagonisms that have been waged in its name.

No merely human scheme of teaching could have endured the fierce internal struggles through which Christianity has passed. Were this the whole of the matter, religion would long ago have ceased to influence men. But controversy is one of the proofs of the essential value of the religious life, which is willing to endure much of contention only so its best possessions be safeguarded.

Controversy is the inevitable result of the fact that no statement of even the most firmly rooted truth is final. Doctrines are destined to change—all of them. The false, because they cannot survive the testing process of time and investigation; the true, because no final form can ever be given to any truth.

At best, it can only be framed in the fullest phrase which the thought and language of the time can give it. The next generation will state it in different and ampler manner.

This is the reason why no definition of even such fundamental doctrines as the atonement, the person of Christ, inspiration, or the nature of God can ever be more than tentatively set forth.

If they were dead certainties, as some theologians would like to make them, they could easily be labeled, described and put away in their appropriate niches for future examination.

But they are living truths, and like all such things, they are always in process of growth and change in the thought of an actually living and working world.

A doctrine is like the wall of a city. It is an excellent thing for limitation and defense. But it always has the disadvantage of being inadequate. Presently there comes a time when a new wall must be provided for the growing population, or else someone will have to live on the outside.

Nothing is more eloquent of the growing nature of Christianity than the list of the controversies it has outgrown. Today the very names sound quaint, archaic and absurd.

What would an average Christian of today, even one well informed, think if you were to ask him his opinion of Docetism, or Montanism, or the Quartodecimans, or Donatism, or Novatianism, or Sublapsarianism, or the views of Pelagius?

Yet these were all of them living issues in their time, themes of controversy which divided the theologians into hostile camps. Today they have no significance. For all save the antiquarian they are as extinct as the dodo.

Nor must it be supposed that these were only superficial matters. Some of them involved the very foundations of the faith. And not one of the fierce battles waged over even the most obscure points failed to contribute its share to the larger faith of the future.

Each century, each generation, indeed, has engaged in doctrinal wars which have left their effects on the church for years to come.

In the fifth century the great theme of contention was the person of Christ, in the tenth the nature of man, in the sixteenth the character of salvation. These are but examples from a long list that would cover well-nigh every generation of Christian history.

And in nearly all instances the controversy has arisen between the static and dynamic forces in the church; the advocates of the accepted truth, and those who insisted upon a fresh examination of the facts.

In some instances the victory lay with one and in some with the other of the two parties. Sometimes a bold and ill-advised theory was urged, against which the church had to defend itself by argument.

But in other cases, and these a considerable majority, a newer and more vital interpretation of the Christian faith had to contend with the intrenched conservatism of the ecclesiastical or educational institutions of the day.

In the fire of controversy every new phase of truth is tested, and comes to acceptance only when it can render a satisfactory reason for its existence. When the truth of the new view is accepted, controversy ceases.

This does not mean that all have adopted the new teaching, but it means that it has come to sufficient prevalence to make further contention unprofitable. The irreconcilables are left to take care of themselves, and life and death both assist in the process.

Something of this changing order is seen in the decline of controversy over evolution and the higher criticism in our own time. When they were first presented, the one by the students of natural science, the other by the workers in the field of Biblical literature, they aroused a storm of opposition, chiefly because they were at variance with accepted views, and because they were so largely misunderstood.

In the one case, it was urged by the defenders of the current orthodoxy that evolution ruled God out of the universe, and reduced everything to the reign of force. With wider knowledge of the fact, this contention has ceased to have weight, and the doctrine of evolution has not only come to be the fundamental interpretation of the phenomena of nature, but it is seen to be the most convincing proof of the work of God in the order of the universe.

Today the principle of evolution is as habitually accepted in every range of scientific work, from the primary class of the public school to the university, as the law of gravitation, or the Copernican system of astronomy. This does not mean that the last word has been spoken, but it does mean that science will never go back to the static view of the universe.

Similarly the principles of the higher criticism have been so fully vindicated in the realm of biblical study, and have added so incalculably to the assets of the Bible teacher, that the battle over the acceptance of the method and its results has ceased to have significance.

This does not mean that there are not still further facts to be ascertained, nor that there are not those who still valiantly champion the outworn and impossible view of the past. But it does mean that the world of Christian scholarship has given over the contention that was necessary a half generation ago, and is now quietly cultivating the field that has been occupied.

Thus old controversies pass, leaving their results as the solid substance of future teaching. And as inevitably new controversies arise, which involve issue vital to the new time.

Saloniki (Ancient Thessalonica)

Mr. William E. Curtis, the well-known correspondent of the Chicago-Record Herald has been making a tour of the Eastern Mediterranean region of late. In one of his letters, descriptive of Saloniki, the ancient Thessalonica, he says:

From the time of St. Paul's visit to Saloniki he has been identified with the history of the city, and all writers, regardless of their religion, seem to consider this a matter of great importance. Other great men are also associated with its past. Cicero spent several years here while he was in exile, and Aristotle was born nearby. In the walls of what is now the Mosque of St. George—originally a temple and believed to have been built by the Roman Emperor Trajan in imitation of the Pantheon at Rome, the Emperor Theodosius was baptized, and St. Paul is believed to have preached from a marble pulpit which was removed to the museum at Constantinople a few years ago. Saloniki was the terminus of the famous Roman road which ran across the Balkan peninsula from the Adriatic to the Aegean Sea, and was called the Via Egnatia.

There has been added to the Assyrian collections of the British Museum a monument that will prove of the greatest interest to students of Biblical history, according to a recently published paper by Prof. W. St. Chad Bascouren. Of all the non-Hebrew characters in the Old Testament there is none of greater importance than Sennacherib, King of Assyria. His invasion of Palestine in B. C. 702, and his embassy to Hezekiah in the subsequent seige of the city of Jerusalem, are all incidents known to the Biblical reader; and any monument throwing light upon these events and their actors must be of special interest to the Bible student.

There is now exhibited in the Assyrian Room of the British Museum a fine terra-cotta cylinder of Sennacherib, which is certainly one of the finest monuments yet recovered from the grave mounds of of the Assyrian capital. The cylinder is eight-sided, and is inscribed with 740 lines of beautiful cuneiform writing. It contains a full account of the principal events of the first four years of the King's reign, and also the record of the two campaigns hitherto not known—that is, war in Cilicia and Asia Minor, including a seige and capture of the city of Tarsus.

The most valuable portion of the inscription is the full account given of the building of Nineveh and its palaces by Sennacherib, who found it a poor and neglected city, not fitted to be the capital of his great empire. In six years he built a splendid palace—that explored by Sir Henry Layard—which, he says, was "the place having no equal, the wonder of the whole earth." He built some eight miles of fortification walls seventy feet thick, in which were fifteen gates, the names of which he gives. He laid out a beautiful park, in which he had a collection of wild animals in a botanical garden in which were strange plants and trees from all parts of his great empire.

In this portion of the inscription there is one very interesting passage. The King says that among the trees planted were "trees that bore wool" and that "they picked this and made garments of it." So this is undoubtedly the earliest known mention of the cotton tree. The account which the King gives of the broad streets, the mighty fortifications and the splendid palaces throws much light upon the description of the wicked city given by the prophet Nahum (ch. ii. and iii.), who lived probably only a short time after Sennacherib. The Hebrew prophet mentions the streets and the broad ways, and the King says, "he made straight the streets and laid out the broad ways." So also Nahum speaks of the wealth of the city: "Take ye spoil of silver and gold, and there is no end of the store and glory." So Sennacherib calls Nineveh the city "full or rich treasure of silver and gold, the storehouse of works of art." The dwelling place of the lions of Nahum (ii:11) is evidently a reference to the royal park laid out by Sennacherib, and all things seem to show by this inscription that the Hebrew writer knew the Assyrian capital well. His terrible denunciations of the well-favored harlot, "the mistress of witchcraft," is commonly applied to Istni, of whom we are told in scriptrue Nineveh "was the beloved city." The historical portion of the inscription opens with an account of the defeat of Merodach-Baladan, King of Babylonia, who a few years previously had sent an embassy to Hezekiah. Sennacherib defeated the Babylonians and their Elamite allies at Kish, a little south of Babylon. Merodach-Baladan fled to the marshes on the shores of the Persian Gulf, and Babylon was taken and sacked.

A full account is given of the war in Palestine, of the capture of Zidon, Askalon and Ekron, and the siege of Jerusalem. There is no reference to the catastrophe which destroyed the Assyrian army, but the abrupt termination of the campaign, and the sudden return of Sennacherib to Nineveh, indicate a change of policy. The abrupt ending agrees with Isaiah (xxxvii. 37). Sennacherib, King of Assyria, departed and went and returned and dwelt at Nineveh. Here the tribute and embassy of Hezekiah followed him. The passage in the Thirty talents of gold, 600 talents of silver, precious stones, antimony, etc., couches of ivory, portable thrones of elephant skin, woods of various kinds, the rich treasures, and his daughters and the women of the palace, male and female musicians (these) to the midst of Nineveh, the city of my lordship, after me he caused to be brought. To give gifts and tribute and render service he sent his envoy.

This passage is not new, but it is additional evidence of the accuracy of the Biblical account.

Christian Hearing

The sins of hearing are very great. We sin against our own souls, against our neighbor, and against God. We deprive ourselves of knowledege of which we stand in daily need. We wrong our neighbor by attributing to him sentiments which he loathes. We shut God out of our lives because we do not listen to what he is saying to us through all the channels of his revelation.

Hearing is a process that requires effort. The lazy man cannot be a good listener. Words vary in meaning. Back of every uttterance is the character of the one who speaks and we cannot know his words until we know him. Men whose experiences are very much like our own can be understood by us easily. But we often make the mistake of thinking that because the material surroundings of a man are like ours, his experiences are necessarily like ours. The prophet is without honor in his own country because his associates believe they have exhausted the meaning of the facts and events with which he is familiar. When he declines to be guided by the eddies of history and points out the main current, he is called a fanatic and a disturber of the peace.

Controversy increases the difficulties of hearing. The facts and interpretations of the theological or political pugilist should be carefully scrutinized before they are accepted. He may not consciously misrepresent his opponents. He may be at peace with his conscience and feel that he is upholding the truth of God. His conscientiouness does not make him a safe guide. He has no sympathy for the men he attacks and therefore he misinterprets what they say and do. When neighbors quarrel and make statements about one another that are not true, it does not follow that they are deliberately lying. When a man is mad he cannot see straight and therefore he cannot tell the truth. We must not call him a liar neither have we a right to believe what he says about the other man.

The Bible is made to teach whatever is agreeable to the prejudices of its readers. "Let the Bible speak for itself" sounds well, but few of us are willing to live up to the exhortation. We read it as if the characters were men of our generation and spoke the English language. The imaginative portions of the Bible are sometimes read as if they were intended to be understood without the help of emotion. We use in our temperance lessons, passages that have no bearing upon the subject. We quote a verse and apply it without the qualification it has in its setting and we abuse the man who tries to set us right and accuse him of rejecting the Scripture. We bring the words of Jesus down to the level of our experience instead of trying to live up to the level of Jesus. If we would let the Bible speak for itself, we must study in order to understand the situations which it was written to meet and we must so act that we can appreciate the enthusiasm and the devotion of the worlds spiritual heroes.

The world is plagued with men and women who think they are reformers when in fact they are busy-bodies. To such we may apply the caution of James: "Be swift to hear, slow to wrath." The wrath of empty headed meddlers does not disturb evil-doers. The real reformer knows what is wrong with society and he has some definite thing to do for the improvement of conditions. He has too much sense to look for the golden age to come in through the adoption of any scheme he has to propose. He has listened long enough to know that progress is due to those who can see how to direct forces they find operative among men and who do not promise to cure every evil. The meddler is looking for an occupation. He has neither seriousness nor courage for a man's work. He never learns anything. In middle life and old age he thinks he is a pessimist and to show that he is, he is willing to get money by any sort of dishonesty.

The itching ear is trained to catch pleasant sounds. The quality of the pleasure is never considered. It does not bother persons with itching ears that their pleasures rob others of innocence and health and happiness. The soothing voice may be that of outgrown dogma or of some new fangled religion. It may be the voice of atheism. It does not matter what is back of it; the one requirement is that it be not a call to duty but to pleasure. Earnestness is foolishness and sacrifice betrays a disordered mind. The preacher of righteousness never tickles the itching ear. He boxes it. If he can break the drum membrane, he will do the owner a service.

Social Survey

BY HARRY F. BURNS.

Conditions in Bethlehem Steel Works

The deplorable conditions of the men employed in the Bethlehem Steel Works, are presented in a long report just issued by the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America. This report is made by a special committee appointed by the social service commission, consisting of Rev. Charles Stelzle, Dr. Josiah Strong, and Paul U. Kellogg, who investigated in person the conditions in South Bethlehem. The committee reports that just before the strike, 4,725 men, or 51 per cent of all the employees, worked twelve hours a day; 220 workmen had a twelve-hour day except Saturday when they worked ten or eleven hours; 4,203 employees had a work day of ten and a half to eleven hours in length, generally with a half day off on Saturday. The evils of these long hours were intensified by the existence in many departments of a seven-day week. The situation with regard to Sunday work in Bethlehem is worse than in the Pittsburg steel mills as found by the Pittsburg Survey. The committee asserts that while it is claimed by the management that Sunday and overtime work is optional with the men, in reality they are often compelled by their bosses to work on Sunday against their protest, and upon pain of discharge. It was a case of this kind which precipitated the strike. Regarding wages, the committee reports that 61 per cent of the 9,184 men employed earned less than eighteen cents an hour or $2.16 for a twelve-hour day; and 31 per cent earned less than fourteen cents an hour, or less than $1.68 cents for a twelve-hour day. Such a wage the committee declares, leaves no option but the boarding boss method of living with many men in a room. Where a man has a family they must keep boarders, or the woman must also become a bread winner.

Criticisms of the Church

It was declared by the labor organizers that during the strike the churches—Protestant as well as Catholic—gave no aid to the men who were fighting for a great moral issue, and the labor organizers insisted that "the company has taken money out of the pay envelopes of the laboring men without their consent to pay the same over to the clergy, and that there is a standing offer to all the ministers of Bethlehem, to have the church dues collected through the company's office." The committee held conferences with the Protestant ministers of Bethlehem, in which it was clearly brought out that the ministers as a body had frequently appeared before the officials of the corporations, requesting that all unneccessary Sunday work be abolished, and that public meetings had been arranged by the clergy to protest against Sunday labor. It was also shown that not any of the Protestant ministers had accepted the company's offer to collect church dues. But of the strikers' criticism that the ministers had practically championed the cause of the corporations, the committee says there seems to be some justification, for the clergymen in a published statement administered a sharp rebuke to the strikers for "using any means whether foul or fair to embarrass and cripple the steel company" and put to the strikers the question: "Is it reasonable to expect that by attacking your employer openly and in secret and by trying to destroy his property, and his business, you can best pursuade him to deal generously and magnanimously with you?" But there is, the committee declares, no corresponding censure of the corporation officials, for compelling unneccessary Sunday work through a period of years, and the continuance of such wrongs as were shown to exist. The commission says there is not a word in the ministers' statement to bring this truth home to the conscience of the officials. The committee further declares that "nothing would be more exasperating to the workingman than to assume that he desires to persuade his employer to deal generously and magnanimously with him." What he desires and demands is not generosity and magnanimity at the hands of his employer, but simply justice.

Remedies Suggested

The questions raised by the Bethlehem strike, lead the committee to make a number of practical recommendations. It declares that, "a twelve-hour day and a seven-day week are alike a disgrace to civilization; that there is a way of avoiding each, but they will not be avoidable until society requires the backward members of the community to conform to the standards recognized by the decent men." It recommends that there should be laws requiring three shifts in all industries operating twenty-four hours a day, and that there should be laws requiring one day of rest in seven for all workmen in seven-day industries. This requirement should first of all be enforced by the United States government in its contracts for armor-plate, war vessels, construction work and the like. The committee also recommends that church conferences set apart a day for the discussion of industrial conditions and the relation of the churches to them; and that "the churches of America be urged to initiate a movement comparable with the old Sunday Observance movement which resulted in the placing of Sunday laws on the statute books of most states." It suggests that the churches inaugurate a movement to place in the hands of some appropriate body the determination of when industrial operations are necessarily continuous and must necessarily be performed on Sunday. At present this decision rests with managers who are pressed for haste by purchasers, for output by their directors and for profits by stockholders. Finally the committee urges that, "it is essential that there be some method whereby employees may approach their employers with their grievances without prejudice against those selected to represent them. The committee would raise the question of the right of all workers to organize in such a manner as may seem best to them, providing they keep within the limits of the law, and we recommend that employers of labor recognize such organizations when they speak in behalf of their members." One can but welcome this tendency of the modern church to speak with the assurance of careful investigation on these great moral issues of our day.

Chicago's Milk Supply

The milk commission, recently appointed by Mayor Busse, at the instigation of the Health Department, have just made a preliminary report to the city council. The committee has been busy gathering data, and to show the magnitude of the work undertaken reports, that the milk supply of Chicago averages 240,000 gallons per day, is produced by 120,000 cows on 12,000 farms, in four states, and 120 cars are required daily for its transportation, and the work of 5,000 distributors. The committee feels that it has only begun its work, and at its own suggestion has been constituted a permanent commission. The committee has proceeded far enough, however, to feel warranted in making the following statement which is not at all reassuring to the 2,500,000 milk users of Chicago: "We have definitely agreed, however, in the opinion that the milk supply of the city of Chicago, as shown by its bacteriological count, is probably the dirtiest of any large city in the United States, but that this is in no sense the fault of the city's health department. On the contrary, that department has already secured great improvement in the character of the milk supply and is doing rather more than could be fairly expected of its under-manned, under-paid, and utterly inadequately supported organization." The committee recommends that it be continued, and that a completely new set of ordinances relating to the subject be drafted, that for the present there be a rigid enforcement of existing ordinances with a material increase in the number of inspectors, and that the council pass an ordinance absolutely forbidding the marketing of any milk at a temperature of above 50 degrees Fahrenheit. There can be little doubt but that the question of a pure milk supply as now being worked out by Chicago's Health Department sustains the most vital relation to the health of the entire population. No price is too great to pay for its solution.

Roosevelt and the Prize-Fight

In the Outlook of July 16 Ex-president Roosevelt makes an unqualified statement of his disapproval of the prize-fight. This statement is the more significant because Mr. Roosevelt, in the article referred to, confesses his interest in boxing as a form of athletics developing courage, endurance, and self-control. The Colonel even confesses to have, in his younger days, engaged in a few public exhibitions of the sport. But the prize-fight by professional boxers, and for purses, he utterly condemns as unworthy of our civilization and declares his hope that the recent "disgraceful affair at Reno" will be the very last time the state will allow such a debauch within her borders. His words are: "I sincerely trust that public sentiment will be so aroused, and will make itself felt so effectively, as to guarantee that this is the last prize-fight to take place in the United States: and it would be an admirable thing if some method could be devised to stop the exhibition of the moving pictures taken thereof."

Missions and Unity

Christendom in Missionary Council Deplores Sectarian Divisions

BY CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

The World Missionary Conference in session at Edinburgh yesterday drew a line from which a new epoch in the movement for the reunion of Christendom will be dated. If any lonely pleader for the restoration of the lost unity of the church has grown discouraged at the magnitude of the task and the inertia of Christ's people, let him take heart. More than the seven thousand with which God comforted Elijah are on his side. Signs more certain than the ambiguous auguries with which our fainting souls have been sustained for many years are now pointing to the inevitable overthrow of sectarianism and the realization of the true catholic Church of Christ.

Revealed Two Things.

The Edinburgh Conference has revealed two things, both fundamental. One is that Christendom is in dead earnest in evangelizing the world for Jesus Christ. The other is that no force is competent to successfully prosecute the missionary enterprise save a united church.

The great text of the conference, the quoting of which has grown in frequency with the passing of the days, is "that they all may be one, that the world may believe."

As I indicated in my last letter, the union sentiment has been disclosing itself every day in the conference. But the whole of yesterday was given to a consideration of this aspect of the missionary problem. It was a day long to be remembered by the disciples present.

A Radical Report.

To begin with, the delegates had in their hands the report of the Commission on Unity and Co-operation which, when the variety of opinion represented by the conference is considered, was a document of remarkably radical character. The various methods of unity were discussed—joint action, comity and federation—on the basis of a wide questionaire among more than one hundred missionaries. Not for a moment would this commission, whose chairman was Sir Andrew Fraser, late Lieut. Governor of Bengal, allow that these aspects of unity satisfied the demands of the situation. Something higher than any of them is necessary.

In the conclusion of its report the commission suggests that no schemes of unity will work until there has been a radical change in the moral attitude of the church. The problem of unity is essentially a moral one, not a mechanical one.

Dr. E. W. Kilbren told how nine denominations working in Western China had successfully carried out a plan for delimiting a territory with a population of over ninety million. The societies work together in twelve different ways which he specified, one of which was the free interchange of members. When this item was named it brought resounding applause which was redoubled when the speaker declared that their common goal lay beyond this sort of co-operation, good as it was, and consisted in the definite establishment of "one Christian Church for Western China."

Picturesque and Pointed.

After this came one of the most admirable shorter speeches of the conference. Rev. Cheng Ching-Yi, of Shanghai, was the speaker. In occidental dress, his countenance and physique were strikingly more Western than the average Chinese. And not even the American speakers, who were everywhere praised for their faculty of plunging at once into the subject, were more forceful, and lucid than he.

The Plea of the Orient.

Other missionaries spoke, declaring that the Orient had no interest in the creedal discussions that lie at the basis of the Western sectarian order of things, and begging the church to send the Gospel only and leave the native church to work out its own formulas of faith and its own type of organization. There was evident practical unanimity among the missionaries and native Christians in the conference in the vital importance of propagating only a unitary Christianity in the mission fields.

Toward the end of the morning session a "kink" was temporarily put in the proceedings by the Angelican constituency of the conference. The Church of England had been most conspicuous from the opening session when the Archbishop of Canterbury delivered an almost prophetic speech. It was an open secret among the delegates that the Anglicans had come into the conference only on condition that a consideration of missions in Roman Catholic countries was not to be a part of the program. As a consequence of this delimitation of the scope of the discussions the South American republics, Mexico, Spain and, for the most part, the Philippine Islands, were not brought into the purview of the conference at all. The Anglican communion, especially the High Church wing, is most sensitive to its attitude toward Rome with whom many of its leaders have more in common than with protestant evangelicals.

Had Got on His Nerves.

It was no surprise, then, when the Bishop of Southwark arose to speak. The frankness and abandon with which the subject was being treated by the missionaries and the mission converts was evidently wearing on this High Churchman's nerves. They were making altogether too simple a problem of it. They seemed intent on brushing to one side the things that seperate and standing together upon the big common things in which they were agreed. Something must be said to complicate the problem. Standing within the protestant evangelical bodies represented there, nothing could be found to inhibit the flow of union sentiment. So the Bishop went beyond the conference and, dragging in the Church of Rome as if by the heels, argued that we could not call anything by the name of unity that left Rome out, and that we could not get anywhere by using such words as "oecumenical" when we remembered that we were not dealing with that section of Christendom which had at that moment, he was told on high authority, considerably more members in the non-Christian parts of the world than all of us there put together.

A Time of Tension.

There was an ominous hush resting upon the house, and a tremulous fear lest the bishop's words were going to break the spell of harmony in which all had rejoiced up to this moment. Two delegates called out "Question," and the speaker made a long pause. Continuing, he said that they were there to give and take respect for each other's opinions.

It was a relief when this speech was done. Reading it today, it does not seem other than a true statement of the ultimate problem of unity. But it was altogether irrelevant to the work of this conference. The implication that the many sects of evangelicals can do nothing at all until they can propose a scheme of unity large and final enough to include Rome also is false and it took some time for the delegates to catch their breath. In the interval Bishop Brent of the Philippines spoke in much the same manner as had the Bishop of Southwark and he was followed by Bishop Montgomery, high priest of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the High Anglican missionary agency. He wanted it to be understood that he was an Anglican first and a Protestant in parts.

Later in the day the Bishop of Durham (Dr. H. C. C. Moule, well known to all evangelical Christians in our own country) helped the conference to recover its dominating point of view in a speech arguing that no church should claim precedence in this enterprise, "since this conference has seen the smile and shower of the divine blessing descending equally on churches, whose polities were widely different."

Laymen's Views.

Two significant speeches were those of representatives of the Laymen's Missionary Movement in the United States and Canada. Mr. Roweil (Toronto) and Dr. Stackhouse (Ontario). The laymen, declared these delegates, are not going to provide means for missions that are inefficient because they are sectional and disunited when the work might be much more efficiently and economically done if they worked together.

The outcome of the discussion was the appointment of a "Continuation Committee," whose business should be to carry on the work of this conference especially in enlisting all the missionary agencies of Christendom in a co-operative plan of work. What this will mean for the unity of the church at home and in non-Christian lands time will reveal. That it is a step of immense moment both for missionary effectiveness and, in its reflex influence, for Christian unity,is at once apparent.

A Masterly Address.

If to any mind the day's sessions had been a mixture of darkness and hope with respect to the unity of the people of God, the evening session was one to dispel the darkness. The two speakers were Mr. George Sherwood Eddy of India, and Professor James Denney of Glasgow. Mr. Eddy told the story of the marvelous progress toward unity in Southern India and pleaded for the church at home to put nothing in the way of the further progress of that movement. Professor Denney spoke with exceptional lucidity. His manner was strictly conversational, but fascinating. Professor Denney directed attention to the condition of the home church, and said he believed its duty was to recover consciousness of its own end and function. Something similar to what he said of his own church, the United Free Church, he believed was true of every church in Christendom. The United Free Church had about 1700 congregations, and during the last few years the average increase of membership had been about 850. Every second congregation had added one, and every other congregation had added none. The number of candidates for the ministry was much smaller than it was a good many years ago. It was hardly sufficient to keep up the staff at home, to say nothing of sparing men for abroad. It would be an excess of charity to say that the decrease in numbers had been compensated for by an improvement in quality. The truth was that for large numbers of people at home the church existed as an institution, but to a large extent it had ceased to exist as something that offered them an effective career.

Men Not Coming Forward.

Men were not coming forward as ministers and missionaries, he continued, because they were not coming forward into membership of the Christian church at all. It was no use calling for reinforcements at the front, when recruiting had stopped at home—(hear, hear)—and to a large extent, in the meantime, that was the situation with which they were confronted. Something must happen to the church at home if it was going even to look at the work that had been put before it by that conference. It must get a deeper sense that God had given them something wonderful and incomparable in his Son. A great part of the weakenss of the church rose out of a diffusion in it of a kind of Christian secularism; and another thing was that the question of other religions and their relations to the Christian religion was so difficult a question intellectually, that many people made excuses for refusing to interpose in so complicated a situation, and said they would leave it to Providence. They said they would not assert anything that was intolerant or exclusive in their own faith, and that they would take their chance and sink or swim with mankind. That feeling had tainted deeply the common mind of Christendom, and even the mind of the church itself. They needed preaching directed against these things in the home church, preaching that would make everybody feel that the difference between the Christian and the non-Christian attitude to Jesus was not a difference of more or less, or better or worse, but a difference of life or death.

The Basis of Unity.

The Christian church must recognize that their first duty was to unite. The churches could not even contemplate the work to be done as long as they stood apart. The united church was not to be attained by human efforts. The church could only be one in this, that all its members represented the same attitude to the soul of Christ. He believed that the only element in which the united church would ever be realized was the pure, unmingled element of loyalty to the Lord Jesus Christ. The basis of unity was not to be found in any number of theological propositions or in any kind of ecclesiastical constitution. Unity would be found nowhere but in the common loyalty of sinful men who called Jesus, Savior and Lord.

Supplementary Report

Great Problems Discussed

The Question of Nationality.

A question which aroused an unusual degree of interest in the conference was that of nationality. The Japanese Bishop Honda (Kyoto), declared that in the idea of nationality were involved the ideas of independence and personal responsibility. The missionary work that did not recognize the national spirit and the spirit of independence would make weak-hearted and weak-handed Christians. There were four churches in Japan that were practically independent and self-governing—the Presbyterian, the Episcopalian, the Congregational and the Methodist. All the missionaries sent from the mother churches in America were full members of the Japanese Conferences and were directly responsible to them. They received their stipends from the Conferences and had exactly the same status as the Japanese clergy. The leader of Korean native Christianity, Hon. T. H. Yun, admitting the delicacy of discussing the "foreign money," said it might be a good business principle that those who found the money should employ the agents, but it was a greater Christian principle to trust the churches with the responsibility. Rev. J. R. Chitamber (Reid Christian College, Lucknow) urged the value of well-trained native evangelists directly responsible to their own churches.

Harada's Views.

Dr. Harada, principal of the Doshisha, the native Christian College of Japan, asked were the Confessions of Faith formulated for and adopted by the western churches suitable and sufficient for the churches of the East? The fundamental principle that should ever be kept in view was that Christianity was life—the life of God in men; nothing other could be accepted as real Christianity. The life could not be translated into another life except through life, and where the life was the organization and the system of doctrine would follow; but all the organizations and the systems of doctrine were not powerful enough to produce the life. He thought they wanted faith in God, but they wanted faith also in man, in man as the living temple of God. Their systems were not necessarily a perfect and final type of Christianity, and before they could have a Confession of Faith that accorded with the national character they must get the real expression of their national spiritual experience.

Bishop Gore Alarmed.

Dr. Harada's speech had a somewhat alarming effect on Bishop Gore, who was one of the chief attractions of the conference. He desired, he said, on rising to reply to the address, to recall the conference to a consideration which they appeared to be leaving out of sight—the consideration that the more true it was that they as Westerns should be doing all they possibly could to foster the independence and indigenous character of the church in Eastern and African countries—and nobody felt this to be a privilege and a duty more than himself—the more important it was that they should be bearing constantly in mind what were those conditions which belonged not to India, or Japan, or China, or England, but to the church everywhere. He meant that if they were, as foreign missionaries, to hand over Christianity to the church of China and Japan and India with a character, then they must have done more than at the present moment they seemed inclined to do, to contribute to the definition of what the church was, the definition of its essential or really catholic features. He noticed the extreme rapidity and facility with which the church became indigenous in ancient times, but the conditions were by no means the same to-day.

What the Church Stood for.

What the church stood for was more or less markedly definite—its Creed, its constitution, its Bible, its sacraments. Those were points on which the mind of the church fastened itself. Everywhere, in the East and West, and at the time of the Reformation, there was an instinct that the church was able to assume what its essential principles were. During the last fifty years there had been an extraordinary and almost unprecedented breaking down of what they might call denominational standards. It was quite true that they should not attempt to denominationalize young churches, but at the same time they must be taking their part clearly in saying what constituted the church.

A Church of China.

Rev. W. Nelson Britton of the London Missionary Society, Shanghai, China, took the ground that the independence of the church in China must be fully and frankly recognized, and its consequences be accepted without reserve. Unfortunately, there was an idea that the missionary societies stood athwart the line of nationalist progress, and there had already been a good deal of withdrawal because of the idea that the Foreign Missions of the Western churches in China were opposed to the ideals of the Nationalists. A movement was being talked of originating with the Christian students at Tokyo of starting a Christian church of China that would carry on its work entirely apart from the foreign missionary churches. They did not want to see a Far Eastern church cutting itself off entirely from the Catholic church of the Christian world. He hoped one of the first results of that conference would be such a definite change in attitude and in practice in regard to missionary enterprise in China as would convince the Chinese of the validity of their intention to help forward and to recognize an indigenous Christian church. They were always imposing Western conditions when they invited their Oriental brethren to come in. Their denominationalism was a hindrance. It was not their business to denominationalize the churches they were endeavoring to build.

A Chinese on a Chinese Church.

Rev. Cheng Ching-yi (L. M. S., Shanghai) said that unity occupied the chief place in the hearts of the Chinese. They hoped to see in the near future a united Chinese Christian church that would annihilate all denominational distinctions. He asked Christians everywhere to try and look at this question from the Chinese point of view. Speaking generally, denominationalism had never interested the Chinese mind. They found no advantages in it, and sometimes they had suffered from it. They would have to unite if they were to build up a Chinese church. Such difficulties as were likely to be experienced would be largely due to Western ideas and not to their own. China, with all her imperfections, was a country that loved unity in the national and the family life. They held that the church of Christ was universal, overlapping the boundaries alike of denominations and nationalities. Whether a United Church of China would remain united forever was a question to which he could only answer, "I don't know"; what they had to deal with was their duty to-day, and the unknown future would settle its own affairs. He hoped the Continuation Committee which was to be proposed would consult the Chinese pastors and Christian workers before making any recommendations for co-operation in China. It was not, he declared in conclusion, amid a long-continued round of cheering, their particular churches for which they were working, but the establishment of the church of Christ in China.

A Bishop Throws Cold Water.

The discussion of unity ran largely one way. But the Bishop of Southwark asked whether they were united. Before answering the question he said he must distinguish. He was talking to persons of whom at one end was the Pope and at the other the Plymouth Brother. He said he, as an Anglican, had with that Pope and that Plymouth Brother union and disunion. He remembered the time when they all felt that the fact of their disunion was such, and had so religiously to be maintained, that they could not come to any practical union at all.

The Second Coming of Christ

BY REV. DAVID SMITH

(Professor David Smith of the Free Church College in Londonderry, Ireland, is one of the foremost scholars of the time. His book, "The Days of His Flesh," has attracted wide attention as a stimulating treatment of the life of Christ. In an English journal he writes in answer to an inquiry regarding the second coming of Christ. The question and answer follow.)

——"The Rev. —— —— of —— has been holding a mission in this town, and he has given a number of addresses on the Second Coming of Christ. He believes in two Resurrections, two Judgments, and a literal, personal, visible reign of Christ with His saints on earth for a thousand years. Those who are faithful will be rewarded by getting positions of power and authority under Christ as Chief Sovereign, and he and they will go to and fro on the earth and up and down on it without the ordinary means of traveling. Several people with whom I have talked on the subject seem to think the doctrine is not worthy of serious consideration, being only the dream of a fanatic; while others ask, What have you to say of the 300 passages of Scripture which speak of the second coming, and especially to Rev. 20." This millenarianism, which had a considerable vogue in pietistic circles a generation ago, but which, I thought had now gone the coming, and especially to Rev. 20."

This millenarianism, which had considerable vogue in pietistic circles a generation ago, but which, I thought had now gone the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. It is a stupid and prosaic perversion of Jewish apocalyptic. There was a quaint and charming Rabbinical fancy, which persisted among the primitive Christians, that the course of history would correspond to the process of creation. You find it, e. g., in the Epistle of Barnabas (15) where, according to Psalm 40:4 (cf. 2 Pet. 3:8), "a day" is taken to signify a thousand years. History will run a toilsome course of six thousand years, corresponding to the six of creative activity; and then, corresponding to the seventh day, when "God rested from his labors," there will be a thousand years of peace—the millennium. The idea occurs also at the close of St. Augustine's splendid dream of the city of God: "The first age as the first day is from Adam to the flood; the second from that to Abraham. From this, as the Evangelist Matthew determines, three ages follow to the Advent of Christ: from Abraham to David one, the second from that to the carrying away to Babylon, the third from that to the Christ-birth in the flesh—in all, five. The sixth is now in progress, not to be measured by any number of generations according to the saying: 'It is not for you to know the times which the Father hath put in his own power.' After this, as on the seventh day, God will rest." The idea appears with the luxuriant detail of oriental imagry in Rev. 20. Of course it is poetry, and it is pitiful to see how it fares in clumsy hands. There is, indeed, much in the Book of Revelation which is plain; but most of its oracles are cryptograms to which the key is now lost, and it were well to heed its warning against perverting them by reckless interpretation (22:18-19). It is very instructive that Calvin, that prince of commentators, expounded all the sacred writings save this. "I have met with some," says Richard Baxter, "so confident of their right understanding the Revelation (which Calvin durst not expound, and professed he understood it not), that they have framed part granting leave to publish: the Pope desired of their confessions or articles of faith out of it." The interpretation of the book is a task either for a poet like Christina Rosetti or for a scholar especially versed in Jewish and Christian apocalyptic. Prophecy-mongering is an unwholesome farrago of charlatanry, ignorance, and vanity, and I had a letter from Rome to Dr. Chalmers about Irving on the Prophecies, Erskine of Linlathen wrote in 1827: "There is a Romish priest here, who, in the reign of the last Pope, wrote a book on the Prophecies, in which the year 1830 is fixed as the termination of all the wrath; he carried his MS. to the regular licenser, who showed it to the Pope before that license should be given him to publish it in the year 1831." Brave old Thomas Cooper spoke the blunt truth when he said: "I think Christ would have snubbed some of these 'second coming' people if he had lived in our day. I mean the people who will have their favorite belief for breakfast, dinner and supper, and who say no minister preaches the gospel unless he proclaims the 'second coming' in every sermon." It is, to my mind, a demonstration of the divine origin of Christianity that it has survived the absurdities which have been promulgated in its name. It is a blessed promise that our Lord will one day appear in his glory and put an end to sin and sorrow; but he has told us neither the time nor the manner of his appearing, and the surest way of hastening it is that we should go on bravely and lovingly doing our appointed tasks and making the world about us a little liker heaven.

Membership in the Congregation

BY AUSTIN HUNTER

To THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY: In a recent issue of the Christian Century appeared quite an extensive article by Edward Scribner Ames explaining and setting forth the reasons for the practice of "Membership in the Congregation" plan. As Dr. Ames has practiced this plan more extensively perhaps than any other one among us and has been hearty in its advocacy for some time, it may be safe to assume that his statement of the situation covers the arguments worth while from that point of view. I have read and reread them carefully and to me they are very unsatisfying. The program set forth does not seem to me worth while. Now I am not fond of newspaper controversy. I think we have had too much of it. But I wish to present some reasons why I demur to the plan of "membership in the congregation."

First of all it appeals to me as a useless plan. It is laying undue emphasis upon formality, the very thing Dr. Ames article protests against. With the exceptionn of placing men on the official board, the results mentioned in the article are more or less attained by every congregation. That is to say, each flourishing church has several regular attendants and regular contributors and people who give their influence to the strengthening of the church who are not members. They serve practically every function mentioned by those who are formally "members of the congregation." Then why so zealous about this formal membership? Indeed we have even the immersed who often are informal members of the congregation, people who worship with us and who do what they can to help the work without formally entering into the fellowship of the church. If the religion of Jesus is "inner and free" and there "are no conditions of membership in his company except the will to do his will" and this will is not expressed in any external legalistic or formal way, then why be particular about formal membership in the congregation? Why is not informal membership sufficient?

Again, this plan makes church membership largely meaningless. It does not stand for anything really definite. Here is the combination: "There are some (members of the congregation) who have never been members of any church." That is to say they have never made any profession of Christian faith. Yet they do not "feel themselves placed in any inferior position" and "no one in the seven years of this practice has ever assumed that the difference between two kinds of membership was of any significance except to those who had a subjective feeling about it." There it is, not necessarily any profession of belief and no real recognized difference in membership. It looks as if there was no real basis of membership at all and it reduces it to a meaningless affair. In trying to get back to Jesus and away from everything external it might be well to remember that even Jesus himself said that certain ones who refused obedience to an external rite had "rejected the counsel of God." Much is said concerning Christian fruits and some elements of Christian character found in the unimmersed and there could also be added the unbelieving as well. As a matter of fact the Christian leaven has been working so long in human society that every moral life has been influenced more or less by the Christian ideal and Christian principles. Even the man who is a pronounced infidel has been reared in a Christian environment surrounded by Christian influences so that the moral course of his life has been shaped by the teachings of Jesus even though his lips may deny this source. Are we therefore on the grounds that his life bears fruits to say he is entitled to any kind of membership notwithstanding what may be his attitude toward Jesus and his revelation? Are we to be so zealous for union that we are to eliminate any real basis for membership except that a person's life is more or less influenced by the Christian ideal?

It is evident that this program is far from final. It is merely a makeshift. The obvious intention is to receive the unimmersed without offending those who have an immersionist conscience. As a plan it can only be temporary and must finally issue in one membership in which there is no distinction between immersed and unimmersed or not so much distinction of any other kind. It has evidently not appealed very strongly to the unimmersed as an attractive program if there are only thirty some members after seven years of trial. The probabilities are that a much larger number of the immersed have been kept out of the church by reason of this plan. Another of our Chicago churches that works the same plan has some fifteen members of the congregation out of a total of about two hundred members. Is it worth while to thus seek a few "members of the congregation" and prevent a much larger growth through lack of confidence on the part of our brethren who move into this great city? What Chicago needs is less experimentation and more growth of churches.

Roumania is going to try compulsory reforestry; that is, people who denude the land of trees will be taxed for young trees to take their places.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, JULY 24.

Theme for the Day.—The Fear of the Lord.

Scripture.—O fear the Lord, ye his saints; for there is no want to them that fear him. The young lions do lack, and suffer hunger, but they that seek the Lord shall not want any good things.—Psa. 34:9, 10.

And O, be sure to fear the Lord alway!
An' mind your duty, morn and night!
Lest in temptation's path ye gang astray,
Implore his counsel and assisting might;
They never sought in vain that sought the Lord aright.
—Robert Burns ("The Cotter's Saturday night.")

Prayer.—Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed by Thy name. On this holy day we lift our hearts to Thee in gratitude for all Thy tender mercies. Thou hast not left us without the daily proofs of Thy loving care. May we give to Thee the worship and the reverence which are Thy due. We would fear before Thee with holy joy, and rejoice with trembling in Thy sanctuary. May we devote this day to Thy service, and find our true happiness in the fulfilment of Thy will. We ask in Jesus' name. Amen.

MONDAY, JULY 25.

Theme for the Day.—The Joy of Living.

Scripture.—Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race.—Psa. 19.5.

Rejoice in the Lord alway; and again I say, rejoice.—Phil. 4:4.

And vague desires, like fitful blasts of balm
To one that travels quickly, made the air
Of Life delicious, and all kinds of thought,
That verged upon them, sweeter than the dream
Dreamed by a happy man, when the dark East,
Unseen, is brightening to his bridal morn.
—Tennyson ("The Gardener's Daughter.")

Prayer.—Our good Father, our true and constant Friend, at the remembrance of all Thy mercy to us we feel the depth of our ingratitude, for many times we are wholly unmindful of Thy blessing, and think of the good things of life as the proper rewards of our own effort. Make us to know how dependent we are upon Thee, O Lord, for even the least of the blessings that fall to us. Most of all, grant us the disposition and will to enjoy the blessings Thou dost send us daily. We know that it lies within us to find every day wonderful with happiness, or clouded with discontent. Bestow upon us the cheerful heart that accepts with happiness, and thankfulness the mercies of the day. Then shall we never be downcast and shadowed in spirit. And bring us at the last to the greater joys of a world without end. Amen.

TUESDAY, JULY 26.

Theme for the Day.—The Necessity of Hardship.

Scripture.—Thou therefore endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.—II. Tim. 2:3.

My whole life I have lived in pleasant thought
As if life's business were a summer mood;
As if all needful things would come unsought
To genial faith, still rich in genial good;
But how can He expect that others should Build for him, sow for him, and at his call
Love him, who for himself will take no heed at all?
—William Wordsworth ("Resolution and Independence.")

Prayer.—Our Father in heaven, kind and loving art Thou to all who wait upon Thee. We have found Thee ever mindful of our needs, and indulgent toward our requests. Yet we know that our prayers are too often for the smooth and easy things of life, when we really need the discipline of hardship for the development of our character and courage. May we not forget the gracious example of our Lord, who was made perfect through suffering. And may we comfort ourselves in every way of trouble with the joy of Thy companionship, and the grace of patient conquest of evil in the strength that is from above. We ask this in the name of Christ. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 27.

Theme for the Day.—The Inspiration of Love.

Scripture.—And Jacob served seven years for Rachel, and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her.—Gen. 29:20.

Ah, how skilful grows the hand
That obeyeth Love's command!
It is the heart, and not the brain,
That to the highest doth attain,
And he who followeth Love's behest
Far excelleth all the rest.
—Henry W. Longfellow ("The Building of the Ship.")

Prayer.—Righteous Father, Thou hast set the solitary in families, and provided for the sons of men those associations which love makes holy, and time brings to richer fulness. We thank Thee for the domestic love which has made our homes possible. Very wonderful seems the way in which Thou hast led us to these relations which have sanctified our lives. Through happiness and sorrow the love that enriches our days has grown. Continue Thy blessing upon it, we beseech Thee, and may it grow fuller and truer as the day lengthens to its close. We ask in Jesus' name. Amen.

THURSDAY, JULY 28.

Theme for the Day.—The Best Things are Free.

Scripture.—Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labor for that which satisfieth not? Hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness.—Isa. 55:2.

The wages of sin is death; but the free gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.—Rom. 6:23.

For a cap and bells our lives we pay,
Bubbles we buy with a whole soul's tasking,
'Tis heaven alone that is given away,
'Tis only God may be had for the asking.
—James Russell Lowell ("The Vision of Sir Launfal.")

Prayer.—Into Thy hands we commit ourselves afresh, Thou Father of mercies. We thank Thee for the new day, and its opportunities for work, for worship and for happiness. Thou art teaching us in the passing of the days that the things Thou givest us are the best. We waste too much of our time in striving after things that can neither satisfy nor endure. Help us to make more of Thy free gifts of health, happiness, friendship, service, and the companionship of God. No day can be lost that is filled with these good things, and they all may be had for the taking. Accept our praise, and care for our souls, we pray in the name of the Christ. Amen.

JULY, JULY 29.

Theme for the Day.—God's Witness to all Men.

Scripture.—In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land. Whom the Lord of hosts shall bless saying, Blessed be Egypt my people, and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel mine inheritance.—Isa. 19:24, 25.

God sends his teachers unto every age,
To every clime, and every race of men,
With revelations fitted to their growth
And shape of mind, nor gives the realm of Truth
Into the selfish rule of one sole race;
Therefore each form of worship that hath swayed
The life of man, and given it to grasp
The master-key of knowledge, reverence,
Enfolds some germs of goodness and of right.
—J. R. Lowell ("Rhoecus.")

Prayer.—Our Father, we learn of Thee daily through Thy tender care for our needs. But still more we learn of the richness of Thy nature and the wonder of Thy love through the story of the past. Thou hast been good to all, and Thy tender mercies have been over all Thy works. We love only a few people, and find it difficult to think that God loves all men. Even those who knew Thee best in ancient days could not understand Thy love for all. It is only in the message of Jesus that we fully understand the amazing breadth of Thy plans for mankind. May we share something of Thy all-embracing interest in humanity. May we understand that Thou hast never left any people wholly without the truth. And so may we attempt to carry out that same world-wide purpose of Thine, through the gospel of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

SATURDAY, JULY 30.

Theme for the Day.—Martyrs of the Faith.

Scripture.—And others had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, yea moreover of bonds and imprisonments. They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword; they wandered about in sheepskins, in goatskins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented, of whom the world was not worthy.—Heb. 11:36-38.

One in fire, and two in field,
Their belief with blood have seal'd.
Dying as their father died,
For the God their foes denied:
Three were in a dungeon cast,
Of whom this wreck is left the last.
—Lord Byron ("The Prisoner of Chillon.")

Prayer.—O Thou great Author of Life and Revealer of Truth, we come to understand how much life and truth are worth by the knowledge of what they have cost. Thou hast given us Thyself that we may be born of the heavenly race and brought up as sons of God. And Thou hast given us great examples of noble living and cruel dying that the truth might be kept free for our possession. Our Father, help us to be worthy, in some manner at least, of all that has been done in our behalf. May those true spirits that watch the progress of our lives from the high seats of heaven feel that we are making some true use of the service they wrought out for us. And may we too be counted worthy to suffer for the sake of Christ. In whose name we ever pray. Amen.

A SERIAL STORY

Donald Graeme

Copyright, 1910, by J. C. Kilner

By M. A. FULTON

CHAPTER XI.

Under the Stars.

It was the last evening of Elsie's stay at Brigend. How the two weeks had sped so quickly for her she was at a loss to know. Little did she guess of how long and dreary those same days and nights had been to the friends who had made the time so pleasant for her. What a blessing it is to human kind that eyes were not made to read the key board of the brain. How good is it that the thoughts which flash through that wonderful instrument make for us all inaudible music whether of joy or sorrow. Utterance is but the tuning of the instrument, the full glory of the true music lies all within. So also with the discordant brain—the uttered is always less than the unuttered discord.

Had Elsie Wallace been asked on that last day of her visit to Jeanie, to name a home to which she believed care was a stranger, she would have had no hesitation in saying, "Hopefield," as the Graeme's called their place. Was not Mrs. Graeme one of the sweetest of house mistresses? Always cheerful, hopeful, contented. Mr. Graeme was a fine specimen of the successful merchant—kind, courteous, affable. Jeanie was —Jeanie, she needed to be no more. And Donald, after the first few shy days, during which she fancied he wished to shun her, had he not grown frank and friendly, doing everything he could to make her visit a pleasant one?

Elsie was dreaming in the drawing-room, waiting for Donald, who had asked her to go for a long walk with him, on this her last evening at Brigend. It was Thursday evening, the organ and choir practice was over, followed by an early cup of tea, and the young people were now free to do as they pleased. Archie Monteith had now become one of the most regular in attendance at the choir practice. The motor car was a great excuse for rushing into Brigend at any time, but he liked best to come on the half holiday when everyone was free. More than once since Elsie came, Archie had used every argument he could bring to bear on Jeanie to go with him, even for a short run on the motor, but she had so far refused. This evening Elsie joined most heartily with him in pleading with Jeanie to go if only for a few miles. At last she had yielded, and Archie after promising faithfully to her father and mother, that he would drive most moderately had borne her off in triumph. He chose the Motherwell road, not because it was the most interesting merely, but because it led them past the manse.

Elsie had been waiting fully fifteen minutes when Donald came in, flushed and laughing. There is an elasticity in the spirit of youth that will be the envy of age, while time lasts! It would have been as impossible for Donald to keep glum because a dark shadow had fallen on him, as it would be for the sun to stop shining, because of his black spots.

"Have I kept you long waiting, Elsie?"

"Not at all. I've had a most delightful reverie. Waiting times are not all lost."

"I met a young fellow just now who would not agree with you—at least in his present mood."

"Tell me about him—you seem amused."

"He's a young fellow in the bank here. The fun of it is, he never used to look near our house, though he and I were always on friendly terms. But since Jeanie came, he's been making no end of excuses for calling."

"I don't wonder at it," she laughed merrily, "if I were in his place I would do the same."

"Hadn't we better be going? The days are growing short."

"And few," she said dolefully.

"Which way shall we go?"

"Along the bonny banks of Clyde. That was the first walk you took me, Donald. I think it the loveliest of all."

"I think so too, Elsie. The river is an old friend of mine."

"And a friend to a great many other people, too. But now tell me why your young friend does not like waiting times."

"He's a great one for photography. During his summer holidays he took no end of snapshots. He had promised Jeanie to come and show them to her as soon as he had got them developed and finished up. He was coming down Motherwell road just as the motor started. He came straight over to me as I watched them off.

"I say Graeme," said he, "who is that snob who shows off his motor so often in these parts?"

"Oh," said I, "that's a cousin of ours.'

"I hope he'll be content to remain a cousin."

"Why should he not?" said I, just to draw the joshing on.

"The motor car is the worst feature of the case," he replied with a serio-comic air.

"What do you mean?"

"If you weren't her brother you would know without asking. Do you not know that half the young fellows of Brigend are over head and ears in love with Miss Graeme? See how the choir practice is attended now? My word, how she plays the organ. It's no wonder that James Douglas and myself, ay, and more that I could name, would like to be smashing up that motor car into match wood."

"What has the poor motor car to do with it?"

"Ah, Graeme, it's easy to see that you have not yet begun to dream of ways and means. What right have I to dream of running a race with a chap in a motor car?"

"Everyone cannot be so lucky as to possess a motor car, you know, Gordon."

"Too well I know it," he said shaking his head solemnly. " but this much I console myself with. The thought comes to me every time I see that motor, 'The devil's aye guid to his ain.'"

Elsie laughed merrily, but declared in the same breath that young Gordon was only a goose. Also that even a motor car would not help him much so far as Jeanie was concerned.

"He's what you call a harum-scarum, Elsie. He doesn't care what he says, but at the same time he is so good-natured that one cannot be offended, no matter how he talks."

"One always meets people like that, no matter where we go. Right good for a laugh, too."

"Great fun sometimes. I wanted him to come in tonight with his photos. But he refused. He says he'll wait till the snow comes. No motor men can be dashing in then to spoil the enjoyment."

"We'll have a fine laugh at Jeanie about him, Donald. She takes a jest so well."

"Splendidly. Yes, it will be great fun."

They wandered on and on along the bank of the river, its sound in their ears, its eagerness in their hearts, for the river keeps always young. At a turn in the path they came face to face with Mr. Sinclair. He was walking slowly, his hands clasped behind his back, like an old man. His face lit up with that radiance peculiar to most good men, as his eyes rested on Elsie, whom he greeted warmly. There was a hankering look in his eyes, as he shook hands with Donald. Poor Donald; he felt it a look of accusation, and he shrank into himself like the veriest criminal.

"What lovely weather you are getting, Miss Elsie. You are certainly fortunate. But you have not kept your promise—you were to help me gather my apples, you know."

"Jeanie and I are big girls now, you must remember, Mr. Sinclair. So we were waiting for a proper invitation."

"What a pity I have been such a thoughtless creature. Well, better late than never. Can you both come tomorrow afternoon? I think Donald can come, too?"

"How provoking, Mr. Sinclair. I must return home tomorrow morning."

"Could you not stay one other day, Miss Wallace?" He was perfectly serious, she saw it in his eyes, and she was sorry for him.

"I would wait another day if possible, but the friend who is staying with mother in my absence must leave tomorrow afternoon, so I must go. Good-bye, Mr. Sinclair. I cannot tell you how much I have enjoyed my visit to Brigend. It seems like a glimpse of paradise here, after the noise and smoke and dirt laden air of Glasgow."

"We have much to be thankful for in Brigend, Miss Elsie. But we must remember that each one of us must look for our paradise within, not without ourselves. What is paradise to one may be torment to another."

"Good-bye," she said gravely. She felt subdued by his seriousness.

"Good-bye, Miss Elsie. I am sorry I have seen so little of you. But I have been unusually busy since you came. I hope you won't be a stranger in Brigend."

"I hope not myself."

"Donald, take Miss Elsie on around by the Brown Knoll. I have just been there. It is still well worth seeing. There are delightful bits of color yet lingering on the brae face."

Donald felt more distressed in Mr. Sinclair's presence than even in his father's. He had not spoken a word during the brief interview. Mr. Sinclair noticed the young man's embarrassment with a sore feeling in his own heart. He had hoped for so much from young Donald Graeme during the past few months especially. Now what was left to this unhappy youth? A dishonored name. How bitter the thought! Even his very prayers seemed flung back in his face, unanswered. Donald could almost read the good man's thoughts in the pathetic expression of his eyes as they exchanged parting salutations. Thus it was that the thoughtless mood of a few minutes before vanished as sunbeams under a thunder cloud and he moved on beside Elsie, for the life of him, not able to utter a word till she spoke first—

"Is Mr. Sinclair a man of moods, Donald? You remember how gay he was that day I first saw him, when Jeanie and I were going to Motherwell? Today he seems rather gloomy."

"Everyone has something to be gloomy about betimes, don't you think? Mr. Sinclair has a large parish, Elsie, and he knows his people's sorrows as well as their joys. If he looks sad, as I think he does too, it is because some one he thought highly of perhaps, has disappointed him. Wouldn't that make any one sad?"

"It must be simply awful. Then he has no one with whom to talk over things in the evenings. Think of going home to that dull manse now, without a bright face to welcome him. If he had a mother or sister it would be different."

"I don't know. He reads a great deal, and he loves gardening too. For the greater part of this autumn I have been with him once or twice a week. I think he is one of the most cheerful men I ever met."

"I am afraid I put a stop to your pleasant manse evenings when I came, Donald."

"Believe me, your presence had nothing to do with my altered relations towards Mr. Sinclair."

"Are they altered?" she inquired in surprise.

"I fear so. But here we are at the Brown Knoll. Does it not indeed look lovely in the light of the setting sun?"

"Beautiful! How well it is named. Browns of every shade imaginable—and yellows too, and purples and grays. Oh, Donald, is there any other land to be compared with Scotland?"

"I begin to think not. Is it always the same way, I wonder? Are the best things never sufficiently prized till one is about to lose them?"

"What are you going to lose, Donald?" She tried to speak lightly, but failed.

"Friends and home and country,' he replied in a low voice, which trembled with emotion.

"Are you serious, Donald?"

"Quite. I shall be going to Canada very soon."

"Going to Canada? What need have you to go to Canada? Will you father and mother and Jeanie like it?"

"I am not so important, but they will all do nicely without me—except mother."

"Look at the Brown Knoll, Donald, its beauty has all faded with the sunset. That is what 'Hopefield' will be without you—to your mother most, but to all of"—she was going to say "us," but she paused and said "them."

"I have wanted to go to the far West for a long time. Now that I am to go, it does not seem so good as I used to think. I believe it is mother's disappointment that hurts most."

"But why need you go, Donald? Are you not more needed at home than anywhere else? I know that Canada offers great opportunities to young men of pluck and enterprise, who, having nothing but brains and sinews, find no suitable field of labor at home. It is a pity when young men of strong physique and high courage are chained in warehouses and offices at starvation wages, when they might be helping to build up the great empire that is to be, away out out in British America. But Donald, I think it is dreadfully sad to see the very props of our national life drifting away to other lands. Scotland needs her best sons at home." He looked at her with glistening eyes.

"Do you call me one of Scotland's best sons, Elsie?"

"I do, Donald."

"If you knew the whole truth about me you would scorn me like the rest—all but mother."

"You may have done a foolish thing, Donald, but you never have been guilty of deliberate falsehood."

"How do you know?"

"I feel it." They had turned homewards and the first stars were beginning to peer at them through the clear frosty air. He was touched by her trustful words and almost without thinking of what he did, he told her all the truth. All his dealings with John M'Ketridge. His appeal to Jeanie for the money to pay his gambling debts. He hid nothing. He did not spare himself. He had acted the fool and he knew it. He had sipped wine, too, in John M'Ketridge's back parlor. Ay, and sometimes, too, he had fancied it was very strong wine, which made him reckless. He saw it all now, though he had never told a lie, he had lived one during that period of wild excitement, which seemed to him now like a horrible nightmare. Others might forgive him for it all some day. He would never forgive himself. She had listened to every word in perfect silence. Twilight had deepened into night. The screen of light which the sun daily throws over our hemisphere was lifted, and the fringes of the universe, tasseled with stars, hung over them. He could not see her face but he knew that her eyes were earthly stars—guiding ones too, for him in his hour of need. When he had finished his confession he waited a moment expecting her to speak. But she still kept silent, till he inquired in low, earnest tones:

"Do you think me one of Scotland's best sons now, Elsie?"

"One of her best, Donald, and more—one of her strongest." The exultant ring in her voice startled him.

"Are you mocking me, Elsie?"

"No, Donald, no. My heart is glad for you. This is how I see it all. The man who got entangled in the gambling net, and who had strength to break away from its fatal fascination is not a weakling, but a strong man. The man who confesses his folly and is sorry for it, striving to live it down is a good man. There are some good men, I suppose, who never fall into vice. We honor them. There are other good men who fall and rise again. We call them heroes."

"Elsie, Elsie, you make me thoroughly ashamed of myself, yet overjoyed in my very soul. So it is possible that you can really think well of me after what I have told you."

"If you were not a brave man, you would not be able to tell me all as you have done. Your dead self is past Donald. Let your living self prove for all time to come what a true man you can be."

"It may be, Elsie, that before long I shall be far away from the friends and home and country that I never loved so well as I do now, but remember that, go where I may, your words to me tonight under these stars, will help to make me strong and true."

"I am glad, Donald. But why should you leave home?"

"For another reason that I am about to tell you of. I do not believe in half confidences, Elsie. I have told you truly of my folly. Now I am going to tell you of my misfortune. And before I tell you this sequel to my story, as I may call it, I wish simply to say that the crime of which I am suspected, I was never guilty of. The whole thing is a mystery to me. Yet it threatens to spoil my life. If this cloud be not lifted from me, Elsie, I shall be a homeless wanderer on the face of the earth till my dying day.

"Whatever it is, it will be lifted, some day, Donald." They had reached the bend in the road near Hopefield before he had finished telling her the story of the forged cheque. They paused beside the privet hedge awhile till he had told her all. This time he did not wait for her to speak, but at once inquired earnestly:

"Have you faith enough in me to believe that I am telling you the truth, when I say once again, I am not guilty of this fraud?"

"My faith in you is not shaken one iota, Donald. The truth will come out some day. You will be cleared."

"God bless you, Elsie. Till then we can wait."

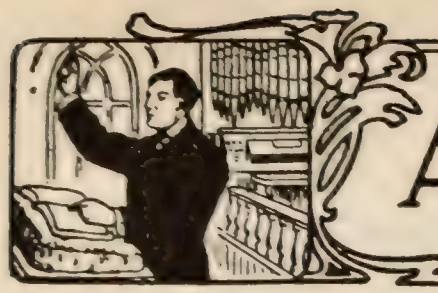
The Minister's Task

BY J. M. ARTMAN



Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, in a series of lectures at the University of Chicago last week, set a new standard for the pulpit of our country. While one lecture only dealt with the specific topic, "The New Position of the Pulpit in American Society," his other lectures, viz., "Oliver Cormwell and the Rise of the Five Liberties," "Ruskin's Message in Reform to the Nineteenth Century," and "America of Today and Tomorrow," furnished living examples of the ideal for the pulpit of today. The question of the place and power of the pulpit has been debated so much and so often maligned as well as undervalued that it was encouraging to hear this great lover of men and master of pulpit eloquence set forth its function in such clear terms. While we can not give the beautiful language of the speaker nor transmit the inspiration of his presence we want to give at least something of his message.

What is "The New Position of the Pulpit in American Society?" In the first place Dr. Hillis would have us remember, as Daniel Webster pointed out in the Gerard College case, that in the eighteen hundred years of Christendom every time civilization poured into life it was through the pulpit. It was through Moses and the prophets that the Hebrew world received the uplift of Jehovah; Dante and Savonarola were the teachers of Italy; through Luther and his colleagues Mediaeval Europe leaped into a new era of civilization; John Knox was the channel for the new life-blood of England; John Calvin's teaching and the new Switzerland are almost identical; the opening of Africa is linked with the preacher of righteousness, David Livingstone; the uplift of India brings the name of Carey while Judson is known as the Father of Burma; and the name of John Morrison signifies the opening and development of China.

Why is it that these men stand first among the promoters of civilization? "It is because the moral teacher is the builder of states"; it is he who puts stability and power into civilization; it is the moral teacher who seeks to develop the soul. It is the "soul-life" that puts meaning into our institutions. Without the soul our institutions and even the state itself are meaningless and would soon decay. Our Christian Sunday, a day set apart for worship, for the finding of one's self, for the development of the soul is proof of the necessity of the serious note. We can't do without the soul. Should the time ever come when wealth, commercial life, and practical things take away Sunday, the soul's day, Daniel Webster says we, as a nation, would not last a century. The soul must be nourished and fed. Sunday is the soul's "great library day," "the soul's gallery day," the day when the imagination is given a chance to develope and bring up the serious side of our natures. The moral teacher has ever been the conserver of these deeper interests. The pulpit has always been the friend of the soul, defending it from the encroachment of interests good in themselves but which are meaningless and empty without the soul.

The work of the Christian ministry, is therefore, that of "strengthening the serious

AT THE CHURCH

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Unmerciful Debtor*

There is no member of the group of disciples who so much interests us as Peter. He was not the most important of the followers of Jesus, in spite of the earnest efforts of the Roman Catholic Church to make him such. He was neither so reflective as John, so bold as James or so intellectual as Paul. But the human elements in his character make him constantly interesting to us. He seems like an undeveloped, impulsive youth, wavering between boldness and timidity, and ceaselessly asking questions, after the manner of a child.

It is this last feature that claims mention in this study. In the classic biography of Dr. Johnson by Boswell nothing is more engaging than the frequent and seemingly trifling questions asked by the younger man for no other apparent purpose than to get the philosopher and sage to talk. It seemed to make no difference what the theme, or what should be said. Everything the Doctor might say was deemed worthy of record in the immortal biography, to whose preparation Boswell devoted his life.

The Questioner.

Were Peter's questions, which seem almost as numerous, and at times as trivial, intended to draw out the Master on the great themes of life, or were they merely the chance inquiries of a restless and impulsive spirit, anxious to be busy at something, and not particular what the occupation? A study of the questions Peter asked of Jesus throws no little light on the character of this volitile, devoted, talkative, unreckoning Galilean.

Probably not a few of the question brought to Jesus were the result of conversations among the disciples themselves. We catch echoes of their talk in the information which they sought from Jesus. How long was it to be before the kingdom, of which they were always dreaming, would be set up? Who were to be the leading officials in that new government arrangement? What were the rewards of their service to be? Were there few or many who should participate with them in the joys of the new kingdom? Such were some of the themes discussed in the circle of the twelve, and when there seemed no solution to the problem, it was taken to the Master. What disclosures could be found in the unwritten history of those conversations had we but the means of coming upon it!

On this occasion we seem to have an echo of some animated discussion suggested by Jesus' public instructions regarding forgiveness. To him the righting of past wrongs was no mere formal adjustment of old scores. It was a whole-hearted effort to restore completely the lost relationship of friendship and good will. Jesus would have men forgive as God forgives, by loving the sinful back to goodness and friendship. So Joseph forgave his brothers; not by any cold and formal erasure of the past, but by such an overflowing of generous affection as left them breathless with awe, and changed them from gloomy, suspicious and perverse men, to happy, interested helpers in the common purpose of the clan.

The Nature of Forgiveness.

Too much of our forgiveness is a sort of "let-bygones-be-bygones," which only wipes out the score without restoring the lost relation. "I forgive you," says many a man, "but I shall not be caught a second time." Even the sacred name of Christian is not always free from the taint of grudging forgiveness. In Ivanhoe one of the characters says, "I forgive you, as a Christian," and Wampa, the jester, who stands by, mutters, "Which means that he does not forgive her at all."

And so the Disciples could not quite understand Jesus' ample measure of forgiveness. And Peter, anxious to put the matter to the test, came to the Master in his quick, eager way, and said to him, "Lord, how often ought one to forgive injurious conduct? Some of us think from what you have said that one must go as far as seven times. What do you say?" What then must have been his astonishment and dismay when Jesus replied, "Not seven times, but seventy times seven." The disciples had frequent occasion to cry out to Jesus, "Lord, increase our faith." Perhaps at no time more than this. The Master had practically told them that there must be no limit to the forgiving spirit. His use of numbers was only figurative. Seven, the sacred number, had seemed to Peter the outermost bound of the good will. But Jesus put the number so far away that it could be reached only at infinity. It is this wonderful overplussage of our Savior's ideal that makes Christianity the marvel and the inspiration of the world.

The Generous King.

In order to make more impressive this truth, Jesus told one of his stories drawn from the life of the age. A king had various dealings with his officers. When he settled with them one owed his ten thousand talents. This was almost an incalculable amount. The talent was a heavy weight, variable at different times, but used to compute vast sums, like the tribute of nations. It is not even said whether the amount was in silver or gold, though that would have made an immense difference. The debt was beyond measure, and the debtor was hopeless. Such a delinquency left no recourse, and the only method for a business life and exacting creditor was to levy on the few assets in sight, the man himself and his family. As slaves they had a value that would go a little way toward paying the debt. In utter despair the unfortunate man threw himself at the feet of his lord. He had nothing, but would gladly spend his life attempting to make good the loss.

The Master listened and granted his petition, not because the man could possibly pay the debt, but because his own generous heart warmed at the sight of another dire distress. He did not even hold him to the life-service offered, but freely forgave him the entire sum. The entire group of courtiers, stewards and merchants, was amazed and delighted at the unbounded generosity of the ruler. It was the mark of a great man, and they were proud of him and even felt a kindly feeling for the man who had often rescued from his despair.

The Great Forgiveness.

Of course the meaning of the parable is plain. It is God who is the real creditor of man's life. The gifts of his bestowal have been incalculable and not a day passes that does not deepen the debt. Only to God can one owe so much. The greatest loan or debt one could contract with a fellow man would be but inconsiderable in comparison. And from one who has received such favors as the forgiveness of a huge and unpayable debt, only the most modest and grateful conduct should be expected. That forgiven steward should have worked softly all his days. In the presence of his fellow servants he could only be grateful and kind, in view of his release and their sympathy. In the presence of his Lord, his rightful attitude was surely that of happy and adoring appreciation.

Yet see! Such is the perversity of spoiled human nature that all this vastly impressive transaction is soon forgotten, and on the head of an unhappy fellow servant, who owed him but a trifle, the weight of his wrath falls. In comparison with his own huge debt the hundred shilling of his own debtor were as nothing. Yet he went to him and brutally demanded the money. And even when the poor man assured him that he would soon be able to pay it all, he was still merciless and had him thrust in the debtor's prison till the account should be squared.

This unthinkable conduct could have but one sequel The Master was shocked at the callous hardness of the man after all the mercy shown him. The entire group of clients about the king detested the vile spirit shown in the steward's conduct. The former generous judgment was reversed. The fate from which the kindness of his master had delivered him, now fell upon his head. And now no one pitied him, for his fate was well deserved.

So did Jesus enforce the lesson of forgiveness. There is no man who is not God's debtor to a limitless degree. How then dare he harbor a grudge against any other man? Let him beware, for "with what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again."

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES

Topic July 31: My Most Interesting Missionary Item. Psa. 44:1-4; Acts 28:27-29.

So many things are happening now in the realm of missionary activity that we scarcely know which to call the most interesting. There is the constant stream of good news coming from all the missionaries of victories, yea, and of conquests in heathen lands. The open doors of every land are a constant spur and inspiration to us. The army of young men and women the brightest and best of all America who are more than willing to go if only they can be sent is a constant revelation of the transforming power of Christian love. Then only two months ago Christian men gathered into the auditorium in Chicago five thousand strong, in order that they

Church Life

—Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Morrison are expected to return to Chicago from their trip abroad early in August.

—Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Willett and family are spending their vacation at Pentwater, Mich., whither Dr. Willett goes for brief periods of retreat between many engagements.

—The article by E. S. Ames on "membership in the congregation" has called forth a number of replies, one of which we give our readers this week. The subject is worthy of careful consideration by the entire body of the Disciples.

—The letter from Edinburgh, which came just too late for publication last week, appears this week. It voices the great conference's attitude toward Christian unity. It is a refreshing breath to those who have long had the prayer for union on their lips.

—The first week in August we shall publish a special Religious Education Number of the Christian Century. No people should be more vitally concerned by the questions being raised in the attempt to bring the educational work of the church to a scientific basis than are the Disciples of Christ, who have all these years plead for a renewed study of the Bible.

The Northern California convention is in session at Santa Cruz.

The Nebraska state convention meets at Bethany, July 24-31.

Southern California convention meets at Long Beach, July 27 to August 7.

Charles E. McVey will sing in a meeting at Clay Center, Neb., in November.

The church at Vicaville, Calif., has engaged H. O. Breeden for a meeting to be held next fall. Frank E. Boren is pastor.

L. J. Mercer changes his address from Springfield, Ohio, to 48 Prospect street, Alliance, Ohio.

The University Church, Los Angeles, Calif., is making a strenuous effort to make a decided reduction in their large indebtedness.

S. Elwood Fisher is encouraged by frequent additions in the regular services of the church at Dixon, Ill., where he began work May 1.

The evening of July 8, F. W. Durham was installed as pastor of the Andrews Christian church, ————, Ind. His former work was at Markle.

North Park Church, Indianapolis, is holding joint Sunday vening services with the Grace Presbyterian Church, and the Capital Avenue M. E. Church during the summer.

Wallace Tharp, First Church, Pittsburg, has just returned from a trip to the Holy Land. Sunday, July 3, he presented each member of his congregation with a Galilean souvenir.

How can the editor know who wrote the following card? "We begin at Elk City, Okla., July 19. Have open date for August and September. Write us at home. Okmulgee, Okla. ————."

The Brotherhood of the Howett Street Church, Peoria, Ill., recently secured Prof. Packard of Bradley Polytechnic Institute to lecture on Sexual Hygiene. Effort was made to secure the attendance of a large number of boys.

The parish paper of the church at Urichsville, Ohio, brings the news that Charles E. Geis, minister of the Squirrel Hill Church, Pittsburg, was united in marriage to Miss Belle Roper, of Willoughby, Ohio, July 1. The Christian Century extends congratulations.

J. W. Underwood has resigned at Ashtabula, Ohio, accepting a call to the Belmar Church, Pittsburg, Pa.

W. C. Crerie resigns as pastor of Hill Christian Church, Pittsburg, to become assistant pastor of the First Church of the same city.

Speaking of the new building being erected by the First Church, Oakland, Calif., the Tribune of that city calls it one of the most pleasing church buildings ever erected in northern California. Thomas A. Boyer is pastor of the church.

The Christian Endeavor Society of the Englewood Church, Chicago, arranged an informal reception in honor of Pastor Kindred and his wife for the eleventh of July. A. P. Finley supplied the pulpit of this church the morning of July 3.

The Evanston church building has advanced to where the congregation is now able to meet in the basement, which they will use until the day of the dedication of the new church, which has been set for the third Sunday in September.

The church at Muncie, Ind., W. H. Allen, pastor, is determined to remove some of the usual excuses for not attending church in the summer by ordering electric fans placed in the church, and the pastor has invited the men to remove their coats and the women their hats.

The church at Pomona, Calif., observed children's day June 19 with great success. There were 1200 present and the offering of the day was $350, bringing the total offering of the church to foreign missions to $1,000.

The Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, N. Y., B. S. Ferrall, pastor, holds a regular quarterly business meeting of the entire church when reports of the progress of the work in all its departments are presented and current business transacted.

A. B. Jones, the veteran preacher and friend and stay of the pastors at Liberty, Mo., is spending the summer in the mountains of Colorado and he speaks in highest praise of the climate and scenery, but the visit has been somewhat clouded by a temporary illness of Mrs. Jones.

The First and Central churches, Joplin, Mo., are seeking to bring about a union of the two congregations. The official boards have in a joint meeting indorsed the proposition. F. F. Walters, pastor First church, and J. M. Miller, pastor of Central, exchanged pulpits July 10.

George E. Prewitt of Commerce, Texas, has been called to the pastorate of the church at Shawnee, Oklahoma, succeeding W. A. Curtis who died within a few weeks after entering upon the work, laid down by F. L. VanVoorhis, now Wisconsin's state secretary.

A Gary, Ind., paper publishes a letter from Nelson H. Trimble, pastor of the Christian Church, addressed to the mayor of the city asking him in the name of the self-respecting people of the community to prohibit the exhibition of the pictures of the recent prize fight.

The plans of W. A. Harp for the next year are not fully settled. Brother Harp, it will be remembered, supplied for the Lenox Avenue Church, New York, while they were without a regular preacher. Mrs. Harp has recently returned from Ohio.

The annual picnic of the Higginsville Christian church was held July 10, a basket day picnic in the country, to which all were invited. The people went to the grounds in large wagons, ate dinner together, engaged in the various athletic and eating contests, returning late in the evening. H. W. Hunter is the pastor.

A. Lyle De Jarnette, for the past three years pastor of the church at Santa Cruz, Calif., has just resigned, and will close his work in that field the first of October. His plans for the future are not announced. It may be remembered that Mr. De Jarnette recently contributed a delightful article to the Christian Century on the new theology.

The new pipe organ of the church at Colorado Springs was installed July 10. There were unusually good audiences both morning and evening. At the morning service there was raised $2,250, thus making good the conditions of a gift of $1,250 from Andrew Carnegie. The church has a fine choir of thirty voices under the direction of Dr. Chas. G. Woolsey. George B. Stewart is pastor.

John L. Tyner, who has been preaching during the past year for the Columbia Place Church of Indianapolis, Ind., was ordained as a minister of the Word July 11. Austin Hunter of Chicago, preached the ordination sermon. A reception was tendered Mr. Hunter by members of the North Park Church, where he ministered for seven years.

Mr. and Mrs. William Bayard Craig, of the Lenox Avenue Church, New York, left recently for Rochester by way of Montreal and the St. Lawrence. From Rochester they came to Decatur, Ill., to visit their daughter, Mrs. O. W. Lawrence; from there they go to their summer home at Grand Lake, Colo. Brother Craig stopped off at St. Louis and preached a helpful sermon at Union Avenue.

The final service of the congregation in the Third Church, Indianapolis, was held July 10. The property was surrendered to the purchasers, the St. Paul's German Evangelical Church, the following day. For fifty years this congregation had worshipped at the corner of Ashland avenue and Thirteenth street. Harry G. Hill is pastor and is leading his congregation in the building of a beautiful house of worship. Meanwhile they will worship in the Armory.

The Bethany Assembly opens this year July 24, and closes August 15. The churches of Morgan County hold a basket meeting on the opening day, and it is expected to be one of the great days of the Assembly. C. W. Cauble, acting president of the Assembly, is pastor of the Christian church at Martinsville, county seat of Morgan County, and is actively engaged for the day. It is expected that the churches of the county will be present en masse. No admission fee is charged for this day.

The first week is miscellaneous in the character of the meetings, including Old Soldier's Day, Prohibition Day, and Children's Day, or Morgan County Sunday-school Union Day. Second Lord's Day is Memorial Day. Dr. W. T. Moore will be the principal speaker. The second week is Bible-school week, in charge of Garry L. Cook, state Bible-school superintendent of Indiana. Third week will be C. W. B. M. week in School of Missions and stote convention.

Earle M. Todd is preaching a series of sermons during July on "The Masseges of George Frederick Watts, Artist and Teacher." July 10, Mr. Todd's subject was, "The New Era in Religion," and the sermon was illustrated by Watts' picture, "Faith." Other sermons are: "The Strength of the Pure Heart," illustrated by Watts' picture, "Sir Galahad." "The Things That Are Worth While," illustrated by Watts' picture, "Sic Transit." "The Benevolence of Death," illustrated by Watts' are informed that this church has planned for an evangelistic meeting to be held late in the autumn.

J. C. Lappin, after four years' service at Armington, Ill., has resigned and will go to Oklahoma.

the Christian churches of Colorado has changed his address from 153 South Grant St., to 223 Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Denver.

The First Church, Covington, Ky., has not yet secured a successor to Milo Atkinson. E. W. Thornton supplied the pulpit July 10.

Ralph V. Callaway, a graduate of Drake Universitl, with several years of successful experience as pastor has resigned at Atlanta, Ill., and will close his work August 1.

Arthur E. Cobb has resigned as pastor at Marshall, Michigan, where he has been nearly two years, bringing the congregation from a scattered band of discouraged people to an enlarged membership with hope and courage.

According to statistics of attendance at the University of Chicago for the year ending in June, 1910, which have just become available, an increase is shown over that for the preceding year, the actual figure being 6,007 students for the year 1909-10, as against 5,659 for the year 1908-9.

Edward A. Henry, student in the University of Chicago, librarian of the Divinity School, suplies the church at Batavia, where his work meets with the greatest encouragement. There have been two baptisms recently, one of them one of the best young men in the city.

Alva W. Taylor, until recently pastor of the Irving Park Church, Chicago, professor elect to the chair of Sociology and Missions in the Bible College, Columbia, Mo., editor of "Social Survey" in the Christian Century, has returned from the Edinburgh Conference and will spend the latter part of the summer studying in the University of Chicago.

The Merchant's Association of Topeka, Kansas held a recent meeting in which they subscribed $1,000 for starting a fund for the coming national convention of the Disciples. This is the largest amount the asscoaition has ever given to a single convention to be held in their city.

"Our Responsibility to Government" was the subject of the sermon by H. H. Harmon, pastor of the First Church, Lincoln, Neb., July 3. Such a theme suggests something besides fourth of July oratory as usually manifest. Helpful reading on such a subject is afforded by "Hindrances to Good Citizenship," by Hon. James Bryce, which will soon be reviewed in the columns of this paper.

The Chautuaqua is doing a great deal of advertising for Eureka College and the college people are doing all they can to encourage it. The sessions are held in the large tabernacle erected several years ago for the accomodation of the college and the Illinois Christian Missionary Society. This gives the people attending Chautauqua an opportunity to study the location and accomodations of Eureka College.

In the Mitchell Tower at the University of Chicago is hung a peal of ten bells in memory of Alice Freeman Palmer. On July 4 these bells were rung by a band of change-ringers who that afternoon formed what is said to be the best guild of change-ringers in the United States or Canada. In change-ringing the bells hang freely in a frame and are rung in a succession determined mathematically. A ringer is assigned to swing each bell. The first bells in this country arranged in this way were set up in Boston in 1745. Paul Revere was one of the early ringers of Bos- [illegible] The art is uncommon in this country, one aside from the Chicago guild. As at Gorton it is hoped that students at the University of Chicago will learn the difficult art of campanology and increase the number and skill of the local student band.

The practice which has been pursued for some years at the University of Chicago of inviting prominent men of the various denominations to act as "University preacher" for one or more Sundays has become a highly popular one, from the point of view of the students. As a rule the preacher of the occasion holds an "office hour" daily during the week following his appointment, so as to permit of consultations with anyone interested. The list of such preachers for the current summer quarter includes the following well-known men: Rev. F. W. Gunsaulus, pastor of Central Church, Chicago, and president of Armour Institute of Technology; Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis, pastor of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn; Professor Henry Clay Vedder, of Crozer Theological Seminary; Professor William Adams Brown, of Union Theological Seminary; Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, pastor of All Souls Church, Washington, D. C., and chaplain of the U. S. Senate.

On June 19, J. W. Carpenter, pastor of the Central Church at Uniontown, Pa., gave his fifth annual report. The moneys raised in all departments of the church amounted

Follow the International Lesson Committee

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine month or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

church offerings. The church has generously supported all our missionary interests and is a living link of the Foreign Society. During the five years' pastorate the membership has almost doubled. There are now 1,000 enrolled. The Sunday-school has increased from an attendance of 160 to an attendance of 500. Seventy-five per cent of the teachers are graduates of the State Sunday-school Association, or of a school of methods. For church and missionary purposes $63,000 has been raised. The church maintains six scholarships at Bethany for the benefit of its members who wish a college education.

A good meeting has just been held at Knoxville, Iowa, by Evangelist J. M. Lowe and Singer H. D. Funk. The meeting was begun April 17 and continued eight weeks. A new congregation was organized with 165 members. There had been a small church, but with the new additions the old officers resigned and the old organization was disbanded to make for the reorganization. The evangelist says: "It was a clear triumph of the gospel of love. For years there had been two small congregations. Many attempts had been made to unite them. We said nothing about union. We asked individuals to decide for themselves to serve Christ, ignoring the whole situation, past and present. The spirit of strife and contention gave way to the spirit of love. Such a meeting is a faith builder. Though the hardest work of my life it was in many ways the happiest. The spirit of the gospel, which is persistent, hopeful, unselfish, and kind, did the work." Such a meeting is truly worth recording, and is a fine manifestation of the work of the gospel. Mr. Lowe will supply for the church during the summer. Following the Topeka convention he will hold a meeting with the church at Clarinda, Iowa.

"The Minister's Task"

note,' and the function of the minister is to "create an atmosphere in which the souls of all men, commercial, economic, industrial, etc., can grow and develop." It is not the business of the minister, says Dr. Hillis, to be the champion of temperance, the apostle of clean politics, nor the exponent of a new social order, but his business is the creating of an atmosphere in which all these interests will naturally find hearty support and encouragement. The minister has the task of making the Sabbath the soul's "library day," "art cathedral day," and "gallery day." "It is a mistake to devote the Sabbath to practical things. The Christian minister should use the Sabbath for bringing God to men." For "there is only one thing great in the world the soul," and there is "only one thing great to man, God in his soul." The function of the pulpit is to keep primary things in the throne. The secondary things, art, science industry, politics, etc., have six days, the seventh is for worship; worship alone seeks to create atmosphere.

The world, therefore has a right to "optimism and never pessimism in the pulpit. God is larger than evil and is triumphing over sin. There is no room for pessimism in the pulpit. Crime is diminishing; temperance is becoming world-wide; social and political ethics are calling for deeper standards of honor than at any time in the history of our world. God is in his world and the preacher has no right to pessimism. The preacher stands for the positive and not the negative, for the constructive and not the destructive. His business is to strengthen the serious now and the pulpit is to create an atmosphere in which the souls of men and nations may live to their highest God given powers. Should the pulpit follow the advice of Dr. Hillis there is wonderful encouragement and might get a vision of evangelizing the world and gather enthusiasm sufficient for the task. I thought without doubt that this was the most significant thing of the twentieth century. Now comes the World Missionary Conference held in Edinburgh, Scotland. It will probably be somewhat difficult to compare them. They represent two different though equasly important phases of the missionary enterprise. But without doubt these two movements—the Laymen's Missionary Movement and the World Missionary Conference—are the most significant happenings in Christian missionary activity. In military language, the one was gathering the munitions of war and the other a council of war—planning the attack.

Think of it a moment. A World Missionary Conference. The missionary leaders of the Protestants of the world—Germans, French, Scandinavians, Chinese, Japanese, Hindoos, Africans, Englishmen, Americans—regardless of demonstration, the leaders of the forces, at home, and the missionaries from all the heathen lands, have gathered to confer about the problems, the ways and means to carry the gospel to all the world. Today social discontent abounds the world over. Old orders and systems are rapidly giving away to new systems and ideals. In this changing order the Christian church has at once her opportunity and her peril. The opportunity of stopping in and, if not absolutely determining the new order, at least giving it spirit and temperment. The changes of China are astonishingly rapid. She is adopting western methods of education; she is studying with a passion the principle of representative government; she is discarding many of her old social customs. In these moments of dissatisfaction with the old is the favorable opportunity for introducing the new, the Christian.

The peril is in our delay. Some form will be adopted, it must be. If the work of missions is allowed to lag in this crisis, this time when the people are so susceptable to impressions, the loss can scarcely be comprehended. The missionary leaders and workers fully appreciate the situation, hence this world conference, for a world conquest. Who now would be so daring as to try to set the limits of influence of such a gathering? In view of all this, this is the most interesting item (dare we use such a little word for such an epoch making gathering) I know.

Dedication of the Sarah Davis Deterding Missionary Training School.

We feel every state and every province where the Church of Christ has work is interested in the dedication of the Sarah Davis Deterding Missionary Training School. August 18 the entire National Board, every Auxiliary and Mission Circle member, the children in the Young People's Department, the entire church and the general public in Indianapolis, Ind., and elsewhere are invited. The missionaries of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions who are on furlough expect to attend. Your presence or a word of faith and courage will tell mightily for the success of this day. In prayer we desire to give this building to God.—Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, Mrs. M. E. Harlan.

"Front Rank" Statements

Forty-one "Front Rank" certificates have been issued from the National Office to date as follows: Indiana, 10; Oregon, 7; Iowa, 5; Kentucky, 4; Colorado, 3; Nebraska, 3; California, 3; Illinois, 2; Ohio, 2; District of Columbia, 1; West Virginia, 1. Total, 41. The new "Front Rank" schools this week are: Indianapolis (West Park), Ind.; St. Johns, Ore.; Stapton, Ore.; Altoona, Iowa; Giarard, Ill.; York, Neb.; North Platte, Neb.; Little (Siloam), Ky.; Chaplin, Ky.; Mayslick, Ky.; Marcellus (Pleasant Grove), Ky.; Stockton (First), Calif.; Santa Cruz (First), Calif.; Williams, Calif.; Utica, Ohio; Harrison, Ohio; Morgantown, W. Va. California, Kentucky, Ohio and West Virginia have wheeled into the "Front Rank" line this week. No school will be counted as "Front Rank" until it has filled out the application blank and thus certified to having reached this exalted position. Applications should be sent in without delay.—Robt. M. Hopkins, Bible School Secretary, A. C. M. S.

New York Convention

Like our National conventions, the Empire State gathering is a composite of several conventions, the Ministerial, the Christian Women's Board of Missions, the Men's Leagues and the New York Christian Missionary Society, with the latter overtoping all others because of its importance in this state. This year's gathering was held in the beautiful city of Rochester in the First Church in Howell Street. Every convenience which our Rochester brethren could provide helped to make the stay in the warmest period of the year one of pleasure.

The programs of the different interests offered so many good things that it is hardly fair to the speakers to attempt to single out the ones which most impressed the writer. Three addresses so pleased the convention that motions were carried instructing the officers to have them printed, namely the address of Rev. Harry Minick, of Worcester, Mass., on "Christian Benevolence"; Dr. Z. A. Space, of Keuka Park, on "Christian Education," and Mr. Austin O. Long, of Niagara Falls, on "Those Boys."

The address of Dr. J. W. A. Stewart, dean of the Rochester Theological Seminary in the Ministerial Association's session on "The Dynamic of the Gospel" was both pleasing and helpful as was R. H. Miller's on "The Essence of Protestantism." A series of devotional addresses by William Bayard Craig, of New York City, were much appreciated. This was his first appearance at one of our conventions and the wish was expressed that he may long continue in his office as minister for the Lenox Ave. brethren.

Miss Florence Miller made a fine impression on the convention in her address on "The Kentucky Mountains" for the C. W. B. M., as did also Mr. R. A. Doan, of Nelsonville, Ohio, for the Men's Leagues. The address of Mr. Alfred Day, Secretary of the New York State Sunday-school Association on "The Church's Decisive Battle for Righteousness" was greatly appreciated.

The presence and addresses of G. W. Muckley, Stephen J. Corey, and Oliver W. Stewart, representing their various boards were among the usual good things afforded by the convention. Reports from the missions showed a general increase in membership, the average being 15 per cent. The greatest gains were reported by the South Geddes Street Church, Syracuse, which in addition to building a new house of worship had a gain of fifty-one members. Marked improvement in Elmira was reported and a movement is on foot to regain control of their property. Both Kehr Street and Kensington, Buffalo, have broken ground for new buildings. The newly elected officers of the State Society are, Dr. Eli H. Long, Buffalo, President; Dr. Duncan Sinclair, North Tonawanda, First Vice-President; Robt. Stewart, Rochester, Recording Secretary; C. R. Stauffer, Syracuse, Corresponding Secretary; D. Krebiel, Williamsville, Treasurer; W. C. Prewitt, Niagara Falls, Supt. Bible Schools, and C. C. Crawford, Rochester, Supt. Christian Endeavor.

The treasurer's report was the best in years, showing a balance on hand of over $500. The offerings from Bible Schools were the largest in the history of the society.

Especial emphasis was placed upon the fact that this is the fiftieth anniversary year of the Society and plans were made for the proper celebration of the event at the next convention. The State Board is to map out a suitable campaign with aims and ideals for the individual churches as well as the state society. There was a marked sentiment in favor of taking the next convention to Keuka college, but because of the year of Jubilee and the probability of a large convention the gracious invitation of the Richmond Ave. Church, Buffalo, was accepted. With the completion of the new Bible School plant this will be a delightful place to hold the gathering.

THE BETHANY GRADED SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

INTERNATIONAL COURSE

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR

Purpose—The purpose of the Graded Lessons is: To meet the spiritual needs of the pupil in each stage of his development. The spiritual needs broadly stated are these:
1. To know God as he has revealed himself to us in nature, in the heart of man, and in Christ..... 2. To exercise toward God, the Father, and his Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, trust, obedience, and worship..... 3. To know and to do our duty to others..... 4. To know and do our duty to ourselves.

COURSES	Age of Pupils	AIM	PUBLICATIONS
BEGINNERS		To lead the little child to the Father by helping him: 1. To know God, the heavenly Father, who loves him, provides for, and protects him. 2. To know Jesus the Son of God, who became a little Child, who went about doing good, and who is the Friend and Saviour of little children. 3. To know about the heavenly home. 4. To distinguish between right and wrong. 5. To know his love for God by working with him and for others.	Lessons prepared by FRANCES W. DANIELSON
First Year .	4		Teachers' Text Book—Part I, II, III, IV Large Pictures (9x12 inches) Beginners' Stories—(Illustrated folder for Pupils)—Part I, II, III, IV	Ready
Second Year	5		Teachers' Text Book—Part I, II, III, IV Large Pictures (9x12 inches) Beginners' Stories—(Illustrated folder for pupils) Part I, II, III, IV	Ready (October, 1910)
PRIMARY		To lead the child to know the heavenly Father, and to inspire within him a desire to live as God's child: 1. To show forth God's power, love, and care, and to awaken within the child responsive love, trust, and obedience. 2. To build upon the teachings of the first year (1) by showing ways in which children may express their love, trust, and obedience; (2) by showing Jesus the Saviour, in his love and work for men; and (3) by showing how helpers of Jesus and others learn to do God's will. 3. To build upon the work of the first and second year by telling (1) about the people who chose to do God's will; (2) how Jesus, by his life and words, death and resurrection, revealed the Father's love and will for us; (3 such stories as will make a strong appeal to the child and arouse within him a desire to choose and to do that which God requires of him.	Lessons prepared by MARION THOMAS
First Year .	6		Teachers' Text Book, Part I, II, III, IV (With picture supplement) Primary Stories—(Illustrated folder for pupils)—Part I, II, III, IV	Ready
Second Year	7 and 8		Teachers' Text Book—Part I, II, III, IV Large Pictures—(6x8 inches) Primary Stories—(Illustrated folder for pupils)—Part I, II, III, IV	Ready (October, 1910)
JUNIOR		1. To awaken an interest in the Bible and a love for it; to deepen the impulse to know and to do right. 2. To present the ideal of moral heroism; to reveal the power and majesty of Jesus Christ, and to show his followers going forth in his strength to do his work. 3. To deepen the sense of responsibility for right choices; to show the consequences of right and wrong choices; to strengthen love of the right and hatred of the wrong. 4. To present Jesus as our Example and Saviour; to lead the pupil to appreciate his opportunities for service and to give him a vision of what it means to be a Christian.	Lessons prepared by JOSEPHINE L. BALDWIN.
First Year .	9 and 10		Teachers' Text Book—Part I, II, III . . Pupils' Book for Work and Study—Part I, II, III . . . . . (With picture supplement)	Ready

INTERMEDIATE		To lead to the practical recognition of the duty and responsibility of personal Christian living, and to organize the conflicting impulses of life so as to develop habits of Christian service. The central aim of these biographical studies for the first and second years is religious and moral: but the religious and moral emphasis in these studies will not lead to any neglect of the historical viewpoint, as these characters are generally makers of history, and cannot be satisfactorily presented without the historical setting as a background.	Lessons for first year prepared by MILTON S. LITTLEFIELD
First Year .	13 to 15		Teachers' Text Book—Part I, II, III, IV Pupils' Text Book—Part I, II, III, IV . (With maps)	Ready (October, 1910)

The Curriculum Outlined Above Furnishes a Comprehensive Course of Religious Instruction

Comprising as it does not only the biographies, history, literature, and teachings of the Bible, but also lessons on the history and heroes of the Christian Church, of missionary enterprises, philanthropic movements, and moral reforms.

In order that the truths taught may be assimilated and the spirit and qualities of Christian character developed, various forms of self-expression are suggested, beginning with simple hand-work done by the little child, and culminating in important lines of Christian service possible to young men and women.

The series of lessons for each year begins in October, and the work that is essential to the completion of the aim and the integrity of the course as a whole, is found in the nine months corresponding to the public school year—October to June. The lessons for the remaining three months of each year are valuable in themselves, and either supplement the work of the preceding months, or prepare for that of the following year.

The courses for each grade or year are permanent and will be available for use in the same grade with successive classes each year.

The Lessons for the Summer Quarter beginning July 3, will prepare the school for the greatly enriched course beginning October 1. Send today for order blanks and samples.

The Church of Promise

Two Essential Characteristics of the Church of Tomorrow

Our world is one of change. Agriculture, commerce, industry, education are continually adjusting themselves to the changed conditions. Failing in this readjustment they must languish, and die.

Amid the changes in thought, in educational matter and method, in commercial methods and standards, in social conditions, and the structure of our population, will the church of America continue to live? Will she regain her erstwhile authority, and command again the allegiance of the men of brawn and brain?

A too-ready affirmation of the future triumphs of the church, will not make for that triumph. It is the voice of the heart, but will not satisfy the head of the doubter, nor will it lead to a discovery of the things which are most essential to the triumph of the church.

There are facts which are fatal to a too-ready optimism. The following facts regarding church attendance are not altogether reassuring. After an exhaustive study of a number of carefully selected fields in different parts of the United States, Dr. Josiah Strong gives it as his judgment that not more than thirty per cent of the population attend church regularly, whether Catholic or Protestant, and not more than twenty per cent attend irregularly, making a total of not more than fifty per cent who ever frequent a church. There are those who believe this estimate to be too high, and would place the figures at fifteen per cent and ten per cent, with a total of twenty-five to thirty per cent.

Regarding church membership, Dr. Strong says: "If the gain of the church on the population during the first half of the nineteenth century is represented by eighty, during the last half it is represented by twenty, during the last twenty years it is represented by four, and during the last ten years it is represented by one."

The attitude of these non-attendants is of all grades from indifference to positive antipathy. This is true in the city, where the population is more than three-fourths of foreign birth, or foreign born parents. It is not much better in the towns and villages, where merchants and retired farmers easily yield the blessings of the church service for the attractions of the automobile.

Two classes, particularly, the church of our day is failing to reach. They are the foreigner and the wage earner. The former, Frenchman, Hungarian, Bohemian, Pole, Italian, and Lithuanian, rejoicing in the freedom from the dominance of the religious tyranny of his home country, turns his steps toward no church door. In America there are three hundred societies among the Bohemians alone that have as their avowed object the teaching of disbelief in the church and all for which it stands. Many writers have told us of the alienation of the wage earner from the church and her ministries. Not a few of them would applaud the statement of a recent writer that the laboring man hates the very shadow of the church spire that falls across his pathway. The church of our day is not especially notable for her power to win and hold the allegiance of the people of wealth and fashion, and the persons of highest intellectual culture.

Must the church continue to lose? Is organized religion to be outgrown? Is there not a promise for the church. Our hearts are satisfied only by some such word as that of the prophet, "In the latter days the mountain of Jehovah's House shall be established in the top of the mountains and shall be exalted above the hills and all nations shall flow unto it.

Dr. McGiffert has said, "Christian Church there must be if the cause of sympathy and service is to prevail among men." Our hearts say, amen!

Nor are we, today, without the signs of "that latter day when the mountain of Jehovah's house shall be exalted on the top of the mountains." From many quarters come the glad news of the increased interest in the things of religion and the church.

In the recent Laymen's Missionary Congress in Chicago there were more than four thousands strong, viril men, devoted to the cause of Christian missions. Of this meeting, Louis Wallis, in the Chicago Public, said: "It was not an ordinary religious affair. It had the enthusiasm that accompanies only fresh and spontaneous movements." Last year nearly $25,000,000 was raised by Protestant churches for missions. Of this sum the churches of Canada and the United States gave $11,307.405. But a stronger indication of the new life in the church is the fact the missionary organizations have now set themselves to raise within the next thirty-five years the colossal sum of two billion dollars. The recent meeting in Edinburgh is well described as Christian strategists planning for the conquest of the world.

Likewise encouraging is the renewed interest in Bible study. In a recent number of the Century magazine, Clayton Sedgwick Cooper, secretary of the department of Bible work among college men for the International committee of the Young Men's Christian Association, presents encouraging facts. He says that last year 32,259 college men in 539 institutions attended voluntarily Bible classes for two months or more. He assures us that they were the best men in their colleges. At the United States military academy, 340 midshipmen meet weekly for Bible study. In 1908-09, ten state universities reported 3,678 students voluntarily attending weekly Bible classes. Many of the more aggressive denominations are placing student pastors at the great universities and find a welcome to their work by the best students in the institutions. Not long ago a daily newspaper published in Wall street declared there was nothing this country needed so much as a revival of old fashioned religion.

All this does not look as if the days of the church were numbered; but gives us heart to believe that the day of a larger usefulness is just before the church of America.

But the church of promise, can not be the church of the past. We face a new world. We confront new problems. We must speak a message that meets those conditions, and helps to solve those problems.

The church of promise must be a united church, and a universal church. It must be united. It is the rule now to think of the denominational divisions that hinder the work of our day as being the outgrowth of historical conditions which no longer exist. But the divisions remain. They continue to confuse and waste our energy. They remain because the new spirit in religion has not yet gained sufficient strength to throw off the old form, and get for itself a new body that shall be adapted to the new day. One day we shall be ashamed of this and build over the grave of our denominationalism an expiatory monument as the Presbyterians have over the ashes of Servitus.

The church of promise will be the universal church. At the Laymen's Congress in Chicago there was clearly perceptible a great under current of democracy. Difference of history, of creed, of social prestige, of apostolic assumptions, vanished before the consuming passion for the evangelization of the world. To that conference every man who would join with his brethren for the worship of God and the service of man was welcome. No bar of credal or formal rite was raised to separate believers and servants of the Christ.

So must it be, in that latter day when "all nations shall flow unto it"—the Church of Christ. So will it be when the church catches fully the spirit of the Master and gives itself to the realization of the great ends of the Kingdom, which is "righteousness, joy and peace."

Such is the spirit needed today. It calls for men, large men, for pew and pulpit. It calls for men of vision and men of courage; for men of faith and men of intellectual equipment.

For the church that can work with such a spirit, and with an intelligent grasp of the great human needs of our day, individual and social, there is still room in the heart of humanity. To men and churches who can preach that God is love and can say it with the impelling power of intelligent sympathetic expression of that love in creed and ritual, in public utterance and organized activity, men will still respond and will yield loving allegiance.

British Disciples Leading the Way

Disciples throughout the United States have been greatly interested in the call made by the Disciples of Great Britain for an Anglo-American Conference on Christian Union. The Christian Century has been saying recently that the essential testimony which the Disciples are to bear on behalf of Christian union can be borne more effectively through institutes, conferences, and lectureships than through the multiplication of churches, important though the latter may be. It was with greatest satisfaction, therefore, that this paper received the first notice of the purpose of our brethren in England to follow the Edinburgh Conference on Missions with a Conference on Christian Union. On another page will be found the story of this convocation as told by our English correspondent, Leslie W. Morgan, who was the efficient secretary of the conference, and in whose mind the whole plan shaped itself.

Fresh from attendance upon the sessions of this really extraordinary meeting it is our pleasure to testify to its great success in promoting the cause on behalf of which it was organized. It was, first of all, a representative affair. Of the eight speakers on the two days' program four were American Disciples and four represented four English denominations—Rev. Prebendary Webb-Peploe, of St. Paul's Cathedral, the Church of England, Rev. Dr. W. L. Watkinson the Wesleyan, and Rev. C. Silvester Horne the Congregationalists. These men are leaders among the evangelical forces of Great Britain. Their names are well known in the United States where by book and voice they have spoken to us. That their participation in a conference promoted by so feeble a folk as are the Disciples in England testifies to their great interest in the Christian union theme and, no doubt, to the unfailing fervor of the secretary, Mr. Morgan, whose friendship with them extends all the way from the library to the golf course.

The effect of this sort of conference cannot be measured by statistics or indicated by resolutions passed. Its value lies in forcing the problem of unity into the foreground of the minds of those who participate in it either as speakers or as listeners. It is not enough for a community committed to the Christian union ideal to merely study the Bible; such a community must also study the people whom it proposes to unite. It must be on fraternal and easy relations with them, must know their ways of thinking and feeling, their doctrines and practices. No clannish people can be an effective Christian union instrument. The Disciples have much to learn in such conferences as these—and perhaps what they learn will make the Christian union movement seem easier and more practicable than it seems when we stand apart and hammer our scripture texts on the outisde of the denominations.

On the other hand, it is always a wholesome revelation to a denominational preacher to discover that there is in existence a people who have purposefully set themselves the task of destroying denominationalism that the one catholic church of Christ may be all and in all. The Disciples are not conceived by the average person as such a people. They are supposed to be just another sect, contending for their interpretation of the New Testament like all the sects are doing, and perfectly willing, of course, for Christian union, provided everybody will come to their way of thinking and practice. When such average person learns that the Disciples' purpose is quite opposite to this, that while as individuals each holds heartily to his understanding of the New Testament and is in duty bound to conform his practice thereto, nevertheless, the "primal thesis" of the Disciples is that fellowship and union is not conditioned upon our individual understanding of New Testament teaching but upon our common loyalty to Jesus Christ—such average person is surprised and piqued into further curiosity.

This Anglo-American conference on Christian union will do good, therefore, in setting right the minds of the leaders of the denominational churches as to just what the aim and method of the Disciples are. And henceforth they cannot help, whether or not in hearty coöperation with us, taking more active interest in working for an answer to our Lord's prayer.

But there were two practical and obvious results of this conference upon which a word must now be said, though only a word, as no doubt there will be occasion later on to say many things. After the conference had adjourned a supplemental conference was held in the West London Tabernacle at which the sentiment of the main gathering was crystalized in the formation of a "Christian Union League" to be extended throughout all churches and to include both individuals and congregations which had caught the vision of a united church and desired to begin now the practice of union. This singularly felicitious conception carried our minds back to the original purposes of the Campbells, whose desire was strongly set against the formation of a separate religious community, but who wished rather to work within the existing order of things for the promotion of unity. This British League has in it the possibility of reviving that original conception of the mission of the Disciples of Christ, and if the idea shall spread to America it will be ample reward for funds expended during thirty years of not always hopeful effort in establishing the cause in Great Britain.

The other manifest benefit of the conference was the meeting of thirty-five representatives of our older British brethren with about forty-five representatives of the Christian Association, the so-called progressive group, to discuss the possibility of coöperation or union between the two bodies. As may not be known to some of our readers, these two bodies have been separated by a wide gulf for many years. Both derive their original impulse from the Campbells and their co-workers, but have not been living in either the spirit or the form of unity. In a further article we shall speak at greater length of the meeting in which it was undertaken to remove from our plea this scandal, for such it is felt by both groups to be.—Charles Clayton Morrison.

Christian Vision

The Christian is a seer or he is nothing. He sees what ought to be. He is never satisfied with things as they are because he sees where improvement is possible. He creates in the hearts of others dissatisfaction with evil conditions. No community can continue in ignorance of its wickedness if it has one Christian in it.

"Not that I have already obtained, or am already made perfect; but I press on" is the expression of the Christian attitude toward life. When a man ceases to grow he ceases to be a disciple of Jesus. Growth ceases when vision becomes dim. As long as we have before us an ideal we are willing to endure the painful toil that makes growth possible. When the ideal no longer fills the mind, we choose the present comfort and let the future take care of itself.

The Christian congregation is the eye of its community. It sees what opportunities are before the young people and it enables them to know themselves and their circumstances. A company of persons engaged in debates about what has been and with no appreciation of the connection between the past and the present is not a Christian congregation. The meeting on the Lord's day that inspires no one to more noble endeavor can hardly claim the presence of the Lord. A pessimistic tirade in connection with the communion service misrepresents the teaching of Jesus. The house of God is not the place to apologize for sin, but its preaching must never leave the impression that God is dethroned and that sin is triumphant. The minister may have to present a dark picture but if he cannot make his congregation feel that the grace of God is sufficient for every human need, the less he says about evil conditions the better he will serve God.

There is need in the church of today for men of vision to lead in the movement for Christian union. A prominent theological teacher has said recently that denominational pride is keeping churches apart where all other reasons for separation have been removed. There is truth in this statement. Men have reason to honor the organization of which their fathers were members and from which they learned how to worship God. The tendency is for every man to attribute too much importance to his own denomination. He cannot believe that anybody outside of it really understands certain aspects of truth. Men of vision will recognize the services of all the denominations to the truth. They will not belittle any company of earnest believers. But they will find something big enough to include all disciples of Christ. They will show us how to avoid the waste of a divided church. They will teach us what is worth while and what is unimportant.

The church is beginning to see the place of education in the Christian life. The notion that faith in God can be kept alive by a revival once a year is less prevalent than it used to be. We are consideration of the factsetaoinshrdluetaoinvbgkqjetaoinxzfiffffffiffi discovering that a confession of faith that is not based upon a thoughtful consideration of the facts of Christianity is not the good confession. We have discovered, too, that the learner is active and that therefore the instruction of the sermon is not sufficient. We learn best in classes where every statement is liable to be challenged and where every member is free to express his opinion. The democracy of learning is becoming known. It honors the vision of every man. The truth the child grasps is respected. The best teacher is he who can walk along with his pupils and rejoice with them in their attainments. Who will tell us how to realize more adequately the democracy of Christian education?

ALVA W. TAYLOR

It was the privilege of the editor of this page to attend the great World's Missionary Conference at Edinburgh as a delegate. He had the same privilege at its predecessor in New York ten years ago. That was one of his earliest experiences in affairs of the kind, and he thought the more youthful enthusiasm over the great meeting could scarcely be realized after a decade so filled with observation of great occasions. But so significant was this conference, so representative of the most momentous forces of our time, so ecumenical in its capacity as a Christian and universal parliament and so suffused was it with the spirit of unity that it would indeed be a cynical attendant who was not enthused until he accounted it very near the climacteric experience of his life

The conference was great in its personnel. Not all the great men there were men of daily paper reputation. Their greatness is of a more substantial kind. They are like the great prophets. Coming generations will erect their monuments. Those who administer our present day affairs get the most of our attention, but the most of our attention is caught by passing events and things superficial. Here was the stuff of which heroes were made.

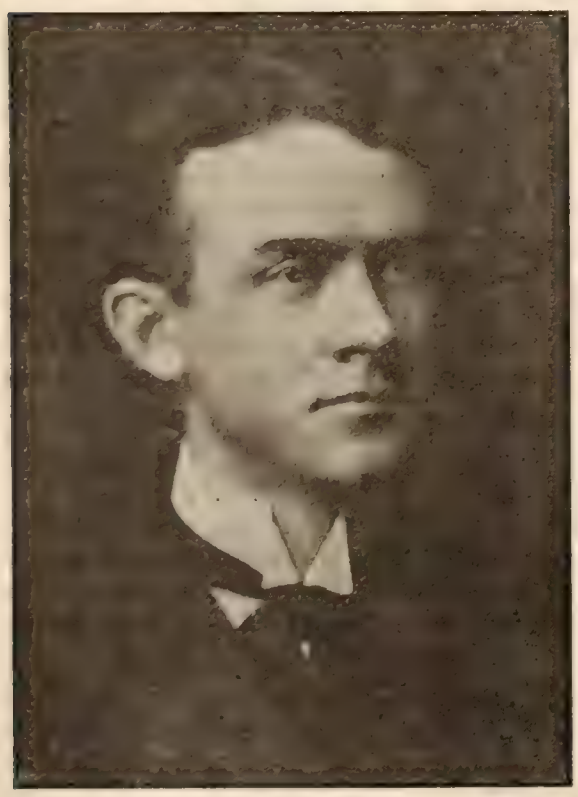
Notable among the more popularly known personalities of the conference were Sir Andrew L. Frazer, who was for many years Governor General of Bengal, and there administered the civil affairs of eighty millions of people. Good imperialist that he is, he has been bearing testimony for many years that Christianity is doing more for India than England is able to do. Lord Reay, who presided over two sessions, bore a like testimony out of a like experience. Lord Balfour of Burleigh, a man whose eminence is not dependent upon his birth to aristocratic distinction was what we would call honorary president of the conference, and made a statesmanilke address. John Mott was the real presiding officer, and the genius of the conference. He is one of the most masterly executives of the time, and the success of the conference was due more to his organizing ability than to that of any other single person. Robert E. Speer was called upon oftener, perhaps, than any other missionary expert of the conference. Speer is consummate in his presentation of the larger issues of the world-wide missionary problem. Some one has suggested that New York make him U. S. Senator. He has a bigger job. The most popular man in the gathering was William J. Bryan. It was not known surely that he could attend the conference until he returned from South America just before it convened. As a consequence, arrangements had to be made for his public address after the conference began. With almost no notice, audiences that overflowed into the streets, greeted him on four of the five days he was present. The daily papers were in rhapsodies over his personality and eloquence, and the conference people over his unsurpassed advocacy of Christian missions and practical Christianity. Pastor Boegned of the French Protestant Church, Henen Richter and Warneck, the notable German authoress, Dr. Chatterjee of India, a lifelong native Christian, and a long list of notable missionaries, too long to name, and a selection of any names from which would be almost unfair to the others, were present as well as nearly all the great missionary secretaries of the world and many native Christians of note. No address of the entire conference surpassed that of Prof. Azariah of India. His plea was for brotherly treatment of his people by the whites and especially by those known as Christians.

Each morning the report of one of the eight commissions would be made. Then followed an all day discussion by those who were best qualified to deal in an expert manner with the problems coming under that particular head. It was no simple task for President Mott to select the speakers from the large number who asked the privilege. Here were representatives from scores of religious bodies and many nations, not all of whom were willing to forget precedence, party consideration, or personal ambition when the matter of getting to make a talk before such a gathering was under consideration. Few men could have discharged their office with such skill as did Mr. Mott. Rhetorical connoisseurs may have been disappointed. But these men were there for serious business and they were sober and grave in the consideration of their problems. The careful listener and the man who came to the conference with a mind prepared by consideration of the problems of the world-wide missionary enterprise, found more in many of those seven-minute discussions than in a long and fervent address to a popular audience. No national parliament listens to more statesmanlike utterance than those there made by men like Bishops Brent and Bashford, J. Campbell Gibson, Arthur H. Smith, Dr. Chatterjee, Robert E. Speer, Prof. Ritcher, Eugene Stock, Seth Low, Wardlaw Thompson, Robert Horton and many others. Popular addresses were given in three different halls each evening, to great audiences, and there the masters of the platform appeared. It must be mentioned that Rev. Gordon Lang ,the liberal young Archbishop of York, made one of the really great addresses at these meetings. His ringing and convincing declarations in favor of Christian democracy and unity were inspiring. One felt he ought to be one of the prophets of a new era to the Anglican church and some day help unburden his ecclesiastical office of politics, sectarianism, and the medieval toggery he is compelled to wear as a sign and symbol that ecclesiasticism is a relic of ages gone.

The soul of the conference was in its spirit of unity. When the things on which we do agree are assembled there is but a fringe left of things upon which we disagree and even that is found inconsequential. We have varieties of opinion like the leaves of the oak have varieties of size and markings, but we are all so alike that all the world recognizes us as alike. The conference had one text. It was not officially promulgated, but the spirit put it on the lips of every speaker, and that was the Lord's prayer that we may be one, that the world may believe. Our hearts rejoiced as day after day went by and we heard men of all denominations crying this shibboleth of unity and not one apology for sectarianism. Many were unsparing in their denunciation of our divisions as a sin and the narrations of actual unions accomplished on the mission field gave us vision of that new day when we shall all be one even as "He and the Father are one." Thus things arose in an ascending climax to the day when the commission on unity was to report. There were great expectations for this day and the feeling was tense and joyful. The report of the commission had been placed in the hands of the delegates and, the data being furnished by missionaries, was wise and practical in its recommendations regarding methods, but unequivocal in its spirit for unity. Perhaps it heightened the harmony, as in a great symphony, to have the melody broken by occasional discords, but we could have wished it had been confined to matters of policy only. But it could not be. Let it be noted that no missionary voice joined in the unity discord. It must be left to the theological dogmatist and ecclesiastical politician. It was voiced in tones that seemed almost hesitating when a man who has been the chief ecclesiastical politician of his denomination for a generation brought it forth in the thread-bare analogy of the army with its divisions of artillery, cavalry and infantry. But scarce had his last word been uttered when one of the greatest missionaries in China and a representative of the same denomination was on his feet with the dramatic declaration that he could think of no figure of speech that could justify our divisions; that the church of Christ was the "body of Christ," and that to disjoint it was to give His body pain and injure its usefulness. Chinese and Japanese delegates plead that our traditions had no merit for them, but that our essential Christianity was their only hope and in this plea every man from the front most heartily and feelingly joined.

The day is about done when there will be any competition on the field. The men who go out as doughty denominationalists soon lose their fervor for a sect in the overpowering sense that possesses them in the face of the task. They see the need of a gospel untrammeled by the opinions of men and traditions of ages gone and see, too, that the universal spirit of Christ's brotherhood forbids all that divides and demands all that makes for coöperation. The tendency is for no mission, to intrench upon the territory another has already occupied. Educational institutions also are uniting. The significance of this can hardly be over-estimated. The future leaders of the native churches are to be prepared for their work in an atmosphere of unity and coöperation. A common literature is being produced and more and more letters are being granted freely from church to church without reference to denominational affiliations. Interdenominational conferences are being held and geography determines the coöperation more and sectarianism less. The conference leaves behind it a continuation committee which is to appoint a great missionary tribunal like unto the dreams men have of a permanent international tribunal at the Hague, and which will be the forerunner of that day of the Lord when the Church of Christ is one church and the nations of the world are those of our Lord and His Christ.

Anglo-American Conference on Christian Union



Report of Meeting—The Men Who Represented the Disciples.

BY LESLIE W. MORGAN.

We are too near to recent events to set them down in the light of history or perhaps to see them in their true perspective as projected on the foreground of the future, but if vision and aspiration count for anything, the events of the last few days have a significance beyond the ordinary. There has been held for the first time in the city of London a conference on Christian union. They have been held elsewhere but not in the world's metropolis so far as the present writer's knowledge goes. This conference may prove as significant as the famous Gridelwald gathering of a score of years ago when the free church council idea first took root in England.

Two Fraternal Hands.

The conference now under review may be divided into three sections, which may appear to be diverse in their purposes, but which in reality emphasize a common principle, as will appear as the report proceeds. The period covered was four days, the first two days being devoted to the Anglo-American conference proper when our own men appeared on a common platform with representative men from the various free churches and from the established church; the third day was devoted to a consideration of themes growing out of the preceding days which had for their purpose the discovery of our own relation and responsibility to the cause of Christian union; the fourth day was devoted to a meeting with the English churches of Christ to endeavor to find a way by which the forces pleading for a return to N. T. Christianity might be united. Thus during the conference the fraternal hand was reached out in what might seem to be two opposite directions, and some fear was expressed that each hand might be paralyzed, by the direction in which the other was extended. The fear has proved groundless. The situation but gave opportunity, and will still give it, to emphasize a fundamental principle for which we stand,—liberty and unity, not coercion and uniformity.

Advertising Methods.

The first two days' sessions were widely advertised, and even our American friends confessed that they had learned something in the art of advertising a religious gathering. And while the attendances were not large the subject of Christian union was brought before thousands of people through the 1,700 large posters that were displayed throughout London, the advertisements in twelve of the leading religious weeklies, the seven or eight hundred invitations that went out to ministers and others, the announcements made in many churches, and last but not least, by means of the sandwich boards that were carried for two days in the city by six girls belonging to an organization known as the "Busy Bees." The total of sixty pounds spent was not thrown away and inquiries are still coming in as to the meaning of the gathering. There are some thousands of people who cannot again say, unless they have short memories, that they have never heard of the Disciples of Christ. In each invitation that went out a small tract was enclosed setting forth our principles, also a hand-bill on Christian union, and another giving our record of growth during 100 years. There was sufficient reason for this in the natural demand to know who we are on the part of those who were asked to give us support.

Leslie W. Morgan.

Notable Speakers.

We could not have asked for four better men than those who responded to our invitation to share our platform with our American brethren. And what is true of the speakers is true also of the chairmen, all members of parliament except one, our own Mr. Durban who took the chair one evening. Seven different denominations were represented. A high level was struck in the opening address by T. E. Ruth of Liverpool who had been assigned the subject of "Christian Union Demanded by the World's Need." An American remarked, "He is a coming man," an Englishman replied, "He has already arrived." Mr. Ruth may be said to have arrived a few years ago, when he appeared for the first time on the National Free Church Council platform. The address appears elsewhere in this issue and need not therefore be further commented upon. It has already been suggested that arrangements should be made for Mr. Ruth to make a tour of the United States in the cause of Christian Union. Our own A. McLean followed Mr. Ruth in a carefully prepared paper on "Christian Union Demanded by the Essence of Christianity," and it would be a fair inference to conclude from the array of facts drawn from the Scriptures of both the Old and the New Testament that the time will come when Christianity must be a unit or nothing! The chair was taken by G. Hay Morgan, M. P., once a Baptist minister of prominence but now in the legal profession. Mr. Morgan said he was a Baptist but he was first of all a Christian, and if this was the right order in relation to the best denomination, what was to be said of the worst?

The second session was devoted to the subject of "Bases for Christian Union." And addresses were delivered by Prebendary Webb-Peploe of the Established Church, and by Dr. Errett Gates of Chicago. An admirable principle (as viewed by the committee of arrangement) of the conference was illustrated by this situation. Mr. Webb-Peploe is a conservative in matters religious, whereas Dr. Gates is well known to Christian Century readers. Notwithstanding this, each was free to speak his mind, and he spoke it. And what is even more significant, it is not probable that what either said would be accepted by the majority of his own denomination. It is one of the outstanding contradictions of our outgrown denominational system that a larger liberty is conceded to men inside a particular denomination than is accorded to men of another denomination. Perhaps some day the principle will be recognized that what is tolerated within the ranks of a single denomination need not be looked upon with disfavor to the extent of exclusion, when it appears elsewhere. He who is in and is not put out gives warrant for the reception of his brother who is out and wants to come in. Referring to the addresses themselves, what was omitted by Mr. Webb-Peploe was as significant as what he said. There was no claim of a rightful authority on the part of the church and no reference to the historic episcopate. His presence on the Keswick platform for thirty-five years has, doubtless, somewhat reduced the importance of these things in the eyes of this man of God with a passion for holiness and consecration. It was in Mr. Webb-Peploe's reference to biblical criticism and its influence of our common Christianity that indicated a somewhat different point of view from what is usual with the other speakers. Each agreed however that the union that is effected must be a union in Christ, only differing somewhat in their interpretation of what this would involve.

Mr. Gates first treated the subject from the historical point of view, concluding this section of his address with a clear statement of the principles enunciated by Thomas and Alexander Campbell as bases for the reunion of Christendom, and then proceeded to give his own ideas of the union that is to be, or ought to be.

Things Already Accomplished.

The third session was expected to sound a hopeful note concerning the things already done, and it did. The chair was taken by J. Allen Baker, Esq., M. P., a member of the Society of Friends, and a leader in his own denomination and also in the campaign for the peace of the world. His words from the chair were appropriately devoted to what has been done toward the promotion of unity among nations. After all many of our denominations have arisen because of national traits and have then been transplanted to other soil, often without point of sense. The comity of nations will do more than interpret the significance of certain denominational principles, it will tend to the finding of the common denominator in them all. The speakers at this session were Dr. W. L. Watkinson, so well known on both sides of the Atlantic as a virile writer and preacher of the Wesleyan Methodist body, and C. C. Morrison of the Christian Century. They both did themselves and their themes credit. Dr. Watkinson gave a tender and yet forceful presentation of the subject which showed his full sympathy for not only what has already been done but an ardent longing for the things that are yet to be. At the same time the good doctor was careful to say in the opening of his address that anything in the way of an ecclesiasticism was to be avoided, and that he feared also that there was some truth in the statement that unity is like silence, "If you speak it is broken." The present speaker did not break it, but cemented it.

The address by Mr. Morrison revealed a statesman and a seer. For an all-round view of the subject and the plane to which the whole theme was lifted was not exceeded in the conference. It was a masterly address; frank in its criticism and fruitful in its suggestions. It would be folly to attempt to review it here, but it will be published both in England and America.

It remained for the last session to hear any special reference to the different problems that England and America have to face in connection with the matter of Christian union. Rev. C. Silvester Horne, M. P., who spoke on "The Difficulties and Their Removal," undertook what he considered almost a hopeless task, viz., to make the American section of his audience understand the difficulties in this country of which nothing is known in the United States. Speaking on the general subject, Mr. Horne said the first part of the subject that had been assigned him was an easy one, but the latter part made it sufficiently difficult to test the valor of the bravest. The speaker carried the audience with him, as he always does, till the last word was spoken and he had to hurry away to his duties at the "House." Mr. Horne is thinking of a trip to America next year, and those churches and other organizations that can secure a visit from him will be fortunate. His character and disposition are as genial as the smile with which he was evidently born. Dr. Charles Leach, M. P., was the chairman and in his opening remarks referred to what he had to do in the early days of the " pleasant Sunday afternoon" movement in promoting its interests, "by accident" as he modestly put it.

Dr. Errett Gates, Associate Professor of Church History, University of Chicago.

The closing address of this series was given by Dr. J. H. Garrison of the Christian Evangelist, on "The Consummation." It was a commingling of review and vision that proved most acceptable to a gathering of Disciples and others, all of whom had at heart the great cause of Christian nion. This address set forth perhaps in the most sympathetic way the position of the Disciples of Christ or any of the series and served an admirable purpose in giving point to the gathering which had been arranged by them.

The account of the session when the theme of "The Furtherance of the Cause in all the World" was considered in a symposium and the one when council was held with those who stand with us in principle but not in action, must be postponed to another issue. This further statement will include an important decision in regard to promoting the organization of a league for the furtherance of Christian union that ought to have a world-wide significance.

Associate Membership

("a rejoinder").

The comments of my good friend, Austin Hunter, on the plan of "membership in the congregation" move me to a brief reply. First, he says it is too formal and points out that "each flourishing church has several regular attendants and regular contributors and people who give their influence to the strengthening of the church who are not members." But the question is, are these people counted as Christian people? Does their relation fulfil the requirements of Christian union? "Membership in the congregation" is a recognition of the Christian character of these people. Second, our friend says the plan is too informal and states that these persons may not have "made any profession of Christian faith." As a matter of fact, however, their indentifying themselves with the life and work of the church is itself a confession of Christian faith. Belonging to the fellowship, contributing one's money and devoting one's time and influence to the advancement of Christianity are about as real and effective confessions of faith as could be required. I do not find in my New Testament that "Jesus himself said that certain ones who refused obedience to an external rite had 'rejected the counsel of God.'" Certainly Luke 7:30 does not ascribe that statement to Jesus. All of our members of the congregation are believers in Jesus Christ,—are Christians. Third, it is quite a matter of one's standpoint whether thirty such members are "many" or "few." The more important fact is that they afford an actual demonstration that the plan has worked and has enabled us to accomplish Christian union in what we beileve to be a Christian and scriptural manner. I do not know of a single Disciple who has been kept out of the Hyde Park Church by this practice. If there be any such, they are doubtless able to speak for themselves. As to growth in membership, missionary enthusiasm and good works generally, the Hyde Park Church has not lagged behind many of our Chicago churches. Certainly in the practice of Christian union, which is the purpose for which this plan of membership was adopted, the results have been most encouraging. The letters received expressing commendation of this serious and earnest effort to really practice as well as to preach union, are evidence that interest in this question is increasing.

A Game for the Little Folks

The game is called "Defiance."

The company of little folks represent a mother and children.

"Mother, can I pick a rose?"

"Yes, my dearest daughter, if you don't tear your clothes. But remember, tomorrow is your sister's wedding day."

The children now retire to a safe distance, and sing:

"I picked a rose."
"I tore my clothes!"
"Come home!"
"I don't hear you."
"I'll send your father after you."
"I don't hear you."
"I'll send your brother after you."
"I don't hear you."
"I'll send the dog after you."
"I don't hear you."
"I'll send myself after you."
"Send 'em along!"

A chase then ensues, and the child caught must take the mother's place. For an outdoor romping game this has been very popular.—Ex.

Union Demanded by the World's Need

A Catholic Tempered Confession of the Failure of Denominationalism.

BY REV. T. E. RUTH.

EDITOR'S NOTE.—On another page appears a report of an extraordinary meeting held in London, July 4 and 5, a Anglo-American Conference on Christian union, promoted by the Disciples of Christ. We take peculiar satisfaction in giving our readers an extra good taste of the rich feast spread for that gathering. The following article by the minister of the Princes Gate Baptist Chapel, Liverpool, was the first address in a series of eight notable, and, we believe, historic utterances. Mr. Ruth is one of the younger Baptist preachers of England, rapidly rising into a place of leadership among the non-conformist churches. He has enthusiastically committed himself to the movement for Christian union. In speaking, his face and person glow with the magnetism which no reader of his address will fail to discern, even in the cold type. He is a winsome orator. No sooner had he gotten fairly into his speech than every listener knew the conference was to be a great occasion. It would be, we believe, a signal event for Disciples and Baptists in this country to arrange for Mr. Ruth to make a speaking tour among our more open-minded churches in the interest of the unity which is steadily establishing itself between the two bodies. It is our hope to be able to present next week the address of our absent editor, delivered at the same conference.

By courtesy of your committee, I have to speak on "Christian Union Demanded by the World's Need" a subject as comprehensive as it is vital. "Christian Union" and the "World's Need" were united in the bonds of holy matrimony in the very inception of Christianity, and their divorce has been disastrous in the weakening of faith and in the slowness of world conquest. Concentration on the world's evangelism unites the churches and when the churches are one the world will believe. That is the moral of the epoch making missionary conference at Edinburgh. Christianity stands for a united character—a physical, mental, moral, spiritual, unity; for a United Church—a local, national, catholic unity; for a united world—a Christianized civilization, a universal brotherhood and earth-and-heaven, temporal-and-eternal unity!

Organic Union, Not Mystical Union.

The terms of my subject, determined for me, are as severely logical as they are cosmic and Christian—"Christian Union Demanded by the World's Need." It is organic union that is meant rather than mystical unity. It is the denominational dynamic without the denominational limitation. Fraternal fellowship may be an interdenominational necessity, federation of denominational forces an imperative need, but Christ's prayer will not be answered and the world's needs will not be adequately met apart from organic union. I do not know, no dictionary can elucidate and no man I have met can explain what is inorganic union. Fellowship itself must be organized. Federation cannot be an inorganic thing. Inorganic union is not only a contradiction in terms but an impossibility even in our illogical life. The world has many needs and the churches have many resources; and the conception of union in the mind of Christ when he prayed for his disciples and for the world "that they all may be one—that the world may believe" and in the expositions of the apostles implies diversities of gifts and diversities of operation, but Christ's body was never meant to be inorganic. It is organic union that is demanded by the world's need.

Denominational Necessity Now Outgrown.

Denominational Christianity fails to meet the needs of the world because the church and the world have outgrown denominational necessity just as the body has outgrown certain of the animal necessities in the process of evolution. The consummation and climax of Christian evolution will be wanting, the Kingdom of God will be delayed and the travail of Christ's soul prolonged until the churches cease to be competitive and become simply Christian. I am not denying that denominations have been necessary; they have emphasized certain aspects of truth apt to be overlooked, and the truths for which they pleaded will abide, but it is the divine mission of denominations to labor for their own extinction. The denomination that is divinely successful will cease to be; for the truths to which it witnessed will have won universal recognition. And I pray that the Baptist denomination to which I belong may be divinely successful.

Christian union is demanded by denominational needs for the diversities between branches of the same denomination are sometimes so acute that local pulpits are rival platforms and the only hope of full-orbed vision is in the larger unity. I am a Baptist and regard infant baptism as a prolific source of evil, but I have come to believe that it is not a hundredth part the evil that disunion is, either in its effect upon Christian character or upon the church in its world service. I would do little to make a man a Baptist, but I would do a great deal to make him a Christian and I should know that, immediately, whatever the denominationalists would do with him, he would become a member of the invisible Church of Christ and that he would give his personal experience some public expression. And the whole world is waiting for denominational aggression to make way for the consuming passion of personal and universal evangelism. The world is waiting for a church that is simply Christian.

A Hymn with an Untruth in It.

Denominationalism is being weighed in the balances and found wanting. As I shall show you presently the world is making up its mind to be Christian without it. There are times when we sing, as with the noise of brazen trumpets,

> "We are not divided, all one body we—
> One in hope and doctrine, one in charity."

But we know what a big lie it is, what a travesty of the real situation, what an affront against high heaven! We do not deceive ourselves and the world holds us in derision.

There is a great deal that is discreditable and very little that is divine about our divisions, and when we attempt to meet the world's needs we begin to realize the utter iniquity of charging God with our party prejudices. But the marvelous development of foreign missions will not allow us to see in the decline of denominationalism any argument for despair. World evangelism, partial as it is, proclaims with prophetic authority that the church of the future will be established not by law, nor by creed. Christianity cannot be politically planned. Eternal issues do not depend on any impossible intellectual agreement. Law has failed to win the world. So has creed. Hierarchies and orthodoxies are time-born, colored by circumstances, shaped by contingency, reflecting a thousand irrelevancies. We are returning to what Matthew Arnold called "the sweet reasonableness of Jesus," to the catholic church, established by love, the simple comprehensive Church of Christ—not necessarily to the church that bears that name, but to the church that makes much less of the label and much more of the life—that knows no limits save those of spiritual affinity and sympathy and no creedal and ceremonial tests but the faith that is fidelity, moral temper, spiritual affection, the filial spirit and the spirit of service.

The Best Denomination in the World.

Christian Union is demanded by the world of Christian character. Character-creating forces are not denominational. Sainsthip is not sectarian. I belong to what I believe to be the best denomination in the world, but Baptists have no monopoly of the best. Indeed the best thing about the denomination is the catholicity and world-consciousness into which it is merging. That is its man making power. If I were to be shut up within Baptist barriers, having fellowship only with Baptist brethren, knowing only Baptist beatitudes, I should be a bigot and no man. Life here would be a limited and a loveless thing. There would be no chance for character completion. And a Baptist heaven would be no heaven to me. And if this is to be said about the best denomination what is to be said about the worst? The fact is that even in denominational life the essential things are undenominational. Baptists have no monopoly of loyalty, Congregationalists of liberty, Methodists of passion, Anglicans of reverence, or Romans of devotion. These are the elements of character, and in every man's nature there is an eclectic insistence on Christian Union.

Saintship not Sectarian.

The saints of all the sects have their unsectarian ministry. Spurgeon was infinitely bigger than Baptist, Dale was not merely a Congregational theologian, John Wesley merely a Wesleyan, Robertson of Brighton an exclusively Angelican and Thomas a Kempis only a Romanist. And as with virtue so with Truth; and Truth in all its domains. The stars are not sectarian. Neither are flowers. Gravitation, electricity, light, radium—these are undenominational. And as with science, so with history, art and literature. Simply in the interests of character, of full orbed faith and rounded life, it is time that the churches were at least as wise as the British Association. Our divisions, our artificial barriers, our sectarian shibboleths are all condemned by the very gospel we preach,—the common Fatherhood of God, the common Brotherhood of Man, the common consciousness of sin, the common Saviorhood of Christ, the common privilege of prayer and the common sanctity of life. Moreover, they are condemned as unscientific by the very constitution of scientific societies, and unbusinesslike by every successful commercial concern. Christian Union is demanded by the world of personal character. From the needs of the individual we pass to the needs of the community and I say that Christian Union in Country Places.

Christian Union is demanded by the world of rural religion. I think of my native village nestling in a lovely Devon valley with its Anglican church large enough to accommodate all the villagers, and of its two rival Methodist chapels, either of which is large enough for all the nonconformist worshipers of the neighborhood; and this is Paradise compared with some other little villages where Congregationalists, Baptists and various Methodists aid in effectively advertising the unbusinesslike methods of the modern church in building the Kingdom of God. I have a letter from a minister in a small cuntry town where there are only nine hundred nonconformists with seven sanctuaries and four nonconformist ministers. And these intances could be multiplied indefinitely. Christian Union is demanded by the hamlets, villages and small towns of our land. If Christ's prayer were answered the village would believe. The same thing applies to larger towns and cities with even greater force.

Christian Union is demanded by the world of civic religion where denominationalism is obviously on the wane and the sin of schism has well-nigh slain the effective ministry of the church. The notorious report of the Liverpool Free Church Commission of inquiry into the religious condition of the city, in its exposure of sectarian aggression, of waste of redemptive forces through lack of responsible cohesion, of useless but exceedingly expensive machinery and ministry—is unwittingly the most unanswerable demand for Christian Union with which I am acquainted from the standpoint of the clament needs of a great city. And Liverpool conditions are not unique.

Absurdity of Division in City.

I arrive at Southampton from South Africa—where the failure of denominationalism is exhibited on a vast scale—and I stand in the High Street, at the corner of Ogle Road. On the other side of the street is a large Congregational church. I stand outside the Church of Christ. Almost next door is the Philharmonic Hall, where a company of Baptists are worshipping on Sundays and I am within full view of Portland Baptist chapel. I ask an intelligent man in the street in what way the Baptists in the Philharmonic Hall differ from the Baptists in Portland Chapel and, he tells me there is no difference. I ask if both congregations could worship in one building and he replies, "yes." I ask in what way these Baptists differ from the Church of Christ. He replies that so far as he can understand there is no difference. I ask if the three congregations could worship in one building and he replies, "Certainly." I ask what it is that distinguishes these churches from the other churches in the community and he replies, "Only the question of baptism." I ask if these three churches are in any other respect like unto the Congregational church over the way and he replies. "Precisely alike in government and doctrine, in everything save baptism so far as I can understand." I ask if there would be room in that great building for the four congregations and he replies, "Quite." I ask him why they do not unite and leave the method of baptism to the individual conscience and he replies, "Cussedness." And without agreeing or disagreeing with his diagnosis, I reflect on the waste of homiletic genius and of more costly material, on the Savior's prayer for Christian Union and the needs of the town and the world. And I turn to Dr. Horton's little book on "The Reunion of English —"Of the four Episcopal churches and the Christendom" and read of Hampstead proper four Nonconformist churches were in cordial coöperation those eight congregations of Christian people could thoroughly deal with the religious needs of the district. They could make sure that every house was periodically visited and every soul personally confronted with the claims of Christ . . . and the lamentable reproach might be rolled away that many persons live for years in the district and find no one who cares for their souls." And "not only would the aggressive work within the district become practicable but forces would be liberated which might cope with the social evils of London and with the vast problem of missions to the heathen." So Christian Union is demanded by the conditions of city life. And the village and city provide parables of the national need. If our country is to be saved, if righteousness is to reign, if truth is to triumph, if love is to lighten all life, the churches must unite. Pariotism insists on it, and common Christianity demands it.

Edinburgh Conference Lessons.

Christian Union is demanded by the world's need. And the Edinburgh Conference has emphasized in striking fashion the needs of the whole world anticipated by our Savior's prayer "That they may all be one . . . that the world may believe," and has, moreover, demonstrated the possibility and practicability of Christian Union. And after all, the churches exist for world evangelization and conquest. That is the great commission. That is the primary duty. If you ask what it is that God most wants, and what it is the world most needs, and find the answer in Christ's revelation of God's eternal longing for the sons of men, and in his revelation of man's power of spiritual relationship, God's eternal passion and man's eternal need, and realize that the churches are called to carry on the great business of universal redemption, it is obvious that nothing matters quite so much as the most effective use of all our resources in response to the great commission. And when we are told as we have been recently by missionary experts, by men on the field, as the result of statesmanlike enquiry and patient shifting of evidence given by all missionary societies, that without the addition of a single missionary, the coöperation of Christian forces would more than double our effectiveness, we need ask for no more sweeping condemnation of denominational divisions and no more complete recognition of the worker for Church Union as a world evangelist. Oh, these divisions! What can Christ think of them all in the light of God's eternal sacrifice and the world's heart-breaking needs? Do they not add age-long agony to his continued intercession "That they all may be one . . . that the world may believe?" The task Christ imposes upon all his disciples is so gigantic and so urgent that all waste of power is wicked. There are a thousand million people waiting to be evangelized and Christianized—a thousand million!—waiting with open minds and plastic natures in this day of unparalleled opportunity for the character-creating word of grace, and if we unmindful of the universal, redemptive passion of our Lord, obsessed by denominational pride—if we fail Christ and the world in this day, the opportunity will pass, the plastic nature of the wakening world will be set by other forces and Christ will be robbed of his glory and the people of their natural Lord.

World Does Not Want Desominations.

Besides, it is proven up to the hilt that the world neither needs nor wants our denominational divisions. Christendom has outgrown them, and the non-Christian world happily cannot understand them. The world needs the essential things that all denominations have in common, and only the essential, and not the distinctively denominational things can satisfy the world's essential needs. English and American divisions may have some historic value but our common Christianity has a longer and a richer history and a universal and eternal value, and in various parts of the mission field, enlightened Christian natives are conspiring to answer our Savior's prayer. By the great mercy of God many of our desominational names cannot be translated into some languages, and denominational ideas are being obliterated in spite of us. Rev. E. W. Burt—an English Baptist missionary—says "The best and most intelligent Chinese leaders are ahead of the average missionary in desiring one Church of Christ in China." Dr. J. C. Garrett, an American Presbyterian, says "If the missionaries fail to come up to the mark, I believe the Chinese will speak out for Unions with no uncertain sound" and Bishop Roots declares "If the missionaries cannot supply this demand for leadership in the practical development of Christian unity among the Chinese Christians, that leadership will undoubtedly arise outside the ranks of the missionaries and perhaps even outside the ranks of the duly authorized ministers of the Christian church in China."

Missions Fettered by Denominationalism.

The fact is that in the mission field missionaries have not the free hand that is necessary to build up a purely Christian church. They are fettered by the denominational societies they represent. They are in bondage to Home Committees and Home Committees are too often swayed by sectarian rather than by catholic considerations. Christian abandon to the passion for the Kingdom of God would mean the withdrawal of denominational agents from certain centers. Comity would mean coöperation. Cooperation would mean liberation. Delimitation of territory would mean more land possessed, more men made, more triumphs for truth and more joy for God. Let it be understood that the propagation in foreign lands of denominational prejudices, which we are fast outgrowing here is something to be utterly condemned. Our missionary societies must not be allowed to do in the foreign field, what no society would dare to do in the home land. Missionaries must be free, free to unite, with less reference to home directors and more abandon to heaven's purposes revealed in the sacred scriptures and written in the Bible of the world's needs. Only the United Church can capture the world for Christ, fulfilling all that is good in other religions, banishing all that is bad, uniting the whole world in the radiant righteousness of the one eternal God.

The world needs essential Christianity. Essential Christianity unites. The essential thing is what Christ wants. Christ wants Christians to be one that the world may be won. Let no man, no church, no society attempt to divide Christ or put him to open shame. Let every Christian, every church, every society unite to save the world. "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life." He is the propitiation for our sin but not for ours only, but for the sin of the whole world.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, JULY 31.

Theme for the Day.—The Great Themes of the Faith.

Scripture.—In whom we have redemtption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sin.s—Eph. 1:7.

And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All authority in heaven and earth is given unto me. Go ye therefore and make disciples of all the nations.—Matt. 28:18, 19

Perhaps the Christian volume is the theme,—
How guiltless blood for guilty man was shed;
How He, who bore in heaven the second name,
Had not on earth whereon to lay his head:
How his first followers and servant sped;
The precepts sage they wrote to many a land:
How he, who lone on Patmos banished,
Saw in the sun a mighty angel stand,
And heard great Bab'lon's doom pronounced by heaven's command.
—Robert Burns ("The Cotter's Saturday Night").

Prayer.—Our Father, from whom we receive all the gifts of life, accept, we pray Thee, the gratitude of souls that have known the consolations of Thy grace and the promises of the fulness of life. We bring our lives to Thee today for fresh consecration to the high ends of the kingdom of God. We would enter upon the work and worship of this week with the sense of Thy companionship, and without fear or distrust. Grant us, we beseech Thee, the peace which comes only to those who have laid hold upon the great truths of our holy faith, and made them their own. And in the possession of these truths may our lives grow richer until the end of the days. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

MONDAY, AUGUST 1.

Theme for the Day.—Sweetheart and Wife.

Scripture.—And Jacob loved Rachel; and said, I will serve thee seven years for Rachel, thy younger daughter.—Gen. 29:18.

Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall become one flesh.—Gen. 2:24.

Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest, all the days of thy life.—Eccl. 9:9.

Behold her there,
As I beheld her ere she knew my heart,
My first, last love; the idol of my youth,
The darling of my manhood, and, alas!
Now the most blessed memory of mine age.
—Alfred Tennyson ("The Gardener's Daughter.")

Prayer.—Holy Father, Thou hast given us all that makes life sweet and inspiring. We thank Thee for life and health, and for the proper vocations to which we have been called. But with these other blessings we also rank the bestowal of those whose love has been our chief aid in the work of the years, and whose inspiration has made possible the best things we have been able to do. Make us in some degree worthy of these good companionships, and may we never forget that we owe to those who have trusted us enough to link their lives with ours in the holiest of ties. Bless our efforts to make life beautiful for their sakes, by the blessing of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 2.

Theme for the Day.—The Nation's Hope.

Scripture.—And I will make of thee a nation greater and mightier.—Num. 14:12.

Blessed is the nation whose God is Jehovah.—Psa. 33:12.

Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!

Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea!
Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee,
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee—are all with thee!
—Longfellow ("The Building of the Ship.")

Prayer.—God of our land, and keeper of our destinies, we adore Thee for the place in which Thou hast set us, for the institutions which we enjoy, and for the national ideals and hopes which are ours. We praise Thee for the high purposes that have filled the minds of the men who have wrought at the tasks of the state. Give us ever such leaders as those whose names we most cherish in our history. May the Bible be the rock on which the Republic rests, and the principles of the gospel the guiding stars of its course through future years. We ask in the divine name. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 3.

Theme for the Day.—The True Alms.

Scripture.—But the righteous sheweth mercy, and giveth.—Psa. 37:21.

Then Peter said, silver and gold have I none; but such as I have, give I unto thee.—Acts 3:6.

There is no true alms which the hand can hold;
He gives nothing but worthless gold
Who gives from a sense of duty;
But he who gives but a slender mite,
And gives to that which is out of sight,
That thread of the all-sustaining Beauty
Which runs through all and doth all unite,—
The hand cannot clasp the whole of his alms,
The heart outstretches its eager palms,
For a god goes with it and makes it store
To the soul that was starving in darkness before.
—James Russell Lowell ("The Vision of Sir Launfal.")

Prayer.—Father of our souls, Thou God of mercy and of grace, our best blessings we acknowledge to be the fruits of our submission to Thee and the control of Thy most holy will. Out of the abundance of Thy nature Thou hast ever bestowed upon us the richest favors. Yet we know that what we most prize is not the gift, but the Giver. Beyond all that Thou dost bestow there is Thyself, whom most of all we need. May we also learn the secret of giving, so that our kindness to others may be no formal and calculated aims, but the real gift of personal interest and good will. We ask in the name of Thy great Gift to us. Amen.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 4.

Theme for the Day.—Morning, Noon and Evening.

Scripture.—Thou makest the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice.—Psa. 65:8.

Evening and morning and at noon will I pray.—Psa. 55:17.

The mountain that the morn doth kiss
Glad greets its shining neighbor;
Lord, heed the homage of our bliss,
The incense of our labor.
Sharp smites the sun like burning rain,
And field and flower languish;
Hear, Lord, the pleading of our pain,
The passion of our anguish.

Now the long shadows eastward creep,
The golden sun us setting;
Take, Lord, the worhsip of our sleep,
The praise of our forgetting.
—Richard Watson Gilder ("Morning, Noon and Evening.")

Prayer.—Gracious God, this day comes to us from Thee, with its mystery and its promise. We do not know what it may bring to us, but we know that in Thy companionship it can only mean good to us. May all of its hours be spent with Thee. We should like to grow into such intimacy with Thee that every act is worship, and all speech is prayer. May the morning, the noontime and the evening alike be spent in work and study and recreation which Thou canst approve, and may the night bring us peace. Amen.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 5.

Theme for the Day.—One Hour of Watching.

Scripture...And he cometh unto the disciples, and findeth them asleep, and saith unto Peter, What, could ye not watch with me one hour? Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation.—Matt. 26:40,41.

Could ye not watch with me one hour?
Deep pain was in Thy voice
That day. Jesus, have men still power
To grieve Thee, or rejoice?

Then is Thy joy this day fulfilled,
Christ of Gethsemane!
For everywhere hearts Thou hast stilled
Keep wakeful watch with Thee.
—Marianne Farningham ("WithoutCeasing.")

Prayer.—Good Master, Thou hast set us to the task of watching with Thee all the hours of life. We need to be mindful of ourselves at each moment, and Thou too art in need of that constancy of affection and devotion which alone can complete the fine service of loyalty from day to day. May no lethargy come over our souls as we tarry for Thy coming. May no selfish interests obscure the sense of our duty. And may we feel that Thou art still the Saviour of souls as in the past, and that our friendship with Thee is never dimmed by any evil way. We ask in the holy name. Amen.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 6.

Theme for the Day.—The Unseen Master.

Scripture.—Whom having not seen, ye love: in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing ye rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory; receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls.—I. Peter 1:8, 9.

Strong Son of God, immortal Love,
Whom we, that have not seen thy face,
By faith and faith alone embrace,
Believing where we cannot prove.
—Tennyson's ("In Memoriam.")

Prayer.—O Lord, we praise Thee for the love wherewith Thou hast loved us, even while we were yet sinners. In tender compassion Thou hast come forth to meet us, even a very long way, and hast welcomed us back to the Father's house, where there is bread enough and to spare. Help us to abide in faith, as seeing Him who is invisible, and to set our affection upon things that are eternal. We bring this week to its close with the remembrance of Thy mercy to us, and we ask that in the time to come Thou wilt still walk with us to the journey's end. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

A SERIAL STORY

Donald Graeme

CHAPTER XII.
A Friend's Privilege.

They sat in their cozy dressing-gowns, on low chairs, by the cheerful fire that Sarah, who dearly loved her young mistress, had lighted in Jeanie's bedroom, to keep out the frost, as she said. But perhaps she was aware, though she was only a maid-of-all-work, that there is nothing in the world more enjoyable to two young girl chums than an hour's chat by a warm fire in the bedroom, before they venture into the slippery cold always to be found between linen sheets on a frosty night.

They sat with their slippered feet against the low fender, their well brushed shining hair hanging over their shoulders. They both looked pensive. Jeanie thought that Elsie was sad because her pleasant visit was over and that she must return home to what appeared to be the most monotonous life a young girl can lead—constant attendance on an invalid mother. Elsie, on the contrary, knew that Jeanie's sad face, well as she loved her, was not owing to her own near departure, but because her mind was full of Donald's trouble.

"I don't know how to tell you how happy I have been with you all, Jeanie."

"You know, Elsie, it has been a great joy to me to have you, and I am sure all our folk feel that you will, from this time, be looked upon as a household friend as well as mine."

"I have every reason to be a friend to all. I never was so kindly treated anywhere, away from home."

"I am only sorry Elsie that we were able to do so little to make your visit pleasant We have been awfully dull lately. Indeed I think you ought to be glad to get away." Jeanie spoke wistfully.

The firelight danced fitfully all around them. It made queer shadows on the ceiling; it shot inquisitive glances towards the farthest corner of the room, where the snowy draped bed stood modestly waiting for its occupants. And it flung its fleeting radiance right into Jeanie's sad face as she spoke. Elsie caught the gleam of crystal on her friend's eyelashes. In a moment she was kneeling by her side.

"Jeanie, do you look on me as only a sunshine friend? Do you wish to shut me out of the dark places in your life? Is it not the privilege of a friend to share her friend's sorrow?"

The crystal drops rolled over and splashed on Elsie's hands. The ghost of a smile flitted over Jeanie's face.

"Donald has been telling you something, I see."

"Yes, Donald has been telling me something —He looks on me as a friend."

"What has he told you?"

"Everything."

"I wish I could be certain that I know what 'everything' is."

"I know what it is. Donald told me the truth."

"You seem to have great faith in him."

"I don't seem—I have great faith in him.

"What did he tell you, Elsie?"

"He told me about John M'Ketridge—(the beast). About his debts—about your getting the money for him—about his escape from the gambling den."

"How could Donald tell you all this?—Was he not ashamed of himself?"

"Ashamed? Yes, and better still, deeply sorry for his foolishness. Believe me Jeanie, we meet with young fellows every day, who are doing as Donald did, and they are neither ashamed nor sorry about it. Lots of them pass off as fine fellows."

"I know Elsie. Especially since the craze for bridge has taken hold of those who call themselves the nobility. Multitudes of men and women have ceased to be ashamed of gambling. But Donald was brought up in a home where God's word has been read twice daily. No matter what else might have to wait, father never neglected worship. Donald has no excuse."

"Except that he's only a man and liable to make mistakes."

"I am glad you are his friend too Elsie. You are stanch. Did Donald tell you anything more?"

"Yes, Donald told me all. Is it possible Jeanie that you ever feared that he was guilty of forgery?"

"Everything looked black against him?"

"Many a time other crimes have looked black against innocent men. Donald is too brave a man to stoop to lying."

"From the bottom of my heart Elsie, I thank you for your faith in him. For myself, I don't know what to think. At first I had no doubt but he was guilty. But since I have seen the forged cheque, I have some doubts in his favor. I have told father so but he remains obdurate. I believe he thought I was only trying to screen Donald."

"And you weren't pretending? You really thought the writing was not Donald's."

"I thought the signature or endorsement rather, 'Richard Smith,' had some letters formed very like ones I had seen somewhere before. It is a gleam of hope for Donald, Elsie, that is all."

"Oh the truth will come out, it will come out," she said fervently.

"You make me feel hopeful Elsie."

"Why shouldn't I? I believe him innocent."

"There are others who have known him from childhood, not so ready to believe in him."

"I know Jeanie. I think he feels Mr. Sinclair's want of faith in him most of all."

"So do I. Even though I have doubted Donald myself, I hated the idea of him doubting him. I thought Mr. Sinclair was not like other men. Now I see he is just like the rest. He has kept away from us ever since this shadow fell on Donald."

"I think you wrong Mr. Sinclair, Jeanie." Elsie gazed into the fire as she spoke, a very knowing smile on her face.

"How so? He was with us nearly every day before this happened. Now he calls with father in the office. Have you not noticed at the choir practices too, he just calls and runs away? He used to stay till the very close and"—she paused, Elsie took up the sentence.

"And then usually walked home with the organist" a soft colour suffused Jeanie's cheeks, not all due to the firelight.

"Oh of course it's no matter," she said, airily. "It can make no difference now to Donald or any of us. But one hates to find one's idols having feet of clay."

"Not so fast my dear Jeanie. I have a different theory concerning Mr. Sinclair's various absences. Has it never occurred to you that his altered bearing might be in consequence of that thing which is so often in evidence in these parts nowadays. I mean Archie Monteith's motor car?" Jeanie was most becomingly animated in an instant. At the same time it was quite correct of her to exclaim in astonishment—

"Nonsense Elsie, Mr. Sinclair never thought of such a thing?"

"Didn't he sly pussie? And I must say, though perhaps I shouldn't say it—that, if I had to weigh the two things by their owners, the manse would weigh heavier than the motor car." At this point they both thought it was time to go to bed. And Jeanie slept better that night than she had hoped she would.

"Archie Monteith had been growing every day, for months past, in favor with his uncle David. On that same night the two men sat late talking at first, after the young ladies retired, about business matters. When Sarah left the kitchen for the night and passed heavenwards to her garret room, Mr. Graeme invited his nephew down to the shining kitchen for a comfortable bit draw of the pipe. Mr. Graeme added a shovelful of coal to the fire. Then they drew in their chairs and set themselves down to whiffing in silence for awhile as is the manner of lovers of the weed. When Mr. Graeme's first pipe was empty he spoke—

"Archie, ye seem to be sae much ane o' us now, that I hae been thinkin' lately I would like tae tell ye aboat a thing that's sair bother tae me—an' tae ilka ane o' us, I may add."

"I am very sorry uncle David if you have serious cause of annoyance. I am sure I do not need to tell you that anything I may be able to do or say to help you, will be only a pleasure to me."

"Ye'll no find much pleasure in what I'm gaun to tell. As for help I see nae chance o' that." He paused, gazing stolidly into the fire. Archie's heart beat uncomfortably loud but he managed to keep a steady voice.

"What troubles you uncle, is very likely to trouble me also. But I would rather know at once what is wrong."

"A forger has been at work in my office, Archie—what think ye o' that?" Archie went pale to the very lips, but his back was toward the light.

"Do I hear you aright, Uncle David? It seems impossible."

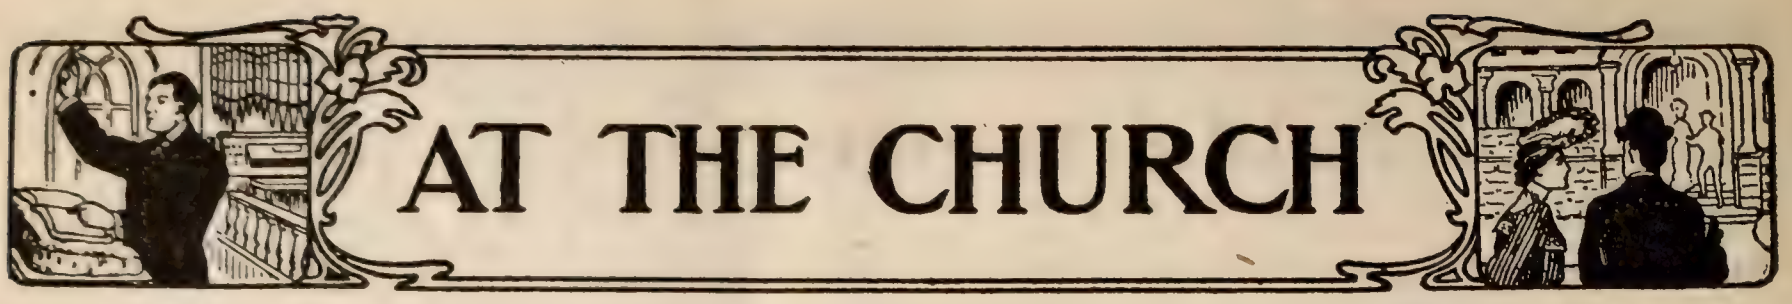
"Nae wonder yer shocked Archie, tae think o' such a stain on my honorable hoose."

"It is horrible—Have you any idea who may have done it?"

"My office is open only to my son Donald and to Jamie Douglas—the crime lies between them." Archie drew a deep sigh.

"Poor James—I am very sorry for him. I always thought him a straight fellow. Does he live fast, do you think uncle? so many young men go abetting nowadays."

"I would as soon think of accusing you of doing it Archie. Jamie nae mair forged the cheque than I did."



"What are you saying, Uncle David? If you clear James Douglas, what does it mean?" "It means that I must suspect my own son o' being a villain." Archie jumped to his feet in uncontrollable distress.

"Are you mad sir, Donald never did this thing, never. It is inhuman of you, Uncle David, to lay the blame of this fraud on your own son, while you know that a paid servant has had equal opportunity of doing the deed as he had."

"Sit down Archie and look at things calmly. As for suspecting Jamie Douglas, it is out o' the question. He has been in my hoose, boy an' man fully twelve years. During a' that time he has behaved in a way that places him aboov suspicion."

Teachings in Perea*

One of the most important and eventful periods in the ministry of our Lord was that which associates itself with the district of Perea on the east side of the Jordan. Jesus had completed his work in Galilee, and felt that the time had come for him to bend his steps toward Jerusalem for the great climax of his career. The long task of selecting and training the Twelve was over. The conversation at Caesarea Phillippi had assured him that whatever might be the limitations of view among the disciples, they at least knew enough to be trusted with the good tidings of the kingdom wherever they might go.

Moreover, the hospitality of the authorities both in Judea and Galilee was deepening, and Jesus knew that soon there would be a crisis which could not fail to bring him into open conflict with them. Regarding the issue of that conflict he was not in the least deceived. He had foreseen from the first how it would all eventuate. He had only wished for time enough to fill the Twelve with his ideals, and then he was ready for whatever might come. Now the time was at hand that he must meet the great issue of his life. That event must take place in the Holy City, the scene of so many prophetic testimonies and martyrdoms in the past.

The Perean Ministry.

When Jesus turned his face from Galilee he sent out the disciples into the districts to the south and east to announce his coming, and to preach as much as they could in a sort of practice campaign. He did not confine this commission to the Twelve, but included all the more intimate of his friends in the company, to the number of some seventy. Then he followed them at no great interval of time, and thus made all possible use of the publicity which such a campaign would involve. He was already a familiar figure in the little land of Palestine. The last events of his public work must have greatly increased the popular knowledge of the Man of Nazareth.

Perhaps in the Third Gospel we have the most consecutive and adequate account of the transactions in Perea. The entire section of Luke from Chapter 11 to Chapter 18 seems to relate to this part of our Lord's career. It includes some of the most precious sections of his teaching. It is difficult to make out the precise order of events, to be sure. The evangelist show themselves largely indifferent to matters of time and place. We shall never be able to construct a chronology or geography of Jesus' life that will be quite satisfactory. We only need to note the general sequence of events, and be grateful that they are as fully stated as they are.

*International Sunday School Lesson for August 7, 1910: "Jesus on the Way to Jerusalem."—Matt. 19:1, 2; 13-26. Golden Text, "Jesus said, Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of God."—Matt. 19:14. Memory Verses, 13-1g.

Jesus and the Children.

In our present study two events are mentioned, the beautiful story of Christ and the children, and the interview with the young man who inquired about the means of obtaining eternal life. Between the two there falls the account of the controversy with the Jews over the matter of divorce, and Jesus' impressive affirmation of the inviolability of the marriage tie. This is not included in our lesson, but needs to be studied as an important illustration of Jesus' method of teaching, and of the content of his message. Moreover, the comparison of this passage in the First Gospel with its parallel in Mark shows that the latter, which was no doubt the earlier and more authentic account of the conversation, makes no exception to the universal and completely binding character of marriage. (cf. Mk. 10:1-12.)

The story of Jesus and the little children never loses its charm. Some of the women of the region brought their young children to the Master that he might bless them. The belief that the touch of a great or a holy man was effectual either in curing illness or in giving promise of long life and success was almost universal, and still prevails in many parts of the world. It was natural that these women of Perea should wish for their children the blessing of the man whose works had been so widely reported through the land.

The Women of Perea.

The disciples were not pleased by this act. They had the idea that the Master was quite too busy in his dealings with people of importance, the well-to-do and official sort, to give time to women who wanted such common-place and unnecessary services at his hands. So they did all they could to prevent the mothers and children from approaching. They were probably in no pleasant mood when the women tried to get to the Lord. But he was of another mind. With the social nature of a good friend of all, and with that love of children which is inherent in all right-minded people, he insisted that the mothers must not be turned away, but allowed to bring their little ones to him. Then as he saw them, and took them to his own arms, he said that these were just the kind of simple, trusting, obedient lives he wanted for the new society he was bringing into being.

The Rich Youth.

The incident of the rich young man who came to speak with Jesus still further illustrates the tendency of the First Gospel to tone down the difficult sayings of the earlier record. In the account in Mark (10:8) Jesus responds to the inquiry, Good Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? with the words, Why callest thou me good? One there is who is good, God. In the First Gospel this is changed to words which omit Jesus' frank limitation of goodness to God, and the application of the term is only to the quality that shall insure the young man the coveted blessing.

To the young man who asked the most important question of his life, Jesus returned the simple answer that there was no need of any new truth for him. if he kept the commandments he would be sure of the salvation he desired. God has never left men without sufficient light to enable them to walk with some measure of assurance. If the youth wanted a new commandment given for his special benefit, he was disappointed. Jesus always gave men to understand that the faithful compliance with the laws they had was better than the craving for some new precept. And he assured the Jews that the Scriptures of the Old Testament were the records in which they rightly understood they had the promise of eternal life.

Keeping the Commandments.

When the young man, unwilling perhaps to accept so brief and obvious an answer as final, demanded which of the commandments he must keep, Jesus named over five, evidently not to dignify them above the rest of the decalogue, but to show that such things as they contained were the essence of the higher life. Then he added a commandment to the list, which though it was not a part of the Old Testament law in the form in which he gave it, was the disclosure of the spirit of the entire ancient covenant, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. This, together with the command to love God, Jesus on another occasion declared to be the summing up of the entire law.

But the young man responded that he had made the keeping of these commandments the rule of his life. This was no boast, but might have been the simple truth regarding the lives of many Jews of that age. Then Jesus subjected him to the crucial test of his life. He told him that the means of making his salvation assured was to dispose of his goods and give the money to the poor. Jesus did not state this as a universal rule, but as a test, to which many men of this generation would find it hard to submit. The youth could not, at least at that time, summon his resolution to do as Jesus said. But one always has the hope that upon reflection he made the great surrender.

The Fear of Poverty.

That led the Lord to speak of the danger of fixing affection upon money and the good things it brings. No truth he ever uttered is more in need of enforcement than this. In our own age more men are losing their lives for money than for all other causes combined. And when one speaks of lives lost, he does not mean the life of the body, but the losing of the divine chance of living in the realm of real and satisfying purposes and ideals. There are many men whom one meets daily who are already dead to every finer impulse, every nobler purpose in life, and money, its getting and its spending, forms the total horizon of their lives. Without the slightest exaggeration Jesus could say that such men could no more enter the kingdom of God than a camel could pass through the eye of a needle. The passion for money is the insanity of our generation. Men have gotten actually afraid to be poor. And the fine virtues that Jesus, who was always poor, loved and commended, are being forgotten in the agonizing struggle to get money. We need to study again the life of Him who had not where to lay his head, and of the choice and elect souls who have walked nearest to him in the holy way.

Church Life

—Mr. and Mrs. Charles Clayton Morrison will sail from Glasgow on the good ship "Frunesia" of the Anchor line July 30.

—Many expressions of appreciation have been received concerning the recent editorial, "Somewhere," which was written by Dr. Herbert L. Willett.

—Upon reading Mr. Hunter's objection to the "Membership in the Congregation" plan described in a recent number of the Century, Mr. Ames immediately wrote a "rejoinder" which we publish this week.

—Early in August we shall publish a "religious educational" number, which will contain discussions and suggestions that will be intended to help pastors and teachers who are now planning work for the coming year.

—The address by Dr. Ruth, delivered at the Anglo-American Conference on Christian Union, will, we believe, be enjoyed by every reader of the Christian Century. Next week we shall publish the address delivered by our absent editor.

—The national convention is appearing above the horizon of our consciousness. It promises to be one of unusual interest and of large attendance. Topeka offers fine facilities for the convention, and questions of greatest importance are to be presented to the body of Disciples gathered there.

Grant K. Lewis addressed a meeting of the brotherhood of the church at Muncie, Ind., July 12.

J. J. Morgan, pastor of the church at Johnstown, Pa., will spend the month of August in Louisville, Ky.

F. D. Ferrall, who is just closing a successful pastorate at Bloomfield, Iowa, supplied the pulpit at Sioux City, Iowa, July 17.

J. J. Cole, after a few months' service as pastor of the First Church, LaPorte, Ind., has resigned and will close his work in a short time.

The total receipts of the Foreign Society for nine and one-half months amount to $252,060, a gain of $38,567.

The First Sunday school, Akron, Ohio, sends $642.50. The total amount from that school this year is $600.

J. A. Spencer, pastor of the church at Bloomfield, Ind., is in a short meeting at Mineral City, four miles from Bloomfield.

During the last two weeks there have been ten additions to the ackson Boulevard Church, Chicago, where Austin Hunter ministers.

There is a marked increase in the attend- of the Sunday school at Augusta, Ill., despite the warm weather. Edwin T. Cornelius is pastor.

The First Church, South Bend, Ind., is making some changes in the arrangements of their building during the summer, besides redecorating.

George W. Muckley, the statesmanlike secretary of the Church Extension Society, addressed the members of the church at Quincy, Ill., July 10.

R. W. Page has been called to the pastorate of the First Church, Lebanon, Ind., and will enter upon his duties there the first of September.

Charles E. McVay, Hardy, Neb., will have charge of the music in a camp meeting at Truscott, Texas, beginning August 12. W. S. Haynes is evangelist.

F. E. Meigs is recovering from his late illness. He is at the Battle Creek sanitarium, Battle Creek, Mich. He hopes to return to Nankin, China, soon.

The Central Sunday school, Lebanon, Ind., sends an offering of $300 for foreign missions. This is their best record. L. E. Brown is the pastor.

The Children's Day offering of the Sunday-school at Hagerstown, Md., was $200. That church and school hope to reach the living link column this year.

"We are planning for 10,000 delegates," is the word of Charles A. Finch, secretary of the committee in preparation for the entertainment of the national convention in Topeka.

The first Church, Paducah, Ky., including their Sunday school offering, has given $450, and will send $150 more, making the full $600 before September 30. W. A. Fite is the wide-awake minister.

The Sunday school at Hopkinsville, Ky., N. L. Hopper, superintendent, made a children's day offering of $461.27. This is one of the best missionary Sunday schools in the brotherhood.

A Des Moines paper announces that H. O. Breeden has accepted the pastorate of the West Side Christian Church, San Francisco, and already entered upon his work with the congregation.

In the church at Akron, Ohio, Frank M. Root, the superintendent of the Sunday school, occupied the pulpit Sunday morning, June 12, giving a report of the World's Sunday School Convention.

S. M. Bernard, pastor at Madisonville, Ky., and Miss Laura S. Hull of Boulder, Colo., were married in the Broadway Church, Denver, July 14, by Dr. B. B. Tyler, pastor of the Broadway Church.

Allen T. Shaw writes that the superintendent of the city schools at Spencer, Ind., made the good confession July 10, his wife uniting by letter. Mr. Shaw will be absent from the church on his vacation during August.

At Sullivan, Ill., where J. W. Walters ministers, there were 239 in the Sunday school July 3, with an offering of $22.78. The prayer meetings have an attendance about twice that of a year ago. The present active membership of the church is 455.

S. D. Dutcher, pastor at Terre Haute, Ind., was given large attention by the local papers of July 11 because of a "scathing arraignment of the brazen wickedness running rife in the city," made in his sermon of the previous day.

H. J. Loken, pastor at Berkeley, Cal., has already returned to his work from a month's vacation.

Frank S. Ford, pastor First Church, San Francisco, is spending his vacation at Long Beach, Cal.

The church at DeLand, Fla., is in need of a good pastor. They have a good modern parsonage and will pay $900 per year.

L. H. Otto, pastor First Church, Ottumwa, Ia., has accepted a call to the First Church, Princeton, Mo., where he held his first charge as pastor. He will begin work on his new field September 1.

D. S. Stewart, Deland, Fla., is to return to northern California, where he will serve as evangelist under the State Board. He has just closed a good meeting at LeLand, in which all congregations of the city united.

William M. Mayfield, pastor of the church at Butler, Mo., on July 12, was united in marriage with Miss Jennie Rebecca Allen of Ontario, Kans. The Christian Century extends congratulations.

A new $10,000 pipe organ has just been installed in the First Church, Topeka, Kansas. This is said to be the largest pipe organ in the state, except the one in the auditorium where the national convention will be held next fall.

The movement toward reuniting the congregations of the First and the Central churches of Joplin, Mo., seems to be moving encouragingly, and it is hoped that by autumn the two churches will be together again. This will give them a membership of more than 1,000.

R. L. Mobley writes from Jackson, Miss., of the prosperous condition of the work in the capital city and throughout the state. At Jackson there has been an average of one addition to the church for each Sunday since the present pastor took charge of the work.

Rev. J. P. Burling, pastor of the Greenwood Congregational church recently gave a Sunday evening address in the Central Christian Church, Des Moines, on "The Origin and growth of the Congregational movement." The address was under the auspices of the young people's socity of the Central Church.

S. G. Fisher who is just closing a successful pastorate at Walla Walla, Wash., will spend the month of August in Missouri and Illinois.

There have been twenty-three additions to the church at Minerva, Ohio, during the past two months, at regular services. E. N. Duty is pastor. The church is beginning to campaign for new Sunday-school rooms.

The church at Fulton, Mo., has announced that they have on hand the funds necessary for the erection of their new building, which is to cost from $35,000 to $40,000. The church will be built upon the site of the present church. It will be entirely of stone and will be completed some time next summer.

The church at Elwood, Ind., recently held a service for the old people of the community. Rev. Mr. Blount of Indianapolis, who is 85 years of age but a clear and forceful speaker, made the address of the day. A carnation was given to each aged person present at the service. Robert Sellers is pastor of the church.

The new church at McComb, Ill., will be dedicated September 4. J. H. Gilliland will preach the dedicatory sermon and following the dedication with a revival meeting. The new church has a pipe organ donated as a memorial to the wife of Mayor Keefer, and given by her daughters, Mrs. Ruth Keefer Stocker, of McComb, and Mrs. Lilly Chapin of Milwaukee.

Walter Scott Priest, pastor at Wichita, Kans., celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of his entrance into the Christian ministry Sunday, July 10. That ministry began at Ludlow, Ill., just after Mr. Priest's graduation from Bethany College. In the sermon of the day in which Mr. Priest reviewed these thirty years' ministry, he told his congregation that he had sought to emphasize the following points: (1) "Loyalty to the Word of God and the Authority of Jesus"; (2) "In Sermons the Spiritual Side of Our Holy Religion"; (3) "The Commissions of Our Lord to Evangelize the Whole World." On this last point we quote: "I have tried to make people understand that when they united with the church they were joining a great missionary society and that they will not be good Christians unless they enter heartily into the great business of the church, namely, the making known of Jesus to the ends of the earth." In these years Mr. Priest has preached 3,499 sermons, baptized 923 persons, received 1,046 by letter and statement, married 444 couples, conducted 514 funerals; additions received in evangelistic services other than above, 277 by baptism and 826 by letter and statement, making a grand total of 3,072 persons that have united with the churches during the ministry of Mr. Priest Such a ministry it is a priceless satisfaction for the minister of maturing years to review.

Pastor's monthly report showed twelve added at the Central Church, Pueblo, Colo., during June. The children's day offering was more than twice that of any previous year.

The annual county meeting of the Christian churches of Tipton County, Ind., will be held at Carr's Grove, near Hobb's Station, the first Sunday in August. James Burkhart of Frankfort, will be the speaker of the day. The brethren of Tipton and bordering counties are invited and urged to attend this meeting. Over two thousand people were in attendance last year.

W. B. Clemmer, Rockford, Ill., will, with his family, spend the month of August in Woodland Park, Colo., where Mr. Clemmer will hold a meeting and endeavor to organize a church. During his absence the Rockford pulpit will be supplied by Mr. W. B. Shimmer, another Sunday the men's brotherhood will have charge of the service, and the last Sunday there will be a service in charge of the ladies' society.

The First Church, Mexico, Mo., has called J. K. Shullenberger of Trenton to succeed W. M. White in the pastorate there, at a salary of $2,000 per year. The Mexico Church has come to have a large congregation and worship in a beautiful new building. It is counted one of the strongest churches of the state. We are not yet advised as to whether Mr. Shullenberger will accept.

W. P. Keeler of the Englewood Church, Chicago, Ill., says that all our churches in Chicago and vicinity are now being reached as never before in the interest of foreign missions through the impetus being given by the Laymen's Missionary Movement. E. M. Bowman is diligent in securing assistance from every congregation. He is a live wire on the missionary propaganda.

J. P. Myers of Shelbyville, Ind., will be available for meetings during the remainder of the summer and fall. Mr. Myers has had encouraging success in this field of work, and is now prepared to furnish a singer. He would hold some short meetings with pastors where the object would be to give impetus to the work of the church for the year. Until the first of September, Mr. Myers should be addressed at Wauseon, Ohio.

The Linden Ave. Church, South Bend, Ind., has just closed a meeting held by J. J. Cole of LaPorte. There were five additions. R. O. Wickham began his work as pastor of this this church three months ago, and has already brought the church to a degree of organization and efficiency that it has not known in recent years. The Sunday school is growing rapidly and the church is planning for a strong and aggressive campaign.

Grenville Snell, evangelist for the seventh district of Missouri, is in a meeting at Miama station with more than twenty additions to date. J. D. Condit, pastor at Bosworth, is at DeWitt, preaching in preparation for a meeting which Mr. Snell will hold there immediately after the close of the meeting at Miami. Since Mr. Snell began his work as evangelist of the district, January 8, 1910, there have been eighty accessions to the churches of the district.

The Brooks evangelistic team has just closed a "successful" campaign at Waco, Texas, in which there were 160 accessions to the church. Colby D. Hall, pastor of the Central Church, published in a local paper his high appreciation of their work, commending their naturalness, earnestness, unselfishness and consecration. The team is composed of W. T. Brooks, Samuel Lewis and J. W. Tapp. They will hold a meeting with the Austin Church, Chicago, next November.

M. Lee Sorey of Dodge City, Kansas, says that church will give more for foreign missions this year than last, not withstanding that they have built two churches. It will be remembered that their new church burned down Christmas morning last. They forthwith went to work and have rebuilt a new house, costing $15,000. This was successfully dedicated July 10, all the indebtedness being provided for. M. Lee Sorey is a rising preacher and leader, and an indefatigable worker. He has made a most commendable record in that growing church.

L. E. McMurray, after eight months of work with the Vermont Ave. Church, Washington, D. C., closed his work the last of June, and is supplying for a few weeks the pulpit of the church at Anderson, Ind. At the close of Mr. McMurray's service the church gave him a hearty reception, expressing its appreciation of his work with them during the long illness of their pastor, F. D. Power. In this interim Mr. McMurray succeeded in keeping up all departments of the work in good condition, and there were several additions to the church. The Vermont Ave.

pulpit is being supplied during July and August by local and visiting ministers.

Alva W. Taylor takes up again this week the editorship of "Social Survey," which he was compelled to discontinue for a time during his attendance upon the Edinburgh Conference. For a part of the time while in Europe Mr. Taylor "tramped through Ireland" making many sociological observations of which he will tell our readers.

Dr. Herbert L. Willett and family are spending the summer at Pentwater, Michigan. Doctor Willett, George A. Campbell, J. C. Todd, and others are now in this retreat of growing interest to disciples. Many other men are but little to the south at Garrison Park. During the month of August the number who avail themselves of this fine fellowship wil be greatly enlarged.

C. L. Thurgood, who has been pastor of the Pride St. Church, Pittsburg, Pa., for eight years, has resigned to return to Australia, where he held a pastorate before coming to Pittsburg. Mr. and Mrs. Thurgood have done a notable work with thtir church in Pittsburg. Their devotion to the relief and comfort of the poor has won for them the title of "Angels to the Poor," while their efficiency in the work of the church has brought more than 1,000 members into its membership during their service. As an evidence of the church's appreciation of the work of this good man and his wife, they have given them $500 for the trip to Australia.

The churches of Pueblo, Colo., where J. E. Lynn ministers to the Christian church, are engaged in a fine plan for the summer Sunday evenings. Union meetings are held in a central park. The general theme of the sermons for July is "Universal Elements in Our Religion." The first sermon of the series is "The Universal Name: Father," by the pastor of the Congregational church. Second, "The Universal Dynamic: The Holy Spirit," by J. E. Lynn. Third, "The Universal Creed: Christ," by the pastor of the Presbyterian church. Fourth, "The Universal Aim: The Establishment of the Kingdom," by pastor of the Church of the Ascension. The general subject for August is "The Church and the Kingdom of God in Pueblo." The special subjects are: "The Church and the Home," "The Church and Education," "The Church and Public Conscience," "The Church and Civic Righteousness," and "The Church and the Rights and Duties of Society Toward Labor." This program commends itself to us as possessing definiteness of aim, timeliness, and educational possibilities.

Brotherhood Pictures at Topeka

The brotherhood of Disciples of Christ general officers are arranging with the various missionary societies to exhibit stereopticon views, illustrating the work of the various organizations, during the convention at Topeka. It is proposed to have picture shows in operation both day and night, using for that purpose one or more moving picture houses in the vicinity of the convention. At night the pictures will be thrown on canvas just outside the convention hall. The pictures have been prepared for exhibition without an enunciator, every picture shown containing the full name and other necessary information, so one can tell at a glance not only what it is, but what the connection is with our work. Several hundred slides of persons alone have been uniquely manufactured. Bulletin service announcing the general news of the convention will also be maintained at all hours.

E. E. Elliott.

Front Rank Statement

Up to July 15 but forty-five "Front Rank" certificates have been issued. The following shows the list of states in this great "Front Rank" campaign: Indiana, 10; Oregon, 7; Iowa, 5; Kentucky, 5; Colorado, 4; California, 4; Nebraska, 3; Illinois, 3; Ohio, 2; District of Columbia, 1; West Virginia, 1. Total, 45. The new "Front Rank" schools for this week are: Greeley, Colo.; Marshall, Ill.; Fresno (First), Calif.; Middletown, Ky. Kansas reports forty-two "Front Rank" schools but will not issue certificates until Topeka convention. What about our other good states that are not in line? We want every state in line before August 1. Send your applications in without further delay. We are prepared to send any number of certificates.

Bible School Secretary, A. C. M. S.

The Garden of Eden

Delegates to the convention in October may be surprised to learn that the glorious beauty of the Kansas valley, the great prairies, the gold shale of Trego county and the golden sands in the head waters of the rivers flowing from the Rockies, together with the four great forks of the Solomon river, have conspired to make the Sunflower state a rival of Asia for the honor of being the scene of the Garden of Eden.

As far as beauty of landscape, exquisite panorama of earth and sky and fruitage of soil and tree, there can be no question as to the present day Garden of Eden. But in 1855 the pioneers seriously disputed the location of the Garden of Eden as being on the Euphrates in Asia, contending that the geography of Kansas agreed with the description of Moses in Genesis 2:10. That river now bears the name of Kansas, and its four heads are Smoky Hill, Grand Saline, Solomon Fork and Republican Fork. The former was known to the antedeluvians as Pison and composed the whole region now known as southwestern Kansas, where, according to Moses, there is gold.

Here at the confluence of the Republican and Smoky Hill rivers, a point always important to explorers, the army, and the Indians, is the "Aldershot" of America. In 1852 the government established Fort Riley, which today is the largest military post in America. The government owns a stretch of land some thirty-one miles square, so diversified in topography that it affords ideal facilities for the training of the various branches of the service under widely different conditions. A recent law admits the militia of any state to the annual exercises upon the request of its government, the government bearing the cost of transportation and sustenance and allowing the officers and men during maneuvers the same pay as those of the regular army. The great schools for cavalry and artillery are located here, with accommodations for 20,000 men. Delegates to the convention can arrange side-trips to this greatest military post in America, where tradition has also located the Garden of Eden. The writer, in company with B. L. Smith of Salina and Z. E. Bates of Atchison, recently visited the post. We spent the afternoon in wandering through the beautiful streets and over the vast drill grounds until near the hour of the sun-set gun. The military bands in their daily concerts had filled our souls with that martial melody which takes the blood and carnage from the hot breath of war and lends fascination and heroism to the outward pomp and pageantry of its adornment. As the setting sun drew its flaming curtains across the west and mottled with shadow and sheen the Kansas river stretching like a ribbon of silver far into the darkening east, a crash of music announced the ceremony of lowering the flag was about to begin. We had been given seats on the veranda of the barracks of our friend the Major, who had been talking about everything except the army with a vivacity and flippancy that to the superficial observer might have indicated a character of little depth. But when at the boom of the sun-set gun the flag began to come down and the sweet strains of the "Star Spangled Banner" rolled over the hills and far down the valley of the Kaw, you should have seen him spring to his feet and salute the flag in company with the thousands of armed men drawn up across the parade grounds. Love of country is next to love of family and God and the respect taught in the army for the flag ought to rebuke our irreverence for the house of God and the banner of Bethlehem.

The Essential Significance of Graded Lessons

RULING PRINCIPLE

The new education puts the pupil at the center and requires the instruction to be adapted to his needs. The history of education shows that the pupil for a very long while was denied this central position. The question of interest belonged to the instructor, not to the instructed. But modern education entirely reverses this. The nature of the pupil, and the consequent needs of the pupil, receive first consideration. Modern psychology, particularly the study of the child-mind, has shifted the educational center from subjects to persons.

BEGINNERS

The series begins where the child's conscious thought always begins, with the parental idea, and presents God to the child-mind as the heavenly Father, and leads it to the conception of this divine fatherhood through the simple and familiar relations of the child to its earthly parents. The very reading of the topics which are the subjects of the lessons in the course for Beginners is like sweet and simple music, and to any heart capable of appreciating the simplicities of truth it will indicate how natural and simple religion is as belonging to the very nature of the soul, entering into its most germinal development and working itself out in all the processes of growth.

PRIMARY

In the Primary grade the same simple but great themes touched upon in the Beginners course are continued, but just sufficiently developed to correspond to the growing capabilities of the child's mind, including, but not going beyond the widening circle of the child's extending associations and experiences. Nothing is forced in upon the child that is unchildlike in character; truths which the child can comprehend and that have natural place in his life are presented and repeated with that reiteration which the child's mind requires, while the teacher is content to wait for the germination and silent growth of the simplest seeds of truth in the child's heart.

JUNIOR

In the Junior lessons the pulse of life begins to throb more strongly. The great subjects of religious thought begin to enter; the simple introduction to the great story of history begins; the wonderful stories of the Bible begin to exercise their fascination; duties growing out of natural relationships are recognized; the choice of good and evil, and the fateful results of such choices, are made to be seen and felt; and the thought of God's providence over individual life is given manifold illustration in the biblical stories. In the fourth year of the series a more careful study of the briefer of the four Gospels is entered upon, followed by a study of the most striking incidents described in the book of Acts, and closing with stories from that larger book of Acts, the lives of later Christian missionaries.

INTERMEDIATE

Here we find ourselves where adolescent life begins, when the child ceases and the man begins; when the stirrings of those ambitions which are to issue in great deeds begin to manifest themselves; when the sympathies and affections become more intense; when the great choices and decisions are made; when the heroic spirit becomes dominant and when ideals are set up; when the great temptations open their deadly assaults; when the reason begins to exercise itself: a period of strife, and tumult, and strain, of high resolving, of deadly peril, of glorious victory. To this fateful period our new series of lessons comes with definite and intelligent understanding. Christ forever knocks at the door of life in every stage, but more distinctly and strongly does he knock at the door of the heart of youth at this period than at any other time.

SENIOR

This is the period for constructive study. It is the altruistic period of life and its spirit is optimistic. The individual begins to define his relations to others and the duties growing out of those relations. The sense of obligation and responsibility grows, purpose becomes more definite and the formulation of a life program is undertaken. Consequently the steady aim of the study and instruction in this period is to help the pupil to find his place and work in the world.

NEW CONCEPTION

The new movement is the outgrowth of the larger conception of religious education. According to this new conception the factors entering into the process are much more varied than was formerly supposed. All truth belongs to religious education, from whatever source it may be derived. Moreover, the aim of all genuine education is the production of sound character, and all instruction must be directed to this purpose. Consequently into these new courses is to be introduced the study of great characters other than those included in the Scriptures. And the moral heroes of every generation will be summoned to illustrate and impress the great elements of noble character.

THE BIBLE

The Bible is used as the most valuable material in moral and religious instruction; and it is used with discrimination, with a clear understanding that we must select from it in the progressive education of the child such material as answers to the needs of the child at the various stages of his growth. The Bible is a great storehouse of spiritual food, but in its stores is food for the little child and the strong man. Henceforth we are to give to the child only that which belongs to the child, and to the man only what belongs to the man.

Religious Journalism

Influence of the Religious Journal in Shaping Public Opinion

The religious journal is the product of the interest of a particular group in the religious life. It is one of the earliest forms of group journalism, and is the predecessor of the trade journals and other publications devoted to specialized interests. At first it was hardly more than a personal message from a religious leader to his friends and followers. Small in size and limited in scope, it doubtless attempted to perform for the modern age what the apostolic letters did for the primitive churches. The editor was the oracle who spoke to his religious constituency, giving instruction, encouragement and warning to the churches of his particular faith and order.

As this form of public statement developed through growing appreciation of its value, and increasing ability and experience on the part of editors, there were gradually added the pages devoted to more or less general expression of the group interests, communications and contributions. Departments were added and, perhaps, last of all in the formal development of the religious journal, denominational news was made a distinctive feature. But fundamentally through all this evolution the original idea has not been forgotten, that the denominational paper is to act as the unifying and inspiring organ of the particular group with which the editor or promoter is connected.

But the place of the distinctively religious journal has become increasingly difficult to define during our generation. The question frequently arises, Is there still a place for such an organ? The difficulty of maintaining the religious journal upon the lines of denominational attachment grows yearly. The smaller denominations, and especially those whose views are highly dogmatic, feel this question less than the greater religious bodies, particularly those whose standards of education have tended to loosen in some measure the bonds of mere denominational and sectarian self-interest. People who are convinced that their particular religious creed is the only tenable statement of the Christian faith will be deeply concerned to uphold and distribute their religious publications. To them the editor speaks with the authority of an oracle, and every utterance of the paper is a final word. There is no doubt that so long as such a denominational spirit endures, it will support its distinctive denominational journalism.

But the tendency of Christianity is away from this intense denominational spirit. The proportion of members in the churches who are subscribers to distinctively denominational journals grows less annually. This is due to the weakening of denominational attachments, the growth of interdenominational interests, the perception that the Christian truth is not embodied in any one statement, the large appeal which interdenominational and undenominational Christian journalism makes to the intelligent members of the church, and the enormous pressure of more general publications such as the daily press, the monthly magazine, and the books that pour out from the presses like a Niagara, or are offered so temptingly through the media of public and circulating libraries.

In this condition the problem of denominational journalism becomes increasingly acute. Most journals of this class have ceased to be productive property unless strengthened by some form of book or Sunday-school publication which can supply the revenues needed to make good the actual losses sustained by the journal itself, or to reimburse to some degree those who sustain the journal by subsidies and other gifts. The decreasing value of advertising space in the distinctively religious journal, both because its clientage is limited, and because by its very character it is unable to admit to its columns certain types of advertising which are often most profitable financially, still further complicates the situation.

Then, too, it must be frankly confessed that the average denominational paper, either by nature or necessity, devotes not a little of its attention to matters which the average citizen, to say nothing of even the average church member, regards as absolutely second-rate or even trivial. Church orders, forms of organization, details of ritual, discussions over ordinances, and matters which have to do with mere denominational rivalries and successes, fill pages that become increasingly dull and dreary to the average reader. As compared with secular journalism in our day, the ordinary religious paper is exceedingly dry reading. And it is not strange that many people regard time spent in reading it as either wasted or only saved from waste by the lessening sense of duty fulfilled.

On the other hand, if rightly conducted, the religious press has unquestioned power to mould public sentiment. The editor is capable of exerting a very imporant influence if he once secures he confidence of his constituency. When it is seen that he is not merely exploiting a personal enterprise, nor is devoted merely to the upbuilding of his denomination, but is really concerned with the progress of the kingdom of God, his function is a really important one. No religious journal can be permanently effective that is conceived as a mere money-making enterprise, or the personal organ of a man of mediocre character, or the newspaper of a sect with narrow views. The spirit of the times and the spirit of the Gospel alike forbid the permanent success of such a journal. One of the most important elements in the success of a religious paper—a success not measured merely in financial returns, but in genuine response to the needs of a religious community—is a vision of the kingdom of God in its majesty and world-wide scope, and a passion for its realization.

The religious journal that is to be of real value to the community must be poised, sane and balanced. It cannot commit itself to fads and fancies. It must have convictions which are not fanatical, and broad views which are not merely the result of wavering opinions. It must be willing to face all the facts of the religious life, even those which at first seem adverse to its own particular denominational position. In this manner alone can it gain the confidence of its open-minded readers.

At the same time it must not be forgotten that a religious paper is usually the organ of some denominational body. As such it must not be forgetful of the interests of that particular communion. But in order to adequately serve its constituency it must not be merely the partisan of a denominational inheritance, but rather the interpreter of denominational responsibility in the light of present facts and forces. More than one religious denomination is losing its testimony and becoming obstructive because of narrow-minded and belligerent journalism. The only type of religious newspaper that can render its constituency the right sort of service is one that offers light and leading.

To far too great an extent the religious papers of today are devoted to their own denominational interests, to the exclusion of those of the kingdom in general. Every religious newspaper owes to its readers the news of the entire religious world, in so far as it can find space for it. And especially such news as relates to the growth of the churches, their methods of meeting new responsibilities, and their expression of new forms of life as the result of the spirit of Christ. Many a religious paper that has today the appearance of a mere sectarian sheet could immensely improve its tone and broaden its message by printing some of the news of the Christian world at large.

Again, the religious newspaper is responsible for some adequate statement of the entire range of life outside church organization. Political, industrial and social events which have significance for the community need not so much record as interpretation. The religious editor may safely leave to the secular press the mere details of current events; but it is his business to point out the direction in which God is moving, as the facts indicate his presence in human institutions and activity. The time is past for the vicious distinction between secular and religious; to be longer tolerated in the domain of intelligent Christian thinking. All the facts which concern human welfare are religious facts, and the religious editor is bound to interpret them in some adequate manner.

It need hardly be urged that the religious journal has a very definite duty toward current literature. Many of its readers will have no other window through which to observe the world of books in any discerning and adequate manner. Public opinion regarding the kind of books that are wholesome and readable can be formed more completely by the religious journal than by any other single instrument of public instruction. This does not overlook the highly specialized function of the strictly literary journals, nor the widespread value of literary criticism in the daily press. Nevertheless, probably more books in the aggregate are purchased upon the verdict of the religious journal than in any other manner, and the responsibility is correspondingly great.

In close connection with this fact lies the duty of the religious press toward the interpretation of public facilities like the public library, and such opportunities as there may be for the development of appreciation of art and music. Whatever influence the minister has upon his community as a leader of sentiment in the appreciation of the right kind of books in the public library, and the right sort of art and music will depend in no small degree upon the character of the religious journal he is accustomed to read. Finally, the religious paper must itself be an example of good morals as well as a preacher of them. It is no significance that it should insist upon sound ethics if its own columns reveal a lack of sensitiveness to such ideals, and especially is this true of its advertising department. One of the most suggestive sections in Dr. Gladden's recently published "Recollections" is that in which he describes his reason for leaving one of the leading religious newspapers in the United States because its journalistic conscience was not as sensitive as his on the subject of the advertising that could be accepted. Recently there has passed over America a wave of aroused interest in this theme, which has swept the pages of many denominational papers fairly free of the noxious and immoral types of exploitation to which their readers had become habituated. Today the religious editor cannot afford to accept for publicity any material which does not bear the stamp of truth and sincerity. This reform has come none too soon, for it was the unhappy fact that the religious press seemed less sensitive to this type of imposition upon the public than even the better class of secular papers.

Whether or not the religious journal shall survive must depend upon the service it is able to render, not merely to its denomination, but to the community at large. It may be safely left to the spirit of the age and the better understanding of the spirit of Christianity to put under ban the more intensely sectarian and untrustworthy representatives of this great fraternity. And thus by a process of the survival of the fittest as well as by the conscientious efforts of those charged with the tasks of religious journalism, we may hope for decisive progress in the education of public opinion through the religious journal.

The election of Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, superintendent of schools of Chicago, as the president of the National Educational Association at its meeting in Boston this month was an event of more than passing interest. The notable success of Mrs. Young's administration of the difficult position she holds no doubt had much to do with the creation of a sentiment favoring her election. Yet the prejudice against a woman at the head of so important an institution as the N. E. A. resulted in the presentation of a report by the nominating committee recommending a man for the place. But the friends of Mrs. Young, who were in reality the advocates of a newer and broader policy for the association, rallied to the attack, and on the floor of the convention reversed the decision of the committee and elected Mrs. Young. If there has been any element of favoritism or any inner circle of bosses in the association, as has been charged, the "insurgents" may rest assured of a vigorous, impartial and capable administration on the part of Mrs. Young, who has thus become in the brief space of a few months the most notable figure in the educational field.

There are multitudes of church members who think their opportunities of service are too limited. They are not conspicuous persons and they have identified service with notoriety. They are not rich and they imagaine that only rich men and women can do things. They are not highly educated and they are inclined to leave the tasks of leadership to the educated. Persons of this sort need vision. If their place is small, they can be glad that light from every quarter shines upon it. If they have limited means, they can use to the best advantage what they have and place themselves on a level with every other worker who does his best. A chance to do a piece of honest work is a chance to learn something that is worth knowing. If we have Christian vision, we are so busy with what is granted to us that we have no time to wish for what we do not have.

Favorite Passage from the Sermon on the Mount

There is increasing emphasis upon the ethical in modern religious thought. "Christian Ethics" is a favorite subject with theological teachers and with preachers. It is being seen clearly that customs and sentiments originating in pre-civilized society and tolerable only in such society survive and flourish in our day. They may even have the support of religion. As disciples of Jesus we have assumed the obligation of knowing the mind of our Master and of trying to bring the world to an understanding of his requirements. We ought to know what is good and what is bad in our own lives and in society about us and we ought to engage in a holy war against everything that defiles and degrades human beings and in behalf of everything that purifies and ennobles them. If we do this, the Sermon on the Mount will be our constant study.

The beatitudes deal with the inner life of disciples. The one who incorporates them into his thought and feeling will be fortified against the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the vainglory of life. Persons who run here and there in search of amusement are poor within. Their sensations have not been converted into thought. A young married couple went to a prominent preacher of Chicago and asked him if it was possible for them to live in Chicago on the husband's modest salary: "Yes," was the reply, "if you are seeking for the best the city has to offer you." The philosopher Kant never got away from the place of his birth as far as one can travel in an hour on a fast train, but by his thinking he made the whole world his debtor. The church of Jesus Christ is honored among men in proportion to its contribution to the enrichment of the spiritual life. It does not strengthen itself by periodic disturbances of the social and spiritual atmosphere which do not drive men into their souls to search and know themselves.

Disciples are likened to salt and light. They preserve and they purify. They have communion with God and bring the life of God to men. It is easy to cheapen this service and yoke it to a commercial enterprise. The land agent does well to inform prospective buyers of the church privileges in his western town, for some of them are concerned about the religious training of their children, but when he treats the church as an adjunct to his business, it is time for the church to let him know that it is not as cheap an institution as he thinks it is. Religion does give strength to moral convictions. It does increase respect for law and order. It teaches respect for womanhood, reverence for age, and gathers about the child everything that ministers to its happiness and to its normal growth. But religion must not allow itself to be identified with a commercialized morality. If the minister entitles his sermon, "Does it pay to be religious," he may encourage his congregation to interpret religion in terms of the market and not the transactions of the market in the light of the teachings of Jesus.

The righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees was not exacting enough for the kingdom of God. There is a certain kind of workman who does just what he is told. He is not granted the privilege of thinking for himself. His work is not as difficult as that of the laborer who is compelled to do his own thinking. The second man has to be watchful in order to discover the needs of each situation. The first man soon becomes a machine that needs very little attention to keep it going. The religion of the legalist is of the machine sort. The majority of us like that sort of religion. We shrink from the pain of thinking. The Christian man learns to delight in the exactions of his Master. Every problem that presents itself is looked upon as an opportuninty of growth. He gets into the habit of trying to do things in the right way rather than in the customary way and he enjoys the habit.

Jesus insists upon the unity of life. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." Unity comes from serving God. Mammon cannot satisfy the heart and therefore no man can serve mammon without uneasiness and doubt. God satisfies the soul. He includes within himself all that is good for men to possess. Are they thinkers? God can use their thoughts for his purposes. Are they artists? Their statuary, poetry, painting, and music have a large place in God's world. Are they statesmen? God always has work for honest statesmen. Are they men of business capacity? Let them dedicate themselves to the service of God and they will find that God accepts them.

Practical Plans for the Promotion of Christian Union

BY LESLIE W. MORGAN.

The gathering at West London Tabernacle gave point and pith to the subjects treated at Caxton Hall. The general theme of the day was "The furtherance of our cause throughout the world" and in all of the brief addresses that were given, the "Our cause" was interpreted to mean, The promotion of Christian Union.

The discussions were in the form of a symposium, conducted by Dr. J. H. Garrison of the Christian Evangelist, and he proved a worthy master of ceremonies, sandwiching helpful suggestions between the addresses, and handling with delicate care the golden thread of spiritual influence running through it all.

The practical bearing of our plea on the mission field was set forth by J. G. McGavran (India) and A. F. Hensey (Congo). It was interesting to learn from both of these missionaries how vital and practical a question Christian Union has become on the mission fields, and it gives us pause when we learn from Mr. McGavran that they have learned to say less about Christian union, and have learned to practice it more; but we are interested to know that on the Congo especially, and, perhaps only to a less degree in other mission fields, the measure of union that has been achieved, is on the lines called for by the broadest interpretation of our plea. The great fundamentals of the Gospel are adhered to with no attempt to give hair-splitting definitions concerning this and that interpretation and application. Perhaps we have yet to learn that one of the greatest things for which the Campbells stood was the uselessness and folly of insisting that an exact definition should be given to every Christian term and phrase of doctrine. It is here that the great protestant principle of Liberty can be allowed its full exercise, without proving destructive to essential truth.

The points around which the symposium finally centered were the two brief addresses on "Lectureships and Conferences on Christian Union" and "A Christian Union League and a World Federation of our People." The first was treated by C. C. Morrison of the Christian Century, and the second by the writer.

The discussion revealed the fact that the conference was keenly in earnest in regard to Christian Union, and more especially the younger section of our ministers and church members. One can easily understand why certain of the more conservative,—and yet not less sincere brethren, are constrained to occasionally give a warning note and to insist that union on anything else than Truth is worse than division. In this all sections would agree, the only difference being: "What is Truth?"

As an outcome of the discussion, a resolution was presented, and unanimously carried, that a committee be appointed to frame a Memorial to the various religious bodies in Great Britain, asking their co-operation in the formation of a league or society for the promotion of Christian Union. This committee consists of Messrs. W. Durban, H. A. Proctor of Lancaster, George A. Quiggin of Birkenhead and Leslie W. Morgan. The thought that is in mind is that the time is ripe for the formation of a definite society that will give itself wholly to the cause of Christian Union. It is hoped that conferences and lectureships can be held in various places, such as have been held in London, that there could be a central head-quarters which could act as a clearing house for articles and general information concerning the whole subject. An official organ could be adopted in each denomination that would be expected to give special attention to the publication of these, and that eventually, perhaps, a special organ might be established in various countries for the promotion of the society and its objects. Opportunity will doubtless be given for indiviuals to enroll themselves as members who will undertake to pray for, work for, and practice Christian Union. This may seem a large order and, to many, visionary, but, if so, it shares this with many other visions and dreams, some of which, at least, have found realization!

The last day's conference was devoted to a consultation of the members of the joint-committee of forty, representing the Churches of Christ co-operating as the Christian Association and the Churches of Christ co-operating in the "Annual Meeting," or, as sometimes distinguished, the churches co-operating with our American brethren, and the British churches. A similar conference was held seven or eight years ago, but it bore little fruit. The discusion at that time centered mainly around the administration of the Lord's Supper, as to whether there should be an "open" or "closed" table. It was attempted on this occasion to treat the whole matter on somewhat broader lines. A general call for the meeting was issued by the committee of the C. A. in these terms: "To confer concerning the possibility of uniting the forces of this country which plead for a reurn to New Testament Christianity as the basis for the union of all Christians." On the whole, the spirit manifested by both sides on this occasion was admirable, and if definite results are not achieved at least good will be done in the mutual belief in each other's sincerity and earnestness of purpose. There are those who think that we are a long way apart, and they have doubtless many good reasons for their belief. Certainly the most liberal of the one section, and the most conservative of the other, would bear out this conclusion. It is, perhaps, at the point where we over-lap in this respect that the hope rests. If, in the future, we can secure an over-lapping of another kind in mutual co-operation, and in a more general commingling of the members of the two bodies, we will greatly further the cause which we have at heart. In general the churches of the C. A. sought to emphasize the great fundamental principles of our position and the necessity that liberty should be allowed in their application.

In the opening address given by a member of the Executive of these churches, three things were emphasized. First, Rejoicing concerning things in which we agree. Second, The necessity of insisting upon the liberty of the individual and of the local church. Third, The demand that our forces be joined, in view of the world's great need. It was found that we agree not only upon the fundamentals of Christianity as held by the Christian world in general, but that we agree in the great principles of the movement incorporated by the Campbells, the differences being in our application of those principles to the details of individual and church life. It is just here that the claim for liberty comes in. A resolution was finally presented and unanimously adopted; proposed by C. C. Morrison, a member of one section, and seconded by J. Marsden of Wigan of the other section. After various suggestions had been [illegible] concerning the exact wording of the resolution as finally adopted, it reads:

"That it is the sense of this conference that it is the will of Christ our common Lord that the two communities to which we respectively belong as individuals, should become one in our common loyalty to Him, and that we believe it most desirable to effect between the two communities a genuine Christian Union which will not involve the surrender of the conscientious convictions of ourselves or our churches."

In order, if possible, that ways and means might be found for the proper carrying out of the sentiments of this resolution, it was arranged that a committee, composed of a church from each community, should be appointed. The matter will be laid before the respective conferences, and it is hoped that something definite will be done.

Our American brethren contributed not a little to the fraternal spirit in which this conference was carried out. Many of them had met with the Old Brethren in Edinburgh, and some of them had been entertained in their homes; they had drunk tea with them at the social gatherings and had sat around the table of our common Lord in communion. This had a beneficient influence. But after all, practical Christian Union is much more than any thing involved in social meeting or in gracious geniality in the home. The roots must strike deeper, and the practical question must be faced.

The things which divide us in this country are not just the same things which strike the line between what are known as "Anti-Brethren" in America and the great body of our people. It is impossible for any Christian in this country, however conservative, to refuse to co-operate in world-wide evangelism; the atmosphere of Christian missions too thoroughly permeates for anyone to be inocculous to its influence. That is not one of the questions over which we divide here. On the other hand, our people in America have happily had the advantage of numerous colleges and universities, which have made possible the education of their sons and daughters, thus fitting them eventually for the Christian ministry, and also giving them a wider outlook on the whole field of truth.

These advantages have either been denied to, or have not been sought by the brethren of this country, hence, up to now, and probably for years to come, they will hold to the archaic conception that instruction of the most meagre kind is sufficient for giving a comprehensive grasp of Biblical truth. Until men of outstanding character and equipment are raised up to give leadership to the movement they will hold that "Mutual Ministry" is the ideal in the church. It is a significant fact that the first young man from the Old Brethren churches to enter one of our colleges, only entered a year or two ago, whereas the little group of churches co-operating with the Christian Association have sent out no fewer than sixty or seventy preachers, missionaries and Christian workers.

All this is said in kindly spirit, and with the hope that we may all be lead in the ways of truth, and therein find ourselves as one.

The supply of machine guns is increasing in all European armies. Everywhere it is conceded that this, the latest arm of the service, will play a decisive part in the battles of the future.

THE PASSION PLAY OF OBERAMMERGAU

By Mary Putnam Denny

(Written at Oberammergau.)

THE SPIRIT OF OBERAMMERGAU.

Browning draws, as it were, the curtain from the inner room of human experience in the picture of John the Beloved, in the "Death in the Desert." The great Apostle, with his disciples, is alone in the cave. They draw near him, each with their clamorous cry for expression in the great outer world. When the dying Teacher silences all with an authoritative gesture, stretching his white hand out toward the illimitable distances, and, in the mood of the desert, whispers: "Life, believe the aged man, is just one chance of the prize of learning love." The one chance of revealing our vision of God.

This, to us, is the spirit of Oberammergau and its great world-mission. In the centuries past, so the story goes, there was a terrible pestilence that swept over the Bavarian Highlands. Oberammergau alone of the villages was untouched, and the people placed a cordon of sentinels all around the village, that no infected person might enter. But all this precaution was in vain; one Gaspar Schisler, a native of the place, having been absent for a long time and longing to see his wife and children, stole back over the mountains from Eschenlohe, where he had been harvesting his grain, and, eluding the sentinels in the dark of the night, reached his home in the village. He had unknowingly been infected by the pestilence, and died as soon as he reached his home, and in a few weeks nearly a hundred of the people of Oberammergau were stricken. It was an hour of anguish and struggle, when the great life of the village, as that of one soul, was led into the very temple of suffering, and through that experience, as it were, toward the inner chapel—the Holy of Holies of a world's sorrow.

There had been other expressions of the religious drama. So early as the ninth century, Hrotsvitha, Abbess of Grandesheim, had written plays for her nuns. It is said that from the cloister the plays descended to the street and to the market-place. They were expanded to considerable length, some of them taking several days to act, and they were presented with great realism. And when the wars of the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries brought desolation to the fertile plains of Germany the plays which had made their home among the mountains lingered on unmolested, secure in their safe retreat. In the fourteenth century such a play was being enacted at Oberammergau, under the guidance of the priests of Rottenbuch, and later of the Benedictine monastery of Ettal, which had been established only a league distant from the village.

But now, through the far-away of their grief, that hung like the mists of their mountains before the vision of these men of Oberammergau, there shone as never before the face of their suffering yet glorified and risen Lord. And in that hour they reached toward the great expression of the Christ-life, that should shine through the years, an evangel of the deeper meaning of his great love, solitary in its beauty and power from all other expressions of the religious drama.

Beautiful are the words of the chronicler: "Those who remained met together and made a solemn vow before God that if the plague were taken away they would enact their play of the Passion of the Redeemer every ten years with the utmost skill and devotion of which they were capable. Their vow was heard and the plague was stayed."

Only three times have the villagers been hindered in the performance of their vow, and then in the time of war, and immediately when peace came again the interrupted play was finished—the vow fulfilled.

Three names enter into the development of the great outer forms of the drama. The first of these was Ottmar Weise, a Benedictine monk of the monastery of Ettal; at the dissolution of the monastry by Napoleon, he became parish priest of Oberammergau. It was at this hour that the wonder and the prophecy of future fulfilment in the great play was revealed to him, and he entered fully into the task of bringing it towards its highest realization. It was he who revised the old rimed version of the play into a prose version, which followed very closely the very words of the old Gospel. He it was also who gave the beautiful tableau in the play, introducing each action with an expression of an Old Testament type, which was interpreted by the great chorus of voices.

To Rochus Dedler, a native Oberammergaur and a pupil of Weise, was due the higher realization of the music of the drama. As a child he was first discovered by the choirmasters of Rottenbuch, when they came to see the play of 1790. They educated him in their college, and he attained skill as an executant and performer. He then went to Munich, where his opera, "Regulus," was performed in the great opera house. But Dedler, despite his musical development, was at heart but a peasant of Oberammergau, simple in his wants and desires, and he soon tired of the atmosphere of the great city, and rejecting many flattering offers of position and power he came back to his native village as schoolmaster and precentor and organist of the church.

Here, in the intervals between his hours of labor, he began to compose melodies for tne verses which interpreted the tableau. Then the conception of the deeper meaning of the great musical theme of the drama came suddenly to him, and he devoted all the after-years to the composition of this music.

Between 1814 and 1820 the score was completed, two songs alone remaining of his original composition. In 1820, when his great theme had been brought to its full expression, he conducted the music himself for the play of that year. The strain and exposure involved brought on his last fatal illness. In the last hours he would murmur over and over those words from the Passion Play which he loved most:

"The thorn-crowned One gives us life as price
(Since so the Father wills), as Sacrifice:
Where shall we find a love that is
To be compared with love like this?"

In life and in the silent portal of the life eternal the supreme love of the Christ was a constant abiding presence. Daisenberger, the last of the three great makers of the Passion

JESUS BEARING THE CROSS.

Play, was educated by Weise. To him is due the careful revision of the text of the drama for the performance of 1850, and the elimination of much that was weak and unworthy. He composed the beautiful tableau which interprets the inner action of the play and leads the people to the highest realization of the great theme. He was for years the village priest, watching with a father's love the life and expression of his spiritual children. In a great sermon, preached in 1870, just before the performance of that year, he led the people toward the far spiritual meaning of it all:

"You are called upon this year to take part in the fulfilment of a great and holy vow; you will, as it were, in some measure, take part in the apostolic office. From the Day of Pentecost the apostles went into all lands to preach Jesus the Crucified, his doctrines and his deeds, his life and his death, his resurrection and his ascension, to show to men how ancient prophecies and the types of the Old Testament were fulfilled in him. We are not now to go forth to the world to make known the Crucified, but thousands during this year will come to us, and ours will be the privilege to represent before them what the apostles preached. If we work together with holy zeal worthily to represent these mysteries, then we may hope that with God's grace great blessings may ensue. Many pious Christians, touched with emotion by the representation of their Savior's death, will return home edified and strengthened in their faith and love, and with renewed resolutions to continue his faithful disciples. Many of the lukewarm and frivolous, unable to throw off the solemn impressions they have received, will in future show that the seeds of a more Christian life were sown here. And it may be that the sight of the Redeemer's great love for mankind, and of his bitter sufferings for their sins, may draw tears from the eyes of sinners, and these tears, aided by God's good Spirit, may be the beginning of a sincere conversion, and this gazing on the Passion may be the way by which the Good Shepherd of Souls seeks and finds his lost sheep."

Truly these peasants of Oberammergau have entered a little way through the silent doorway toward the grand realization of the Unseen God with man.

"He walks on earth—the Wonderful—
And all great deeds are done for him."

It may be truly said of them: "There are to be found today men and women to whom Christ is as real as though they held his fleshly hand and looked into his sweet human face. They are as sure that heaven is around them as that their heart beats within them. They know that God loves them as certainly as if he awoke them each morning with a kiss."

The true spirit of Oberammergau is found in this realization of the presence and the love of God; and the yearning to give expression to the vision in beautiful types and forms to their world—a world that was once very small, a little company crowding the narrow paths of the village churchyard, but that now includes the princes and the peoples of the world. This spirit is revealed today, as well as in the older days of the play, in the eager joy and expectancy of the girl, Ottilie Zwinck, when she was told that she had been chosen to give the great part of Mary, the Mother of our Lord, in the play of 1910. To an eager listener she told of the great hour when the tidings was brought to her by her father:

MARY, THE MOTHER OF JESUS.
(OTTILIE ZWINCK.)

"When the door opened I could not say a word; I stood perfectly still. Then he came toward me, took me by the hand, and the tears rolling down his cheeks, said, 'I wish you joy; you have got your role.' So long as I remained with the father I kept back my own tears, but only until I was alone, then . . . Ten years I had thought of this hour, ten years I had hoped and prayed, so often prayed, even before the play of 1910, but I was too young then, and very delicate. I had thought to myself always, if only I might have this role, then I should want nothing more, and now it has all come to pass and I am so happy."

To her the greatest joy in all the world, to live out the great scene in the life of the Mother of our Lord, to enter toward the sorrow of Mary in the inner room of Bethany, and to utter those words of parting, as the shadows of tragedy and of the great world's heart of sorrow gathers around the Son: "That I may go with you into the midst of your suffering, yea, even unto death!"

And to hear the word of the Son, as he reaches out toward the dim, illimitable ways: "Arise, Mary! The night approaches and the winds of winter are waging near. Still, be of good hope! In the early morn, in the Garden of Spring, you shall see me again!"

The plot of the play turns upon one of those great climaxes in the life of the Master, when he drives the traders of Jerusalem from the Temple. The baffled traders conspire with the rulers, and Annas and Caiaphas, the priests; and then tempt and buy Judas with their gold to commit the act of betrayal, and finally, after the scene in the Garden of Gethsemane, move among the multitudes with insidious words, moving them to cry for the crucifixion of the Christ, and the release of the murderer, Barabbas.

In the introduction of the play, after the beautiful tableaux of "The Banishment of Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden" and "The Adoration of the Cross," a song-prayer of praise is given by the great chorus; praise for deliverance from the shadow of pestilence and death in those far days of Oberammergau's past, followed by an uplifted appeal that his great Presence may guide today in the highest fulfilment of this vow of their fathers.

The music of the prayer scarcely ceases when the great stage is suddenly filled with a motley throng, coming up through the narrow streets of Jerusalem, waving their palm branches, and shouting, "All hail to thee, thou Son of David." Then slowly through the opening distances there approaches this Son of David, whom the multitudes would crown today and reject and crucify tomorrow. Then, with swift sequences, the action moves forward, through the loud shouts of joy, and the subdued prophecy of sorrow in parting scenes and shadow and night.

And through all the soft strains of Dedler's accompaniments—the music that seems to breathe out to the listening multitudes, the very soul of the child of Ammergau, who entered so far toward the shadowed way of suffering wrought out in the humanity of the Christ.

Great places in the presentation of the drama are the silences of the Upper Chamber in Jerusalen, and the reality of the scene around the Table, a marvelous reproduction of Leonardo da Vinci's "Last Supper." There is vividly shown the spiritual aloofness of Judas. He is with the other apostles, and yet apart, separated by the spirit of unbelief and hatred and greed.

The very spirit of greed of all ages that ever leads toward the crucifixion of the good is revealed in the cry of the traders driven from their mart of trade, from the Temple which they had desecrated: "Gold, oil, salt, doves, he must pay us for the loss of all! Where is he? He shall know our wrath!"

In the great part of the Christus, one has well said that the work of Anton Lang is above the range of ordinary criticism, because with every true child of Oberammergau he does not act, he lives his part. The greatness of the expression of Anton Lang is in his power to enter toward and portray the minor notes of life, the sadness of the Man of Sorrows. As his voice rings through the vast theater with the great words, "Alas! how dark is everything about me! The burden of guilty judgment rests upon me! Oh, the sin, the sin of mankind!" you seem to enter toward the far way of the world's sorrow.

Sunday, May 29, was one of the great days of the play. The King of Sweden and the Archbishop of Munich, with their retinues, sat in the great box at the rear of the theater during the whole of the performance, and at the close Anton Lang was asked to dine with the King. Yet he is unspoiled by the praises of the great men of the world. The next week receiving the humblest of those that visited the village and his home "with the same unassuming dignity and gentle grace in his blue work apron (for he is a potter by trade), his hands stained with clay and his hair gray with potter's dust."

It is beautiful to watch how the tiniest child in the tableau, or choruses, enters in the spirit of the play. The procession of children move with perfect grace across the great performing their part as truthfully as if they had studied its meaning for years. Man, woman and child move as in the presence of the great Master, the beauty of whose outer humanity, toward which they have reached, touching and transforming their faces.

And through all is the spirit of place, the beauty and the mysticism of the Bavarian Highland region. The mountains, enshrouded in their blue mists, rise to the right of the open stage buildings, forming a background to the players, and the blue or cloudy sky is over all. Above all else is the outreach and glorification of faith, the faith which is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.

In the last great scene, the voice of the Magdalene leads toward the Hallelujah chorus, the realization of prophecy: "Still, I have seen him! I have heard his dear voice! Oh, blessed sight! Away from me, grief! The ecstasy of Paradise fills my soul! Ah, as though borne on wings, I will hasten to his disciples and tell them of the resurrection and give them greetings from their Lord! Oh, could I proclaim through the whole world, that mountain and vale, and rocks and woods, and heaven and earth might resound with the tidings, Hallelujah! he has risen!"

Another Description of a Day of the Play.

(From President W. H. Crawford of Allegheny College in Zion's Herald.)

When the curtain closed on the last scene it was six o'clock. There had been no intermission since eight in the morning, except at midday; no pause either, not even breathing space between acts. When the stage was not in action, the chorus was on. Yet from beginning to end there was no sense of weariness, and until after the crucifixion scene I did not see a single person leave. One woman was carried out in a faint. This was done quickly and quietly by attendants trained for such emergencies. In all the long series of scenes, tableaux, and chorus appearances, there were only two observable slips of any kind, and these were slight.

The Most Striking Scenes.

I have already named what was to me the most inspiring scene of the day. The most overpoweringly striking and startling scene was when the frenzied mob gathered before the judgment hall of Pilate. Their fierce mad cry, "Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas!" makes a lasting impression. The background of the cry was the unrest and doubt in the face of Pilate and the fine self-possession in the face of Jesus. There was one other scene almost equally thrilling —the discussion in the Sanhedrin, which came to its full height when Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea strode out from the hall refusing to have part in the shedding of innocent blood. The words of Nicodemus rang out like the utterance of Isaiah: "I execrate this resolution. I will have no part in this shameful and bloody judgment."

The Players.

I have not space to tell of the work of individuals who took part, not even that of the principals. Anton Lang as Christus seemed to me almost ideal. As I said at the beginning, he looks the part. He acts it as well as he looks it. During the entire day he speaks to no one. Between acts he remains alone in his little room back of the stage. From half past seven in the morning until six at night he does not leave the building, but keeps himself aloof from everything which might distract his attention from the great part he takes. If Anton Lang was not as good as he is and as simple, and if he did not undertake his part reverently and in the fear of God, he could not make the impression he does. When he cries out from the cross, "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani!" it means for many the actual cry of the real Christ. Ottilie Zwink, who has the part of Mary, evidently thinks Mary's thoughts after her, and feels deeply the words she speaks. Her eyes fill with real tears and her voice is full of piercing sorrow. From the standpoint of real impersonation and interpretation perhaps no one among all the participants equals John Zwink, who has the character of Judas. He first appeared in the play forty years ago. He began with the part of John, which he had twice. This is his third season as Judas.

Mary Magdalene.

Mary Magdalene reaches two great heights of expression—once when during the crucifixion scene she throws her arms about the foot of the cross and cries, "O Master, my heart hangs with thee on the cross!" and again when, after she has seen the risen Christ, she turns toward the audience and cries out, with a voice that fills every part of the great auditorium:

"I have seen him—have heard his beloved voice.
Oh, that I could proclaim it throughout all worlds,
That mountains and floods, heaven and earth might re-echo.
Hallelujah, he is risen!"

Visitors Caught in Storms.

During last month storms of unprecedented severity prevailed in Germany and proved a serious inconvenience to visitors at Oberammergau. Berlin was flooded by a cloudburst, June 14, all street traffic was stopped, the street car tunnels were filled and for a time the water was three feet deep in the principal streets. In that storm twenty persons were struck by lightning but no one was killed. Many persons in other parts of the empire had previously been killed by lightning and much property destroyed. In connection with the Berlin cloudburst the Ammer river overflowed and Oberammergau, where the Passion Play was about to begin, was practically under water. "Thousands of visitors, it is said, from all parts of the world were caught in the town and could not get out. All communication by rail, wire or other means was cut off. Automobiles of tourists went floating down the valley, and the fire department had to rescue many persons from flooded buildings. Earlier in the week the Ahr valley had been flooded, a railroad in process of building had been washed away, and scores of laborers and other inhabitants drowned. Also a cloudburst in a district of Hungary flooded a large section of country and over a thousand lives were lost."

Present Population of Australia.

According to official returns transmitted by Vice-Consul-General Henry D. Baker, of Sydney, the population of Australia on December 31, 1909, was 4,374,129, an increase in twelve months of 98,823. The population by states was, New South Wales, 1,621,677; Victoria, 1,303,357; Queensland, 572,654; South Australia, 416,047; West Australia, 273,534; Tasmania, 186,860.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, AUGUST 7.

Theme for the Day.—The True Communion.

Scripture—The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the body of Christ? seeing that we who are many are one loaf, one body.—I. Cor. 10:16, 17.

But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed came where he was; and when he saw him he was moved with compassion, and came to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring on them oil and wine.—Luke 10:33, 34.

The Holy Supper is kept, indeed,
In whatso we share with another's need;
Not what we give, but what we share,—
For the gift without the giver is bare;
Who gives himself with his alms feeds three,
Himself, his hungering neighbor, and me.
—J. R. Lowell ("The Vision of Sir Launfal.")

Prayer.—Our Father who art in heaven, on this the day made sacred by so many inspiring events in the history of the faith, and most of all by the resurrection of our Saviour from the dead, we come to Thee with joy and confidence, for Thou hearest us always. Accept the offering of gratitude which we make to Thee. Fill our souls with love and purity, of kindness and Thyself. Restrain us from every wish and way, and direct our feet into the pathway of holiness and peace. For we ask in the name of our Lord. Amen.

MONDAY, AUGUST 8.

Theme for the Day.—The Pure in Heart.

Scripture.—Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.—Matt. 5:89.

Thrice blest whose lives are faithful prayers,
Whose loves in higher love endure;
What souls possess themselves so pure,
Or is there happiness like theirs?
—Tennyson ("In Memoriam.")

Prayer.—Holy and righteous Father, Giver of life, and the Author of all our well-being, in the multitude of Thy tender mercies we find ourselves amazed and overwhelmed, for we have not merited the abundance of Thy favor. Yet in the life and work of our Lord we have seen Thy grace and mercy made manifest to all men, and we are brought very low in our sense of ill-desert before Thee. Yet we ask, most merciful Father, that Thou wilt pardon our offenses, and give to us in fuller measure the blessing of the pure heart, which brings us near to Thee. And may we see the shining of Thy face in our daily lives, and hereafter in the everlasting life. Amen.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 9.

Theme for the Day.—Sea Glimpses.

Scripture.—And I saw as it were a glassy sea mingled with fire; and them that came off victorious from the beast and from his image and from the number of his name, standing by the glassy sea, having harps of God.—Rev. 15:2.

Hence in seasons of calm weather,
Though inland far we be,
Our souls catch sight of that immortal sea,
Which brought us hither,
Can in a moment travel thither,
And see the children sport upon the shore,
And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore.
—Wordsworth ("Ode on Immortality.")

Prayer.—O Lord, our God, we wait for Thy blessing, without which all our lives are famished and unsatisfied. Thou hast loved us with an everlasting love, and called us into the covenants of Thy grace through faith in Jesus Christ our Lord. In his name, therefore, we beseech the favor of food and raiment, of health and happiness, and the privilege of working with Thee at the great tasks of the kingdom of God. Grant us this day the vision of the King in his beauty, and the sea of divine grace that rolls onward to the throne of God. We pray in the Saviour's name. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 10.

Theme for the Day.—A Message from Heaven.

Scripture.—The Lord hath appeared of old unto me, saying, Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee.—Jer. 31:3.

Give me some word to say for Thee,
I prayed. The world needs charity;
Its sorrows are so great to bear,
And men bow down 'neath loads of care.
Fain would I bring them some relief
And comfort for their hours of grief.
May I not tell them something? Go,
A voice replied, and let them know
Their Father loves them.
—Marianne Farningham ("Our Father Cares.")

Prayer.—Holy and righteous God, the Giver of good and the Preserver of our souls, we have hardly dared to trust the blessed news brought to us in Thy holy Word, for it seems far beyond the reach of thought that we should be called the sons of God. Yet so convincing is that message made to us in the life and teachings of our Saviour that we dare not doubt its truth. And when we look with fuller care into the volumes of divine record and of human experience, we are left in no uncertainty, for Thy love to us is everywhere made clear. Keep us ever in that love, we pray in Jesus' name. Amen.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 11.

Theme for the Day.—Conscience.

Scripture.—And herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward men.—Acts 24:16.

Pray for us, for we trust we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly.—Heb. 13:18.

These thoughts may startle well, but not astound
The virtuous mind, that ever walks attended
By a strong siding champion, conscience.
O welcome, pure-eyed Faith, white handed Hope
Thou hovering angel gilt with golden wings,
And thou, unblemished form of Chastity!
—John Milton ("Comus.")

Prayer.—We praise Thee, O God. We acknowledge Thee to be the Lord. To Thee all angels cry aloud in ceaseless adoration. To Thee cherubim and seraphim continually do cry, Holy, holy, holy. The goodly fellowship of the prophets praise Thee. The holy company of the apostles praise Thee. The martyrs of all the years lift up their voices to Thee. We would unite our praise with that of this vast throng, and confess Thy glory. Do Thou aid us to be worthy of such companionship, by the uplifting of our hearts to Thee, and by the right ordering of our lives in Thy sight. Give us minds that are set on the noblest things, and consciences void of offense toward God and man. We ask in Jesus' name. Amen.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 12.

Theme for the Day.—The Sufficiency of Christ.

Scripture.—And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee; for my strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore, I will rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. II. Cor. 12:9.

Christ! I am Christ's, and let the name suffice you,
Ay, for me too He greatly hath suffered.
Lo, with no winning words I would entice you;
Paul has no honor and no friend but Christ.

Yes, through life, death, through sorrow and through sinning
He shall suffice me, for He hath sufficed;
Christ is the end, for Christ was the beginning,
Christ the beginning, for the end is Christ.
—F. W. H. Myers ("St. Paul.")

Prayer.—Our Father, we give Thee humble and hearty thanks for Thine infinite favor to us, for our daily comforts and well-being, for the means of grace and for the hope of glory. In the fulness of Thy provision for us we find every want supplied. But beyond all the daily blessings we receive, we praise Thee for our Saviour, Jesus Christ the Lord. In his name we ever come to Thee, and coming find The ready to receive. Accept our praise for the mercies of this day, and go with us in the days to come, until we see Thee face to face. For Christ's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 13.

Theme for the Day.—God's Many Voices.

Scripture.—The voice of the Lord is upon the waters; the God of glory thundereth; the Lord is upon many waters.—Psa. 29:3.

And behold the glory of Israel came from the way of the east; and his voice was like a noise of many waters; and the earth shined with his glory.—Ezek. 43:2.

Not by one portal or one path alone
God's holy messages to men are known:
Waiting the glances of His awful eye,
Silver-winged seraphs do Him embassy,
And stars, interpreting His high behest
Guide the lone foot, and glad the falling breast.
The rolling thunder and the raging sea
Speak the stern purpose of the Deity,
And storms beneath and rainbow hues above
Herald His anger and proclaim His love.

Prayer.—Our heavenly Father, the whole of creation speaks of Thy power and Thy goodness. There is no voice in all the universe, save that of the unthankful of the human race, that does not proclaim Thy praise. We would join in this great chorus of thanksgiving, and count ourselves among those grateful beings to whom the glory of God is an ever-present theme. Help us to learn more fully the happy secret of the world, and be able to tell it to all whose lives we can direct for good. Make this day worthy of us and of Thee, and may the week which comes to its close bear some good record of our lives to Thy presence. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

CHAPTER XII (Continued)

"But it's monstrous to think that Donald has done it. You have left the key in the office some day. Some one else has done it if not James Douglas. I tell you Donald never did it." He paced the floor like one crazed. He even swore a few mild oaths which the elder did not reprove. He thought that likely heaven would pass them over, considering the virtuous indignation which had drawn them from Archie's lips.

"It's nae use gettin' wud aboat it Archie. What we hae tae think o' noo, is what's best tae do wi' my errin' son." Archie sat down breathing hard and unable to hide his distress.

"But I tell you uncle, Donald is innocent. What does he say for himself?"

"When Mr. Sinclair and myself brought him face tae face wi' the shamefu' cheque, he could only stammer an' stare an' mutter aboat fearin' that some one else had done it."

"I don't care what he looked like I'll never believe him guilty."

"Ye would na guess what he suspected?"

"No" he held his breath.

"Jeanie."

"He's an idiot," he blurted out the words but at the same time looked relieved.

"Ay, so ye may say. But when a man's drowning, they say he'll grasp at a straw. He thought if Jeanie did it I wadna be sae sair on her as I would on him. He kenned fine I would na disown her." Again Archie started to his feet and stamped about the kitchen. Only the matting saved the sleepers upstairs from being awaked. Presently he came to a standstill by his uncle's side, taking care still that he did not face the light.

"Listen uncle David, this thing must go no further. It seems to me that you are treating Donald most unjustly. But even if you were quite certain of his guilt, is it for you, his father, to expose him to public disgrace? Think of what it will mean for all of us. You know that it is the chief desire of my life to win Jeanie. Is she to be disgraced too?"

"There's money a braw lass in Glasga, Archie, who hasna a brither tae make ye blush. Take my advice an' gie up thoughts o' Donald's sister."

"Don't drive me mad, uncle David. I tell you plainly that this terrible thing would only make me cling more closely to Jeanie. Let me beg of you uncle to let the whole matter drop.

Let Donald be as he always was to you. I venture to say that you'll find him a true man in the time to come."

"If Donald can clear himself, afore the springtime it'll be a' richt. If not he'll gang tae Canada—There's hidie-holes there for a' conditions o' men."

"It will be nothing short of iniquity if you send your only son away in disgrace all on circumstantial evidence. But you will never do it. When you think calmly over it, you will see the injustice and folly of it. Donald's disgrace will be doubly yours, and ours too."

"Ay, his mither will break her hert."

"Be merciful, uncle, for her sake and for Jeanie's."

"Is an elder o' Mr. Sinclair's kirk tae hide sin an' shame in a member o' that kirk, just because that member happens tae be he's ain son? Na, na, Archie, I may break the herts o' my nearest an' dearest, but I'll no break my ordination vow."

"Does your saint Mr. Sinclair take so harsh a view of Donald's case as you do, sir?"

"Mr. Sinclair is a saintly man, Archie, but he has leanins. In this maitter I daurna follow his advice. The meenisters o' the present day hae a way o' lookin' at but ane side o' the character o' oor Great Judge.

They talk forever o' the love o' God, forgetting aboat His justice at the same time."

Archie not being a religious man did not attempt to argue the point.

"Does Jeanie know about all this uncle?"

"Ay, she knows it. Mr. Sinclair an' I laid it on Donald not tae tell her while Elsie Wallace stayed. But Jeanie's eye is quick. She noticed something wrong, an' when Donald an' her mither both refused tae answer her questions, she speired at Jamie Douglas an' he couldna keep it frae her."

"He would only be glad to get a chance of bringing her down a peg," he said, bitterly.

"Ye wrong Jamie. He has a hert o' steel an' Jeanie knows it."

"Uncle David, surely James Douglas is not aspiring to her hand." His uncle smiled grimly.

"Ye ought tae know that best yerself, Archie. Ye hae chances enough o' speirin' at her."

"Jeanie gives me very little encouragement I must say. This very day when I urged her to give me some hope, she gravely declared that at the present time she had no thoughts of the kind for me or anyone else. Was it Donald's trouble she was thinking of, or has someone else come between us?"

"It would be like Jeanie to refuse tae listen to ony honorable man's suit sae long as disgrace hangs over her faither's hoose. I must admit that I would expect this o' her, an' I'll go sae far as tae say that if Donald's name's no cleared o' this disgrace, Jeanie'll die an auld maid if she lives lang enough—an' I'll honor her for the choice."

"Is it nothing to you Uncle David, if my heart's broken and my life's wasted over your high and mighty ideas of honour? What are a few pounds compared with the happiness of those we love? There, I'll write you a cheque for double the amount you have lost if only you'll let the matter drop."

"Ye hae a poor idea o' honour, Archie Monteith. If ye could write me a cheque for a million o' money it wouldna redeem a lost character."

CHAPTER XIII.

A Scotch Mist.

It lay over everything in the early morning. A creepy, shivery, evil-feeling thing that seemed to be doing battle with frost and sunshine, and overcoming both. And no wonder! How would anything so pure as either frost or sunshine be content to remain in the presence of so clammy a visitor as is a genuine Scotch mist? So they both precipitately fled and left Brigend, on that chill October morning, to imagine in a small way what Egypt had been like, in the time of the ninth plague. There is no use in speaking of the appearance of anything on that particular day in that particular neighborhood, for nothing appeared except perhaps what seemed to be within arm's length.

Those whose duty led them out of doors that morning, felt themselves, literally shut in from the world they used to know. Chaos in the shape of a dark gray mantle enveloped everything. Foot passengers, (there were few others) kept carefully on to the sticky sidewalks. Because monstrous shapes sometimes lumed out of the greyness in front, gliding past only to be speedily swallowed up in the greyness behind.

Through the dull chilliness of it all, Elsie Wallace and Donald Graeme trudged side by side, almost in silence too, for the greater part of the way, to the railway station. Neither of them remembered having experienced so disagreeable a fog in all their lives before. It seemed bent on taking full possession of Elsie's bright eyes, robbing them of their lustre, and giving them a moist look which she felt most anxious that Donlad should not be aware of. It affected him differently, causing his heart to beat in painful throbs as it never used to do. There was a soreness too, in his throat, which could be occasioned only by that most malignant mist.

On leaving Hopefield, they had exchanged a few commonplaces about the chilliness of the morning and the pity that the good weather they had been enjoying for at least two weeks, was probably about to come to an end. Then they lapsed into dull silence, quite in keeping with nature's mood, till they were almost at the station. It was not Donald, who broke the silence, but Elsie—

"I am very sorry, Donald, that this horrible mist came on today—I wanted my last look of Brigend to be a bright one."

"Let us hope when next you see it Elsie, it will be brighter in every way."

"I hope so, indeed I am sure of it."

"Even a day like this cannot damp your hopes, Elsie."

"Why should it? I know the sunshine is above the darkness, and will chase it away by and bye."

"Is there any light behind day darkness I wonder?"

"Sure to be Donald. Just keep trusting on. Your trouble is heavy enough, but after all it may only be a Scotch mist that will lift as swiftly as it fell."

"I have been calling myself a brute, Elsie, ever since I told you of my trouble—What right had I to distress you with my worries? I have just spoiled your holiday."

"On the contrary, you have paid me the highest compliment possible. If you had not looked on me as a true friend, you would not have told me."

"Your hopefulness, and your trust in me, will make a man of me, Elsie." She looked straight into his eyes, not even ashamed to let him see the tricks that the mist had been playing with her own.—

"If I never do any other good thing, Donald, it will be worth while to have lived for this."

"God bless you, Elsie." Jeanie and Archie Monteith were waiting for them on the platform which they reached as the last words were on Donald's lips. They were only a few minutes waiting when the train dashed into the station exactly up to time as Glasgow expects all her trains to be. Hasty goodbyes were uttered, and she was off. But as Donald shut the carriage door she said in a low voice:

"You will call to see mother and me when you come to Glasgow?" He had no time to answer, but the light on his face, which even the mist could not hide, sent her away with a glad heart.

As they turned away from the platform Jeanie felt her heart sink. Never had she felt the parting from Elsie so keenly before. Her presence at Hopefield had been a sort of protection to them all, so long as Elsie remained Jeanie knew that her father would take no decisive step with regard to Donald's supposed crime. Now she knew he would take stern measures to discover the whole truth, and she feared the very worst, knowing as she did of Donald's gambling debts. Archie regarding her downcast face with searching anxiety, guessed what was passing through her mind. With some adroitness he attempted to lead her thoughts away from home worries.

"Your choice of a friend does you credit, Jeanie. I think her one of the nicest girls I have met for a long time. You think so too, Donald, don't you?" The remark was ill-timed. Donald only reddened and stepped off the path.

Jeanie replied briefly:

"Elsie is a good girl, Archie. I think she ought to be glad though, to get away from Brigend—especially today," she added as she noticed that Donald changed color again. "This mist is simply horrible."

"I think it splendid. I just love it," he whispered. She regarded him with amazement.

"Why?"

"It gives me a splendid excuse for remaining where I am while it lasts. I don't care what form it takes, the thing that keeps me near you, I hail with joy." His ardor brought the rich color to her face. His devotion was unmistakable and very touching. And then nobody else cared—now that Donald had brought disgrace on them all. She wished she could think more of him. But somehow—there her thoughts stopped and with a bright smile she answered:

"I suppose Satan can appear like an angel of light sometimes."

"If by 'Satan' you mean the mist, I assure you that today I quite regard it as an angel of light. Oh I say, Donald," he exclaimed turning aside to address him, "Would you mind running round to the postoffice and sending a wire to mother? Just say, 'A heavy fog here—not safe to motor today.' It will save her from anxiety on my account."

"Certainly, Archie," replied Donald, who was only too glad at the moment to escape from all society save his own. As Donald strode away into the dimness, Archie turned towards Jeanie. There was an air of possession about him which she rather resented. So the timid thoughts of a moment before were rudely scattered.

"Now, darling. I forbid you to speak another word in this chill air, thankful as I am to this friendly mist, I know it is not good for throats, so we must wait for the shelter of the drawing-room before we enter into matters which concern us all most deeply." She nodded merely and pushed her warm fur necklet over her mouth. When they reached Hopefield they turned in at the shop door as Jeanie smilingly explained, to save Sarah's legs.

James Douglas stood behind the counter, for a wonder, idle, making a pretence of reading the morning paper. Glancing over the edge of the paper, he said, gravely:

"Miss Jeanie, a gentleman called to see you a few minutes ago, on business, particular, he said. Yer faither took him upstairs. They're baith there the noo waitin' for ye."

"Who is it, James?" she spoke with eager looks.

"A freend o' Donald's," he replied, vaguely. The thought flashed through her mind—"some one to tell us of more gambling debts." Her almost terror stricken face was more than James could bear and he hastened to assure her that she need have no reason to be afraid of her visitor. She did not for a moment suspect that the mystery he was making was for the sake of tormenting Archie Monteith. Indeed she thought so little about him at that moment that she was about to run off without saying a word to him, but he coolly drew her attention to himself by saying:

"I'll wait here, Jeanie, till your visitor departs in peace, that is, if he does not keep you too long. If he does, I'll not promise to be patient." Once more James shot a look over the paper's edge. It was baleful. Archie did not appear to notice it. Once he had feared a possible rival in this honest eyed young shopkeeper. Now things were on a different footing. He would take good care to point out to Jeanie the absurdity of laying the blame of this forgery business on Donald while a paid man had at least equal opportunity of doing the deed. He leaned calmly against the counter, a supercilious smile on his handsome face. The dark thought passing through his mind cost him no pang, as he coolly addressed the man whom he was about to wrong so deeply, had he been able to do so:

"What do you make such a secret of who's called on Jeanie, James? You've made me quite jealous—do tell a fellow." James threw down his paper and lifted a bunch of half-stone sugar bags from a nail on which they had been hanging by a piece of string. Pulling one of them off the string he thrust his hand into it and eased out the corners. Then with a merry twinkle in his eye he answered, slowly:

"I hae nae doubt Mr. Erchie but mony a time yer sair puzzled tae know how Miss Jeanie will manage among a' her freends tae choose just the richt ane. But I hae an opeenion o' my ain."

"Your opinion is always well worth hearing, James, may I have it?"

"Certainly, Mr. Erchie—my opeenion is that Miss Jeanie is a bird that'll aye ken the difference between chaff an' wheat." He dived the scoop into the sugar drawer as he spoke and began weighing out sugar as if there was no Archie Monteith in front of him, pretending to laugh at his answer, while bitter hatred was in his heart.

When Jeanie entered the drawing-room she was much relieved that her visitor turned out to be Mr. Sinclair. She was much amused too, to think of the way in which James Douglas had informed her of his presence. It just dawned on her the moment she saw Mr. Sinclair that James had purposely withheld her visitor's name, on Archie's account. She could not help smiling to herself at the thought and Mr. Sinclair's having heard from her father where she had been and in what company, judged her smiling face as due to the pleasure she had taken in the society of the man, whom he believed the winner of affections that not many months ago he had hoped would one day brighten his own life. He rose to meet her as she entered the room. Self-mastery shone in every feature of his face.

"Forgive me, Jeanie, for calling at such an early hour, but there is a matter which has troubled me greatly for some time. I would like to lay it before your father here, and I want you to help me." Her hand trembled as she laid it in his.

"If I can do anything—Is it about Donald?" she said wistfully.

"Yes, Jeanie, it's about Donald," he replied, gravely.

"First of all Jeanie, where's Archie? He might as weel join in this discussion. In a multitude o' councillors there is wisdom." Her father spoke hopelessly.

"I did not know father that it was Mr. Sinclair who wanted to see me. James Douglas just said, "A gentleman" wanted to see me. Shall I ask Archie to come upstairs? He is still in the shop."

"Ay surely lassie, Archie feels this a, most as much as we do—yer mither's in the kitchen. Let her bide there. Nae use breakin' her hert goin' over the same groun' again." Jeanie was about to quit the room, when Mr. Sinclair signed to her to remain.

"Excuse me, Mr. Graeme, what I am about to say requires no one outside your own family to interfere in. I am simply about to make a proposal which I believe will be best for all of you. It is this—that you ask Donald to come back to his work as usual—why should this unfortunate occurrence get wing, as it is sure to do, if Donald is missed from his place by your customers. What do you say to my proposal, Jeanie?" Mr. Graeme sat, his arms folded across his chest, his lips tightly compressed, and his eyes flashing angrily, under drawn brows. Jeanie gazed into his stern, set face, with a sinking heart.

"Father, you will be guided by Mr. Sinclair's advice. Why should all Brigend know of our sorrows?"

"It's no Brigend I'm thinkin' o' Jeanie—It's simple right and wrong. If Jamie Douglas had done this thing, would I no' be justified in dismissing him from my employ? Am I tae wink at sin an' shame, because it's my ain son who is guilty o' it?"

"Mr. Graeme, I'll take you on your own ground. Would you be justified now, in dismissing James from your service, simply because your office has been open to him, and some unscrupulous person has forged a cheque which has robbed you of one hundred pounds?"

"If Donald had been able to lift suspicion from his name, as convincingly as Jamie did, it would hae been a' richt, Mr. Sinclair. But ye ken fine yersel, that from the first, Donald looked guilty."

"And yet Donald may be speaking truth. If so it is terrible to think that his own father refuses to believe him, more terrible still, even if he should be guilty, that his own father refuses to give him a chance of doing better." Mr. Sinclair's voice shook with emotion. Jeanie stood before her father with clasped hands. She felt so utterly humiliated by what appeared to be her brother's guilt, that she found it almost impossible to plead for him, in the presence of the man whom above all others she most respected. When he ceased speaking she said in a low, sad voice:

"Father, if I had committed this crime, would you treat me as you are treating Donald?" His face softened, but he looked at her out of hopeless eyes.

"My ain lassie, ye couldn't have done it." Then turning to the minister he added:

"Ye hae gained your way, Mr. Sinclair. Ye can go tae the young man, an' tell him that his faither says he may return tae his work."

"No, Mr. Graeme, I will not go to Donald with your message. Go to your son yourself, and ask him to come back. Remember that even though you may still deem him a prodigal, it is the father who ought to run to meet him."

"Ay, gin he repents."

"Repentance is of the heart—you and I have no right to judge." Mr. Sinclair spoke calmly now.

"You will ask Donald to come back to his work, father?"

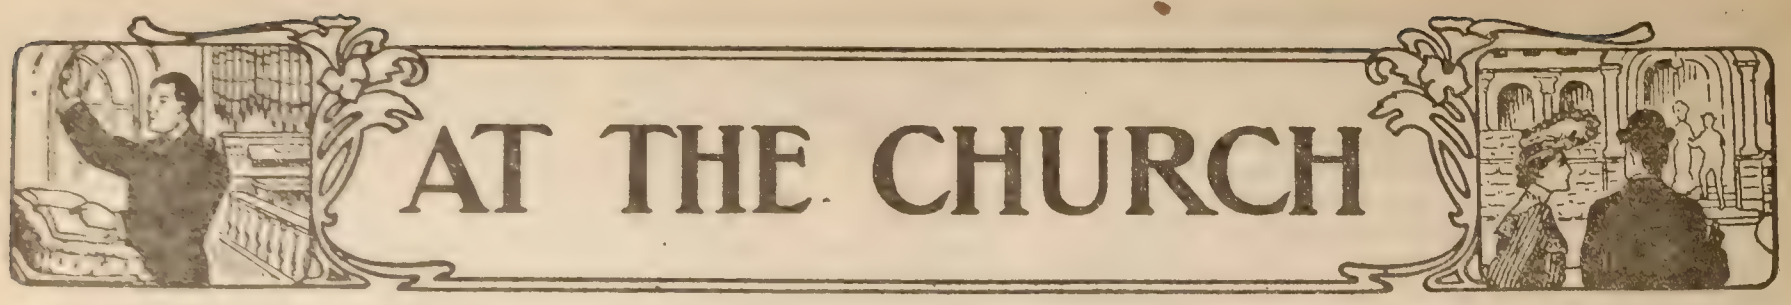
"Oh ay—the meenister says I ought—nae doot he knows best." As he spoke he rose to quit the room. At the door he paused and looked round at his daughter:

"Jeanie(if you could come awa' into the office when Mr. Sinclair leaves I would be glad. I only want ye tae address a wheen o' envelopes. The writing's behind a wee."

"Yes, father, I'll come with pleasure."

"I must not detain you, I see, Jeanie. Your hands seem to be full in many ways. But I have much to say to you. Will your—will Mr. Monteith be returning to Glasgow today?"

She was annoyed with herself for coloring under his grave eyes.



"If the mist clears off I expect he will."

"It will clear. See, it is lifting already. Could you give me an interview this evening then, say at seven o'clock?"

"Certainly, Mr. Sinclair, and I want to thank you for what you have done for Donald."

"I wish I could do more, Jeanie. But we will talk about him when I call again."

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Great Reward*

It was inevitable that the conversation of Jesus with the rich young man should lead to some questions on the part of the disciples. If a man who had the marks of prosperity and the blessing of God was in danger of missing the gift of life, what was the hope for one less happily placed in the good things of the world? Through all their history the Jews had been taught by their wise men and priests that wealth was the mark of the divine favor. Jesus seemed to deny all this in what he said regarding the danger of money. So they inquired at once who then could be saved, and Jesus knowing that only larger views of the kingdom of God could correct their ideas, turned the matter by saying that all things were possible with God.

But in order to clear up a little more fully the difficulty involved in his words regarding wealth he told the parable of the laborers in the vineyard, which is the theme of our study. To a world placing so much emphasis upon money and the methods by which it was to be gotten, it was the purpose of the Master to bring his larger teaching concerning the infinite value of the gift of God, and the smallness of all earthly possessions in comparison. The gift of God is enternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. No value that men reckon can be put on so divine a gift. It is like the rich treasure which the man found in a field and bought at the sacrifice of everything else he possessed. It is like the reward for which a man would work hard and faithfully all the days of life, and feel at evening time that he had been more than amply paid. Whoever upon less rigorous conditions becomes its possessor may count himself that much more indebted to God for the free gift he receives.

The Vineyard Owner.

The culture of the vine was one of the most common forms of industry in Palestine, and is to the present time. Men put great efforts into the preparation of the soil, the selection of the vines, and the tillage of the vineyard. The profits were large, for wine was a common article of consumption, and raisins were made from the ripe grapes. For the care of such a possession a man had to secure a great deal of extra help in the time of the vintage. As most of the people of Palestine lived in towns and village and went out into the country to cultivate their farms, the landowner found in the market place of the town whatever laborers were available for the day.

One morning he went to secure some helpers, and found a few waiting to be hired. The entire day was before them, and he promised them the usual wages of the time, which would be equivalent to about a quarter of a dollar in our money. The Roman coin referred to is sometimes called a penny, and sometimes a shilling, in the translation, but it was an ample price for a full day's work. Later in the morning the proprietor found other men in the market and hired them also, not stipulating what they should receive, but saying that whatever was right he would give them. He had plenty of work for them to do, and they ought not to be standing idle when there was so much need of labor.

The Idle Workmen.

Again at noon he secured others, and in the middle of the afternoon, the ninth hour of the day from sunrise, he hired still others, making with them all the same agreement to give them whatever their work was worth. And only an hour before sunset he came through the market place again and found others still who were unemployed. Perhaps they had not come to this spot until after the other laborers had gone, but the fact that they were unemployed showed that the whole day had gone without their undertaking any work. To them he put the same question, Why do you waste the day? They responded that no one had come up to hire them, and he sent them like the rest into the vineyard.

The meaning of all this is too obvious to require comment. The kingdom of God is a field where the work is abundant for all who are willing to devote themselves to its activities. No one needs to waste his time. More than this, the Master of the vineyard is absolutely dependent upon the work of his helpers. Without them the crop goes ungathered. His wages are ample, and the care he takes of those who work for him is the best. Both work and wages are abundantly satisfactory. From this point of view and from that of every frugal spirit it is a shame that a moment should be lost by any one of those to whom the call comes to enter such a service.

At the end of the day the owner of the vineyard told his superintendent to call all the laborers together. They had to go back to their homes, and that might take them to other villages, so that it was necessary that each should be paid his wage before he went away. Of course the wages of those who had labored all the day had been determined in the morning, but to the astonishment of all, the steward began with those who had entered the vineyard latest and gave them each the price of a full day's work. And down the list of the workers the paymaster went, giving to every man the same wage. When the first men came, who had worked all the day, they were at first inclined to resent the payment of only the stipulated amount, because it seemed to them that they should receive more than the others. They were quite right in feeling that the later comers had spent no such time and effort in the service of the proprietor as they themselves had done. The heat of the day, the hard labor of the vineyard, had fallen upon them far more heavily than on the late comers; yet they had received only the same wage.

The Wages Paid.

But the owner of the vineyard pointed out to them that no injustice had been done. The first comers had received all their task was worth. To the others he had given out of the abundance of his good will that which was his own to give. In this manner he satisfied the complaints and sent all the workmen away contented.

No one who studies the parables with attention will need to be warned that these stories of the Master are intended to illustrate some single point each in the plan of the kingdom of God. No one would undertake to justify the proprietor of this vineyard in attempting to make this a customary way to treat his hired help. He would soon be unable to secure any man to do a full day's work. They would all insist upon coming late and getting the full day's wage. But there is another phase of the kingdom of God which the parable beautifully illustrates, and it is upon that alone that attention is to be fixed. The gift of eternal life, that divine bestowment of friendship on the part of God through our Lord, is so splendid and incalculable a possession that a man might spend every hour of the longest life in the hardest work and still count himself immensely the debtor of God in receiving so tremendous a reward. But for those who devote only part of their lives to the work of the kingdom the wage, judged from the viewpoint of common industrial employment, is just the same. And even for the man who at the latest moment with sincere consecration of life enters the service of God, the reward is the same.

Draco's Rule, and Christ's.

Draco, the stern lawgiver of ancient Greece, prescribed in his bloody code the death penalty for all offences, and justified this severity by saying that the least crime against the peace and welfare of the state was worthy of death, and he knew no severer penalty for the greater crimes. Conversely, our Saviour's teaching is that the gift of life eternal is bestowed on the least of those who commit themselves to the path of virtue under his direction. No matter how limited the time which they have given to this high purpose, if their lives are sincerely devoted even for that brief space to the kingdom of God, their reward is assured. And to those who for long years consecrate themselves to the same high purpose, there can be no greater regard than the same gift of eternal life.

It must be kept in mind throughout that only a single aspect of the gospel is here presented. The question of the character which is developed by the friendship of God is not under consideration. No one would for a moment claim that the quality of life which results from a late and hurried commitment to the Christian calling can compare with that which results from a long experience in the school of Christ. Salvation is character and not possession. A man is saved by what he becomes rather than what he receives. Yet the parable teaches its lesson also that the greatness of the gift of God is beyond all expression, and that he who has even a very little experience of the greatness of that life which is hid with Christ in God may count himself beyond measure fortunate; while he who has struggled through a lifetime of earnest effort and profound consecration, still feels his reward so infinitely beyond his merits that eternity can only partly measure the fullness of his gratitude.

Church Life

—Mr. and Mrs. Charles Clayton Morrison are expected to arrive in Chicago next week from their trip to the Edinburgh conference and other parts of Europe.

—Dr. Willett gave several lectures at the Chautauqua at Monteagle, Tenn., last week. His family are in Pentwater, Campbell Park, whither many of the ministers of our faith will go for their vacations during August.

—The address delivered at the Anglo-American Conference by our absent editor, C. C. Morrison, will be read with interest by all interested in the present practical problems involved in the realization of the plea for Christian union. The address will appear next week.

—Alva W. Taylor again assumes responsibility for the page, "Social Survey," which he relinquished during his absence in Europe. He has promised us the report of some sociological observations made while tramping through Ireland.

—The issue of the Christian Century for August 11 will be devoted to the interests of Religious Education with the hope that it may be of help to pastors and teachers in facing the problems involved in this task that is upon us in bringing our Sunday school work under the control of scientific methods.

Annual Offering for Church Extension

Begins

FIRST SUNDAY IN SEPTEMBER

Church Extension Supplies should be ordered at once so the orders can be filled promptly from the office at Kansas City.

THE FOLLOWING SUPPLIES WILL BE SENT:

1st, Collection Envelopes 2nd, A four-page pamphlet, "Church Extension and the New Century Before Us," which ought to be circulated by the thousands among the members of the church; 3rd, Pastoral Letters; 4th, Church Extension Subscription Cards.

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS THIS YEAR

is the amount we want to secure for the current Missionary year for Church Extension. If we can raise FORTY THOUSAND DOLLARS in September we will reach the $100,000. Is this not worth working for? The Board trust that every minister of the gospel and every elder in the church will take an interest in enlisting the congregation, over which he has charge, in the Annual Offering.

ATTRACTIVE FEATURES OF CHURCH EXTENSION

1. Church Extension money comes back to go out again every five years. Loans are returned in five annual payments.
2. Churches do their best to help themselves and come to this Board in their extremity for loans to complete their buildings.
3. The Board loans about one-third the cost of the lot and church building. The church aided, therefore, raises two dollars for every one loaned.
4. Many congregations to whom we promise loans do not need them in the end. Yet they would not have had the courage to begin except for the offered help.
5. A loan from this Fund makes it possible for a congregation to erect the first building in a new town or ward of a city and thus gain immense advantage.
6. Our Board encourages churches to erect up-to-date buildings by furnishing church plants that are modern and useful and that are perfect as to heating, lighting, ventilation and acoustics.

pastor welcomed to the suburb by the local press.

William Oeschger, until lately pastor of the church at Vincennes, Ind., has been elected chancellor of Cotner University and will take up his duties at once. He delivered the educational address during the Nebraska state convention.

V. W. Blair, pastor of the Payne Ave. Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., is spending his vacation visiting various churches and Sunday-schools, making an inductive study of their methods. He spent a Sunday with the Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo.

The New Church, Evanston, Ill., will be dedicated September 18. During the summer the congregation is worshipping in the basement. O. F. Jordan's sermon subjects on a recent Sunday were: "The Appreciation of Jesus" and "Jesus and the Individual."

A Topeka paper states that G. A. Gillette, pastor of the Christian Church, Oberlin, Kansas, has been working during harvest in the field at harvest hands' wages, which are not so low, comparatively, and that he makes one of the best hands in the crew.

Walter M. White, pastor of First Church, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, has with the indorsement of his board of trustees, established a office in the heart of the city and will maintain office hours from 8:30 a. m. till 1:00 p. m. daily. A stenographer will be in the office all day.

I. N. Grisso, Fairmont, W. Va., writes that he is available for supply work with churches in Indiana or Illinois during August. Mr. Grisso desires to engage an experienced helper, and one who can lead a chorus in an evangelistic meeting for the month of November.

The members of the Central Church, Youngstown, Ohio, at the close of a recent Sunday morning gave $25 to the fresh air fund for the poor children of the city. A local paper commends the offering as by far the best made by any church of the city this year. W. S. Goode is pastor.

Rev. J. R. Ewers, pastor of the East End Church, Pittsburg, Ohio, sails from New York on the North German Lloyd Steamer, Wilhelm II, August 2. Mr. Ewers will return in September. During his absence the East End Church will be redecorated and placed in first class repair for the work of next year.

Oliver Cook, since he closed his work at Columbus, Kansas, has been in tropical Mexico, fifty miles south of Tampico, farming and recuperating physically and financially. In the neighborhood he has led in the organization of a Sunday school and mission. His address is Ozulauma, Mexico.

O. W. Lawrence, Decatur, Ill., is using the stereopticon with good results in the Sunday evening meetings of the First Church, Decatur, Ill. His sermons treat of great paintings of the Christian faith, architecture, music, and some of the greatest preachers. These subjects, illustrated as they are, bring an audience that fills the church despite the warm weather.

C. C. Carrigues has resigned as pastor of the Hammett Place Church, St. Louis, Mo. But the members of the church have voted to ask him to reconsider and remain with them. It is understood that Mr. Carrigues has been insistent upon the congregation building a better house of worship, and feels unless they do this their future growth is exceedingly limited.

Since Nelson Trimble became pastor of the church at Gary, Ind., about two months ago, there have been thirty additions to the membership and the results of his vigorous leadership are seen in all departments. Mrs. Trimble has been visiting in Kansas City, Mo., where she supplied the Sheffield church. She will assist in the work at Gary and may establish a mission in another part of the growing city.

B. H. Sealock is making careful plans for an aggressive move with the Sunday-school at Petersburg, Ill. Mr. Sealock has substituted for the regular Sunday evening sermon during the summer a series of addresses by professional men. The first was "The Law as a Life Work," by a local attorney. Then came "The Work of a Teacher," "The Life of an Editor," "Medicine as a Life Work," "The Challenge to the Ministry," "The Opportunity in Politics."

Joseph Darden Armistead, Eminence, Ky., who has just returned from a vacation spent at Chautauqua, N. Y., has accepted a call to the Central Church of Walla Walla, Wash., one of the strongest churches in the west, where there is a flourishing congregation in the midst of a rich and important section of the northwest. The congregation is equipped with a modern stone building, costing $50,000, erected four years ago. Mr. Armistead leaves the Eminence Church in the best condition in its history.

The church at Harvey Ill., is just closing a loan with the Church Extension Board for $4,000. They have but recently completed a money raising campaign in which the loan was reduced by about $700, leaving the present indebtedness only $4,000. During the two years that Mr. Endres has served as pastor of this church they have raised on the indebtedness $1,500. Mr. Endres and his church are uniting with the other churches in Harvey in Sunday evening meetings which are being well attended.

The annual missionary convention of Maryland, Deleware and the District of Columbia will be held with the Jerusalem Church at Mountain, Maryland, September 6, 7, 8. Jerusalem is a short distance north of Baltimore. Delegates will leave the train at "Joppa," and drive over to Jerusalem. This will doubtless be a novel experience for many. A good program is being prepared. The committee is anxious that each church send at least one representative. George A Miller is president of the convention.

The following is the report made to the state secretary for the church at Long Beach, Calif., for the year, beginning July 1, 1909, and ending June 30, 1910: Membership July 1, 1909—Resident, 500; transient, 185; total, 685. Additions—By baptism, 39; by letter, 94; otherwise, 20; total additions, 153. Dismissed—By letter, 51; by death, 2; to form East End congregation, 56; total, 109. Net gain, 44. Present membership, 729; of which 575 are resident members, and 154 non- resident. The present Bible school enrolment is about 550, the average attendance for the year 411.

Financial: Moneys for local church—For salaries (all items), $2,730; for current expense (all items), $1,689.96; for property (all items), $140.00; for benevolences (all items), $55.27; total for local work, $4,615.23. Money for Missions—For A. C. M. S., $24.77; for state missions, $674.34; for F. C. M. S., $715.88; for C. W. B. M., $590.01; for church extension, $27.31; for National Benevolent Association, $50.57; for ministeral relief, $57.06; for miscellaneous missions, $94.00; total for missions, $2,233.94; grand total of moneys, $6,849.17.

Change Treasurers

T. R. Bryan, who has served as treasurer of the Church Extension Board since its organization twenty years ago, has felt compelled to give that work to other hands. Fletcher Cowherd, W. F. Richardson and Langston Bacon, committee for the Board, have presented resolutions which were adopted commending the unusual ability and unsurpassed faithfulness of Mr. Bryan in these twenty years of devotion to the interests of the brotherhood and the weaker churches. To this George W. Muckley, corresponding secretary, adds his testimony and to the worth of the character of the man with whom he has been so intimately associated through two decades. Our readers will be interested in this brief sketch of the life of Mr. Bryan:

"Mr. Bryan was born September 27, 1839, Clinton county, Missouri, and went to Illinois at the age of fifteen. He united with the church at Bloomington, Ill., in February, 1856. In 1861 he graduated at Eureka in a class of twelve, ten of whom are still living. He entered the army May 1861, as a member of Company "G" 17th Illinois Infantry under the captaincy of O. A. Burgess and served three years. He was married on December 27, 1864, to Eleanor R. Jones of Eureka, Ill. Six children were born to them, five of whom are still living. Sister Bryan has been a helpmeet to Brother Bryan not only in his home, but in all the work of the church in which she has been always actively engaged. In 1870 he removed to Kansas and helped to organize the churches at Dexter and Winfield, serving as an elder in both of these churches for several years. He served in the legislature of Kansas as a member from Cowley County in 1875. He was twice elected treasurer of said county, serving four years, the constitutional limit. In 1885 he removed to Kansas City and at once became a member of the First Church and was soon elected one of the elders. He was a member of the First Church for twenty years, but is now a member of the church at Independence, Mo., having removed from Kansas City to a small fruit farm near Independence. He is now serving as one of the elders of that congregation."

G. W. MUCKLEY.

THE NEW TREASURER

It will be remembered by many of us that T. R. Bryan, treasurer for twenty-one years of the Board of Church Extension, offered his resignation to the National Convention at Pittsburg, Pa., last October. He could not be prevailed upon to continue his work, because of advancing years. Brother Bryan's face has been familiar to our convention workers for years and the board greatly regretted his loss. Our mission churches all over the United States have received hundreds of letters of encouragement and help from Brother Bryan.

Early in the year a committee was appointed by the board to select a treasurer in the place of Brother Bryan and after most diligent searching the committee decided to invite M. H. Gray of the Columbian Steel Tank Company to become treasurer of the board. After prayerful consideration and after a lengthened conversation with our former treasurer, Mr. Gray finally decided to accept the invitation of the board and he began his services accordingly the first of July.

The board believes it has secured in Mr. Gray a most suitable man for this important office. Our treasurer has to do with the closing of loans, and his correspondence with the mission churches in the closing of loans requires exceeding tact. When the Board of Church Extension was making but few loans in the beginning of the work the board did not need to employ a treasurer for all his time. However, the church extension fund now amounts to over $814,000, and we have outsanding loans numbering over six hundred. Besides looking after all these loans in the way of securing prompt payment of interest and returns on the principal, our treasurer must be bookkeeper and must examine every title, deed, articles of incorporation and insurance policy. With the board as trustees, Mr. Gray has entire charge of the administration of the fund in the way of loaning it out and collecting it back. In cases where the churches will not pay the money through the solicitations of the treasurer, the corresponding secretary must go on the ground in order to collect the loan, which is done by impressing the mission church with the need of returning the money that it may go out and house other churches Since the beginning, over $993,000 has been returned on loans and 768 churches have paid their loans in full to the board.

M. H. Gray, New Treasurer Board of Church Extension.

Brother Gray was born in Independence, Mo., January 10, 1869. His father was deacon for many years in the church of which Brother Alexander Proctor was pastor. When Brother Gray was ten years old, he came to Kansas City with his widowed mother. At the age of nineteen he united with the First Christian Church of Kansas City, of which his mother was a charter member. He has been a deacon in this church for the past ten years and has been its treasurer for five years.

After leaving school, he went to Texas for two years and there obtained his first business experience under an older brother, J. W. T. Gray, in a country bank, learning the duties of janitor, bookkeeper, collector and teller. Returning to Kansas City he entered the employ of the Old Armour Brothers Banking Company as bookkeeper and remained with said company two years. He has resided in Kansas City continuously since that time and has been associated with two local manufacturing companies, having been treasurer for fifteen years of the Kansas City Ice and Cold Storage Company and for the past three years with the Columbian Steel Tank Company.

We bespeak for Brother Gray a useful career with the Board of Church Extension and we know that he will have the confidence of the entire brotherhood in the important position of treasurer of the Board of Church Extension.

DRAKE UNIVERSITY

Drake University is twenty-nine years old, has eleven buildings devoted exclusively to school purposes, employs more than 150 instructors, and has an annual attendance of more than 1,800 students. The University is located in the best suburb of "Beautiful Des Moines," with easy access to every point of educational and religious interest in the city. Library facilities are unexcelled in the West, living expenses are moderate and opportunities for remunerative employment are unusually good. School in session throughout the year.

THE COLLEGE OF LIBERAL ARTS has the standard entrance requirements and grants the degrees of A. B., Ph. B., or S. B., for four years of acceptable work. By every standard used in the United States the work of this college is ranked in Class "A."

THE COLLEGE OF THE BIBLE. This college offers a graduate course leading to the degree of Bachelor of Divinity. Special Courses under superior instruction for students of all grades of advancement.

THE COLLEGE OF LAW offers a course of three years based upon graduation from a fully accredited High School or equivalent preparation. The degree of LL. B. is granted graduates of this College. For three years every candidate for graduation has passed the State bar examination before graduation.

THE COLLEGE OF MEDICINE of Drake University is one of the limited number of first class colleges in the United States. The entrance requirements demand the equivalent of two years of college training. The course is four years in length and leads to the degree of M. D.

THE COLLEGE OF DENTISTRY bases its course upon graduation from a fully accredited High School or equivalent preparation. The degree of D. D. S. is granted upon the completion of the course which requires four years.

THE COLLEGE OF EDUCATION prepares graduates of fully accredited High Schools for positions as superintendents, teachers in High Schools, grammar and intermediate grades, primary and kindergarten schools, and as teachers and supervisors of domestic science, music and drawing in the public schools. Courses of two years lead to certificates. A course of four years leads to the degree of Ed. B.

THE COLLEGE OF FINE ARTS has three distinct departments: The Conservatory of Music, the School of Painting and Drawing and the School of Expression. Students are enrolled upon giving evidence of ability to do the work of the department to which entrance is sought.

FACULTIES. The faculties of the various Colleges are specialists chosen on account of their fitness for their work. No more earnest, capable, conscientious men can be found anywhere.

EQUIPMENT. The equipment of Drake University has kept pace with its marvelous growth during the past few years. It is modern and ample.

CLINICS. The Colleges of Law, Medicine, and Dentistry find abundant clinic and practical work in the University and the city. No other school in Iowa is so fortunately situated in this particular.

EXPENSES. Expenses are reasonable when the high character of the work is considered. Opportunities for earning money while attending school are not excelled in the middle West.

THE BETHANY GRADED SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

INTERNATIONAL COURSE

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR

Purpose—The purpose of the Graded Lessons is: To meet the spiritual needs of the pupil in each stage of his development. The spiritual needs broadly stated are these:
1. To know God as he has revealed himself to us in nature, in the heart of man, and in Christ..... 2. To exercise toward God, the Father, and his Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, trust, obedience, and worship..... 3. To know and to do our duty to others..... 4. To know and do our duty to ourselves.

COURSES	Age of Pupils	AIM	PUBLICATIONS
BEGINNERS		To lead the little child to the Father by helping him: 1. To know God, the heavenly Father, who loves him, provides for, and protects him. 2. To know Jesus the Son of God, who became a little Child, who went about doing good, and who is the Friend and Saviour of little children. 3. To know about the heavenly home. 4. To distinguish between right and wrong. 5. To know his love for God by working with him and for others.	Lessons prepared by FRANCES W. DANIELSON
First Year .	4		Teachers' Text Book—Part I, II, III, IV Large Pictures (9x12 inches) Beginners' Stories—(Illustrated folder for Pupils)—Part I, II, III, IV	Ready
Second Year	5		Teachers' Text Book—Part I, II, III, IV Large Pictures (9x12 inches) Beginners' Stories—(Illustrated folder for pupils) Part I, II, III, IV	Ready (October, 1910)
PRIMARY		To lead the child to know the heavenly Father, and to inspire within him a desire to live as God's child: 1. To show forth God's power, love, and care, and to awaken within the child responsive love, trust, and obedience. 2. To build upon the teachings of the first year (1) by showing ways in which children may express their love, trust, and obedience; (2) by showing Jesus the Saviour, in his love and work for men; and (3) by showing how helpers of Jesus and others learn to do God's will. 3. To build upon the work of the first and second year by telling (1) about the people who chose to do God's will; (2) how Jesus, by his life and words, death and resurrection, revealed the Father's love and will for us; (3 such stories as will make a strong appeal to the child and arouse within him a desire to choose and to do that which God requires of him.	Lessons prepared by MARION THOMAS
First Year .	6		Teachers' Text Book, Part I, II, III, IV (With picture supplement) Primary Stories—(Illustrated folder for pupils)—Part I, II, III, IV	Ready

JUNIOR		1. To awaken an interest in the Bible and a love for it; to deepen the impulse to know and to do right. 2. To present the ideal of moral heroism; to reveal the power and majesty of Jesus Christ, and to show his followers going forth in his strength to do his work. 3. To deepen the sense of responsibility for right choices; to show the consequences of right and wrong choices; to strengthen love of the right and hatred of the wrong. 4. To present Jesus as our Example and Saviour; to lead the pupil to appreciate his opportunities for service and to give him a vision of what it means to be a Christian.	Lessons prepared by JOSEPHINE L. BALDWIN.
First Year .	9 and 10		Teachers' Text Book—Part I, II, III . . Pupils' Book for Work and Study—Part I, II, III . . . . . (With picture supplement)	Ready

INTERMEDIATE		To lead to the practical recognition of the duty and responsibility of personal Christian living, and to organize the conflicting impulses of life so as to develop habits of Christian service. The central aim of these biographical studies for the first and second years is religious and moral: but the religious and moral emphasis in these studies will not lead to any neglect of the historical viewpoint, as these characters are generally makers of history, and cannot be satisfactorily presented without the historical setting as a background.	Lessons for first year prepared by MILTON S. LITTLEFIELD
First Year .	13 to 15		Teachers' Text Book—Part I, II, III, IV Pupils' Text Book—Part I, II, III, IV . (With maps)	Ready (October, 1910)

The Curriculum Outlined Above Furnishes a Comprehensive Course of Religious Instruction

Comprising as it does not only the biographies, history, literature, and teachings of the Bible, but also lessons on the history and heroes of the Christian Church, of missionary enterprises, philanthropic movements, and moral reforms.

In order that the truths taught may be assimilated and the spirit and qualities of Christian character developed, various forms of self-expression are suggested, beginning with simple hand-work done by the little child, and culminating in important lines of Christian service possible to young men and women.

The series of lessons for each year begins in October, and the work that is essential to the completion of the aim and the integrity of the course as a whole, is found in the nine months corresponding to the public school year—October to June. The lessons for the remaining three months of each year are valuable in themselves, and either supplement the work of the preceding months, or prepare for that of the following year.

The courses for each grade or year are permanent and will be available for use in the same grade with successive classes each year.

The Lessons for the Summer Quarter beginning July 3, will prepare the school for the greatly enriched course beginning October 1. Send today for order blanks and samples.

Steps Toward Union

Address Delivered in London at the Anglo-American Conference on Christian Union

By Charles Clayton Morrison.

I find myself peculiarly happy in participating in this Conference on Christian union. Conceived and promoted by the Disciples of Christ. I regard it as a sign of promise and prophecy. With all Christian people the Disciples share in the duty of propagating the gospel by the establishment and upbuilding of churches where churches are needed. But the distinctive and essential business of the Disciples is not found in the increase of their churches, but in serious attempts, such as this Conference, to unite the churches already existing. It is sad to say that in many quarters of our brotherhood in America the denominational spirit has fixed itself upon us with an unshakable grip. This Conference is a hopeful sign of a renascence of our original impulse, that of calling all Christ's people into the oneness which he prayed they might ever enjoy.

As I understand the conception of the program makers it was intended that Dr. Watkinson's address preceding mine should deal with those influences of a non-denominational character which work, whether purposely or not, toward union. To me it has been given to speak of the actual steps toward union to be taken directly and consciously by particular groups of Christians, whether as denominations or as local congregations.

A Disagreeable Subject.

To most speakers on Christian union mine is a disagreeable subject. I have heard many speeches in the past three weeks on behalf of union. The Edinburgh Conference on missions could justly be characterized as a Conference on Christian union in the light of the missionary obligation. But in all the utterances of that Conference or of this I have heard but few speakers who grappled the problem at close quarters. I do not say this to criticise. It is well that the great presuppositions of union shall be well stated before we talk about the actual mode of coming together. It is well that both the obligation and inevitableness of union should be made clear to our minds before we discuss the practical steps to be taken. Nevertheless, the problem must be brought down to earth some time, and in my heart I believe the indirect and unconscious influences of which Dr. Watkinson has so beautifully spoken have led us to the place where we are able to sit down together and, facing our differences, try if there be not some way in which, despite our differences, we can be one flock with one Shepherd.

It is perhaps well here to state that when I use the phrase Christian union I mean no mere mystical oneness, but an overt and organized unity. The sentiments spoken yesterday by Rev. Mr. Ruth on the notion of an inorganic unity have my complete approval. Happily we have passed out of the stage when Christian leaders apologize for the existence of the denominational order. The pretty similes of the tree and its branches, the army and its regiments, and such like, have, let us say it gratefully, fallen into disuse. Ten years ago at the World Missionary Conference held in New York City, there was much apology for denominationalism, and the most daring hope expressed was for a method of comity and co-operation among the various sects. At Edinburgh last week there was a frank and penitent deploring of our sectarian separations, and a unanimous demand for out and out union on the mission field with at least a high degree of federation here at home. In my judgment, the mystical oneness of Christ's people, instead of satisfying the ideal of unity is the strongest conceivable demand for organic union.

The Irresistible Trend Toward Union.

There is no doubt that the most significant fact in the present day church is the irresistible trend toward union. Taken with its presuppositions and implications the Christian union movement gathers into itself all the great motifs of modern Christianity—the new scholarship, the new ethical ideals, the new social impulse, the new missionary vision. It is the pivotal and strategic enterprise of the kingdom of God, when viewed in the light both of the values it will express and of the ends its existence will make it possible for the church to attain. When, therefore, as a Disciple of Christ, I do my best to promote the Christian union movement, I consider that I am working not at some side task, one of the many good things it is possible for a follower of Christ to work at, but at the central and essential and most immediate problem of Christianity.

There are three phases in the Christian union movement now under such irresistible headway. There is, first, the awakening of a Christian union conscience; secondly, the overcoming of denominational inertia; and thirdly, the transcending of conscientious differences. Let us consider as the first step toward union,

The awakening of a Christian union conscience. What repentance is in the conversion of the individual sinner, that the awakening of a Christian union conscience is in the life of the divided church. A conscience on the subject of union is primary to any sort of action toward union. Christ's followers must be made to see that denominationalism is a sin, and that it can no more be excused than can any other sin. No less in our day than in Paul's, our divisions are the fruit of a carnal mind. The man in the street whom one of yesterday's speakers quoted as saying that the thing that separated two congregations was sheer "cussedness" might be safely left with the diagnosis of Christendom's malady.

Factors Creating Christian Union Conscience.

At the present time we are in this first phase of the Christian union movement. Many factors are co-operating to create a body of sentiment which is bound finally to precipitate itself into a conscientous conviction on Christian union. The new social ideal that is gripping the mind of the church—haunting the mind of the church, I might better say—is one of these factors. Divided into sects, the church is utterly impotent before this complex task. Even the best scheme of federation helps but little. No church, divided by considerations entirely irrelevant to its essential business as a church, cumbered by machinery no more adapted to practical Christian service in one's own community than Saul's armor was to David, and distracted by a multitude of artificial denominational interests, is, or can be, competent to effectually establish the kingdom of God in any community.

The Church's New Social Ideal.

But the ideal of the kingdom of God as a social possibility is, as I have just said, haunting the mind of the church. Christian people can no longer be content with an other-world ideal. So long as they could be content with that they could be content with doing their best to pluck as many individuals as possible from the burning and save them to life everlasting. The fact that the world got no better, caused them little discomfiture. It would hardly occur to those working under such an other-worldly ideal that denominationalism was a sin or even a hindrance. Let each sect go on and save as many as it can—it is a pure matter of personal effort, anyhow—and there will be a great company in heaven at last.

With the supplanting of this ideal by Christ's social ideal a sense of helplessness has overtaken the church. Divided as we are into sects we feel that this newly discerned task is too great for us. Yet it is our task. As followers of Jesus we can do no less than accept as ours the ideal and vision that possessed him. None but a united Church of Christ can do this work. In the face of such a task our denominationalism is a positive sin. It is after this fashion that the mind of the church is working today, and the practical exigencies of Christian work are thus bringing the subject of Christian unity into the realm of conscience.

Missions as a Union Factor.

So much has been said at Edinburgh and in this Conference about the Missionary enterprise as a factor making for Christian unity that I need hardly go farther than to indicate the relation of the missionary problem to the Christian union conscience. The missionaries bring back to the churches of Christendom the unanimous testimony that our sectarian divisions are a stumbling block to missionary progress. Native Christians in non-Christian lands plead with the missionary societies not to send our creeds and sects into their lands. These creedal distinctions of ours, they say, are meaningless to them. The divisions based upon them are therefore meaningless and confusing. They assure us that only a united church in China and Japan and India can triumph. Thus in the conscience of the mother church of America and Britain the daughter churches of the mission field are awakening a new conviction, the conviction that her divisions are wrong, a sin against the Lord whose Commission her missionary enterprise is designed to fulfill.

Discovery of Seventeenth Chapter of John.

Yet a third factor in awakening the Christian union conscience is the church's discovery of the seventeenth chapter of John. Until recent years this rich chapter had been trodden over as men walk over a hidden vein of gold unsuspecting the rich treasure that lies underneath their feet. So Christ's followers have read their Master's intercessory prayer as merely his prayer. Now they are beginning to read it as their duty. His prayer is his supreme commandment. Not in edicts and formal commissions is the will of such a Lord revealed, but in his prayers. What Christ prayed for, that represents his supreme will. What Christ willed, that is the disciple's topmost duty.

Thus a church that is ever going back to Christ, a church that speaks much of his authority, is learning to regard his prayer for the unity of his disciples as a commandment of the most mandatory character. And wherever you touch Christ's authority you touch the Christian conscience, for these are one. Now the effect of this new insight into the seventeenth chapter of John is to humble the church in the shame of her divisions. Throughout the great Edinburgh Conference this text ran as a blood-red thread, "that they all may be one as Thou, Father, art in me and I in Thee." Unity, it was felt, is not merely an expedient, but a command of Christ. It is in this aspect of it that it goes deepest into the conscience of the church.

Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor Christian Century.

Union Conscience Growing More Personal.

This Christian union conscience, awakened by the new social ideal, the new missionary experience and the newly-heard voice of the church's Lord praying, is the one sure guarantee of the destruction of our sectarian divisions. Up to the present time it is a vague and largely impersonal conscience, residing in the corporate life of the church. It finds its freest expression in specially devised meetings such as this Conference or that at Edinburgh, or in a ministerial association or a union evangelistic meeting—in some meeting organized quite outside the regular church activities.

But steadily this Christian union conscience will take its seat in the personal life of Christian people. The supreme command of Christ to his church will be seen to be the keeping of the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. In that hour our present divisions will be seen to be sinful, and sectarian barriers will be burned away under the white light of Christ's supreme commandment. Not one issue that divides the church today, even though it be an issue involving an alleged command of Christ, is of equal importance with the supreme command to maintain the unity of those who believe on him. The perception of this by the honest conscience of the church will bring about Christian union.

Conscience Necessary in Order to Maintain Unity.

And it will not only bring it about but it will maintain it, once it is established. Instead of organizing a new sect for the propagation of a new doctrine or the practice of a newly discovered ordinance this conscience will make its possessor ask whether his doctrine or ordinance or ritual is so important to the mind of Christ as is the unity of the church. He will pause long in prayer before he causes schism in the body of Christ. Likewise the church as a whole will provide a wide place for the teacher of new truth and the bringer in of new methods. She will not demand uniformity in belief or practice. Actuated by her conscience on Christian union she will be slow to declare any Christian man a heretic. In such a conscience she will be so sure of her accepted truth that she will rather risk it to the attack of an honest thinker inside the church than to the same thinker with the brand of her excommunication upon him. Once the ideal of Christian union roots itself deep in the conscience of Christ's disciples we have a power, and the only power, which will destroy the sectarian order and maintain a united church.

Overcoming Denominational Inertia.

The second phase of the Christian union movement is the overcoming of denominational inertia. With the awakening of conscience the Christian union movement goes on to realize itself in the direction of least resistance, that is, by the union of organizations most alike in doctrine and practice. In taking this second step toward unity the obstacle to be overcome is what Dr. Gates yesterday called "the sheer sodden inertia" of denominations. Here are two denominations whose differences belong to history not to today. In creed and practice there is not one vital matter between them. On the face of it one would say there will be little trouble to unite them. But this is to leave out of account the most perverse hindrance which the Christian union movement encounters. Mere momentum, habit, custom, stands in the way of a free expression of the newly awakened conscience. There is an investment of money in denominational machinery. There are the denominational leaders whose relative positions might not easily carry over into a large united body. There is the denominational press which gets its lift from the clannish spirit of the denomination and whose security is jeopardized with the widening mind of its constituency. Underneath all, there is the denominational pride and conceit which hold tenaciously to the sectarian name. This is what I mean by denominational inertia. It is unreasoning, unChristian. But it is fact, a brute fact, and can be overcome only by a Christian union conscience and the grace of God.

Progress Manifestly Being Made.

Yet it is being overcome. The wise world thinks so little of our sectarian possessions that we are beginning to hold them lightly ourselves. The denominational market is declining and the bearish movement is daily becoming more pronounced. There is a strong movement for merging those sects that go by the same family name as Methodist, Presbyterian, etc. Cases of actual union of denominations are growing in number, beginning with the marvelous unifying of the Free churches of Scotland some years since. [Here the speak recited in detail as instances of union; the merging of the Presbyterians and Cumberland Presbyterians in the United States, the "steps toward union of the M. E., Congregational and Presbyterian churches of Canada, a considerable number of local mergers of Baptist Disciple churches in Canada, similar unions of Baptist and Disciples in Monroe, Waupun and Ladysmith, Wisconsin, and the Memorial Church, Chicago. As an instance of the power of denominational inertia he pointed out the "step backward" taken by the Congregational, Methodist, Protestant and United Brethren bodies in the United States in their failure to effect a union after three years of encouraging conferences.]

Transcending Conscientious Differences.

The third phase of the Christian union movement is the transcending of conscientious differences. This, of course, is the core of the problem. The hard task is not simply to draw into a union those who are alike (though this is hard enough, as we have already seen) but those who are unlike. Our task is an utterly hopeless one unless there is some way of transcending our conscientious differences. There is no conceivable likelihood of Christendom's being converted to one type of doctrine or polity or ritual. Any movement for unity which waits for its consummation until men's convictions have been brought into agreement is not a movement for unity at all. It is just another sect, doing what all the sects have always done—erecting its understanding of the Bible into a bar of fellowship against those who understand the Bible differently.

The test by which a proposal for Christian union must be judged is whether it will effectually unite Christians who are unlike. A union of Christians who are alike would not necessarily be a Christian union, even if it were possible to accomplish it. In order to demonstrate its character as Christian a union must include, or be capable of including, Christians who are unlike. Let us suppose that all the sects have today settled their controversies and united together in one church on the basis of their universal agreements. Such a union would not be Christian union, it would be simply a big denomination covering the whole of Christendom. There is no principle of permanency in it. Tomorrow there will be disagreements again; if not the same disagreements as before there will be new ones. This universal denomination has no way to meet these disagreements and maintain its unity. As a consequence, new sects will inevitably be formed, and the old process of division and subdivision will be repeated.

No Hope in Prolonged Argument.

Those of us who are studying this problem of unity cannot dwell too seriously upon the considerations we are just now discussing. The differences between Christians are matters of conscience, and as such cannot be surrendered or compromised without disloyalty to Christ. There is, moreover, no likelihood that further argument, prolonged indefinitely, will bring Christendom to see alike. And, finally, even though Christendom might conceivably be brought to see alike today, it is inevitable that there will be equally serious and vital differences tomorrow which will destroy any unity which has no other basis than coincidence of convictions.

The Outlines of the Problem Emerging.

Here, then, we begin to see the outlines of our problem more clearly. Those who set up a platform of union consisting of many or few dogmatic "planks" are building only another sect. Union is not to be found in the direction of dogma. Those who hope to bring the religious world to see as they see, to understand the Bible as they understand it, are in a perfectly legitimate enterprise, but it is not a Christian union enterprise. A Christian union enterprise must dig far below our sectarian disagreements to the bed-rock of our essential unity—the mystical unity which some are content, shall remain mystical—and build on that. This mystical oneness is the creation of the church's Lord. All men who have taken Christ as Savior and King are one. They are one whatever their disagreements in doctrine or polity. The essential and the only essential principle of unity or union is loyalty to Jesus Christ.

This is the lesson which our foreign missionary experience is teaching us. On the mission field the churches are already entering this third phase of the union movement. There they are much farther along toward unity than are we at the home base. The determined demand of the oriental church to be allowed to work out its problem of union without interference from our occidental sects puts it in a place of leadership in this movement. [Here the speaker described in detail the union movement in West China, Southern India, Japan, and Korea. Much of this information has already been given our readers in Mr. Morrison's reports of the Edinburgh Conference.]

The Next Step: The Practice of Christian Union.

What, then, is the next step to be taken? This: the demonstration by an undenominational body of Christians that Christian union may even now be successfully practiced. The great need of this cause that lies so near the heart of our Lord is that somebody shall begin to live it out. No panegyric of unity in a missionary conference or a Christian union conference will avail. You and I must begin to practice Christian union. And how shall we practice it? By what principles shall our procedure be controlled in order that we may be true to the deep fact of unity already existing, albeit only a mystical unity, and at the same time true to our own conscientious convictions which are rooted in loyalty to our Lord? I shall close with a mere outline statement of what to me are the principles which mark the limits within which the ideal of unity may be effectually worked out.

Unswerving Evangelical Loyalty to Christ.

The first of these is unswerving loyalty to the supreme leadership of Jesus Christ. I mean this in a very evangelical sense.

Secondly, such an attempt to practice Christian union will regard union as a supreme command of Christ, thus grounding its motives in the Christian conscience. The members of this community of practicers of Christian union will possess a conscience on unity that will operate as effectually as the Romanist's fear of excommunication. This conscience, sharply personalized, will determine the church to do those things which make for unity and to eschew those things which make for division.

Thirdly, such an attempt at practicing Christian union will create an atmosphere of the broadest toleration of widely divergent views of our Lord's revelation. It will have learned to find its unity not in its agreements as to doctrines or ordinances but in common allegiance to one Lord.

Neither Ministry Nor Membership to be Invalidated.

Fourthly, such a movement will therefore be able to approach the divided church with no presupposition against the Christian status of its present membership, nor against the complete ecclesiastical standing of its present ministry. The two bodies, Episcopal and Baptist, whose devotees urge their respective platforms as a basis of unity for the divided church, fail just here. No program for unity which invalidates the ministerial standing of the great body of evangelical ministers has the remotest hope of being taken seriously. The Anglican plea for the re-ordination of the Christian ministry as a prerequisite to union forever makes union impossible. Equally obstructive is the proposal for the re-baptism of the larger portion of evangelical Christendom. No movement can justly be called a Christian union movement which invalidates the churchly statutes of a larger share of Christ's people. The presupposition of a Christian union movement that may hope to gain the ear of Christendom must be that evangelical Christians are indeed Christians, members of the Church of Christ, and to be fellowshipped in the fullest fraternity.

Courtesy in Propagating the Faith.

A fifth principle, which such a movement for union will embody is the principle of comity or common courtesy in its evangelistic work. It will be evangelistic. It will establish and build churches. In rendering its service to the distraught church it will not forget its duty to the sinful world. But its evangelism will look to the kingdom of God and not to its own aggrandizement as a distinctive movement. It will guard itself constantly against becoming another sect. It will seek out unchurched territory and refuse to further complicate the scandal of divisions in territory already planted with churches.

Ideally the Disciples of Christ are this Christian union movement. By the primal impulse of Thomas Campbell we are committed to these great principles and to this sublime ideal. Coming from the Edinburgh Conference and listening to the addresses of this conference I am constrained to testify that I believe the Disciples are come to the kingdom for such a time as this. Ours is the big word that remains yet to be spoken. That word is that simple loyalty to Jesus Christ is a sufficient basis of unity for Christendom. Let us practice that unity ourselves yet more perfectly. And let us sound forth that plea with incresing sincerity and insistence until all the world shall hear.

"Cussedness," said T. E. Ruth in his address, Christian Union Demanded by the World's Need, "is the reason assigned by the man in the street for the failure of the churches to unite allowing each individual to choose for himself what he will believe about baptism." Mr. Ruth does not commit himself to this diagnosis nor does the Christian Century. Those acquainted with the average city business man who is not in ecclesiastical ranks will hardly doubt that Mr. Ruth has correctly reresented this type of mind. It is a point of view with which we must reckon. The church must needs go about the great tasks of the kingdom with a purpose big enough and a devotion so true that men will be compelled to find some better word to explain her spirit. The diagnosis points to the painful truth that the present divisions of the church can not be explained by intelligent men of affairs who see in that division only waste and wickedness.

The death of Lester Bartlett Jones, musical director at the University of Chicago, will bring sadness to many who knew him well in the important capacity in which he has served the institution for the pest ten years. He had just resigned his work to accept the headship of the Department of Music at Coe College, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, when he was taken ill, and compelled to go to St. Luke's Hospital in this city for a serious operation. He never came out of the hospital, but passed away on July 7.

ALVA W. TAYLOR

AFOOT IN THE EMERALD ISLE.

Enroute to the World's Missionary Conference the editor of this page spent his "vacation" afoot in Ireland, studying the living conditions of the Irish peasantry. The word peasantry does not sound good to American ears and our boast is that this free land has none. Webster defines a "peasant" simply as a countryman or a rustic, but we limit the term in our thinking more to those lands where the country people are tenants on great estates and are socially classed as in an inferior position to the landlords and gentlemen of property. There is something in the term that signifies to our minds a lack of that independence that we associate with the American farmer who knows no master and by a vast majority holds the titles to the land he tills.

A more charming land than Ireland one could not choose for a vacation journey. Its glens are landscape cameos of unsurpassed beauty and the rich emerald of its eternal green is nowhere equaled. Its vales and hills are things for song and story and no people surpass the genial Irish in hospitality. It is a land in which every prospect pleases and all is rich and promising, but the opportunities offered the people. As our barber in Londonderry said with true Irish eloquence, "We are as poor as Donegal's rocks on the rich Irish turf." The land is rich and bountiful, but when a people is cut off from the full tide of wealth that wells up from their soil there is poverty in direct proportion to the natural sustenance withdrawn. When one crosses the narrow channel that separates Ireland from Anglesey and sees the contrast between the conditions of the average Irish tenant and the farmers in the ancient Welsh island he looks on this picture and then on that and wonders why the difference. The difference is that between two children raised side by side, each with its portion of milk, but one of whom was given all the cream from both bottles. Anglesey is England and typifies English prosperity in comparison with Irish poverty, and for centuries English prosperity has drawn the cream from Irish industry through the landlord system, and Ireland has been economically underfed.

But the story of Ireland's political and economic wrongs has been often told. It is a story, not of English, but of aristocratic oppression, and it has been repeated in every land where like conditions have existed and the land of one people has been laid under imperialistic tribute by the aristocracy of another. Cromwell was a hero and his service to the cause of constitutional government is rightfully lauded as marking an epoch in the annals of liberty, but Cromwell fought by the rules of his time and the terrible toll of war that followed his successful campaigns in Ireland has not yet been paid. Truly war lays its burdens upon the children's children to the tenth generation. This account of a tramp through Ireland is not for the purpose of recounting Ireland's wrongs, or of mollifying judgment on England's government of her, but to tell how the people live in their humble cottages and what are their hopes for a better day, a day that has already dawned.

IRISH SLUMS.

In Cork everybody goes to hear the Bells of Shandon ring. It is a sentimental journey, for they are not in any wise remarkable bells, but their beauty has been celebrated in popular Irish song and the poetry and melody send multitudes of tourists to the hill top from which their mellifluous notes float out over the slums of Cork at any time of day or evening that the sentimental tourist shows his six-pence to the accommodating sexton. We went to see the slums of Cork and came quite unaware upon the historic old church from which these bells have been pouring out their melody for two hundred years. On all that hill Shandon's bells alone are beautiful, excepting only the Catholic church and its green gardens not far away. Out of Cork's hundred thousand people none can tell how many live in what we would call her slums. She is a fair city and seems well ruled and her masses live in no wise different from those of other Irish cities. Neither are her slums worse than the worst of London and the people in them are not vicious. They are not so old and crime infested and generations have not been born there as in Whitechapel. They are the logical result of conditions in which a country folk has been driven from the poverty of the farm cabin to the wage life of growing industries that seem to offer relief from famine and rent and where, as a result, wages are low, the labor supply is overcrowded, work is intermittent, and where is omnipresent Ireland's twin evil—the gin house on every corner.

In Dublin one of the worst slums is about St. Patrick's cathedral. There the historic old church in whose baptismal font Cromwell is said to have watered his horses, was repaired and restored through the munificence of Guiness the Brewer at the cost of a half-million dollars. All about the cathedral Dublin's great slum is decorated with signs of Guiness's brew and the multitudes carry a surer symbol of his business on their faces. Doubtless many a mug is passed in honor of the man whose beneficence restored one of the nation's landmarks and glorified the Lord by beautifying his church.

HOUSING CONDITIONS.

Here in the slums of Cork the people live, not in great tenements as they do in Chicago, but in miserable houses built of undressed stone on narrow streets in angling rows with no yards either before or behind. They are usually two stories high with one room below and one or two above. Below the earthen floor is littered and the open fireplace smoulders. A single window in front and another in the rear admit the light, while a door such as our farmers use on their barns, sawed into an upper and a lower portion, stands open unless perchance the lower section is closed to keep some unkempt little one from wandering away. There is almost no furniture and what there is—a rough deal table, an iron pot and a cheap chair—could be purchased for a few shillings. Upstairs the people sleep on cots of straw and often only upon a heap of it flung in a corner with a covering of discarded rag that once served other purposes and has retired from active service in the wash tub. Many of these hovels are on alleys not more than eight and ten feet wide, paved with cobble stones and with no walk for foot travel at all, while the best of the streets are narrow, many of them steep and winding, and all of them with but narrow cement or stone sidewalks laid hard up against the doors of the dwelling places. The pedestrian needs to take a care for children are numerous and as he walks the narrow pavement he is liable to find his legs confused with a mass of tangled rags and curls that is bent on a quick exit from its home in childish hurry for the game or in escape from the wrath of the mater's broad Irish.

DUMB COURTESY.

The streets are filled with unkempt children, the doorways are occupied in the evenings by mothers quite as unkempt and in no wise more nearly germ-proof that their offspring. If it is warm and still the air is like sixty odd smells of old cologne. The men folk are either taking a glass in the nearbye "Pub.' or standing silently on a corner. There is no merriment but that of the children. Even Irish loquacity seemed to us to have forsaken these sordid alleyways and hovels, but Irish geniality is native; it never forsakes an Irish dwelling place and the omnipresent interest in America dwells alike in slum and cottage. Our dress, gait, "Yankee brogue," apparent unfamiliarity with things, and the inevitable tourist's camera, all told them we were there to see them and to discover what was all too familiar to them, but there was no discourtesy and no resentment of our errand but only a sad sort of kindness in their attitude. The children begged some and the young men answered questions with a slightly studied indifference meant for independence but no information desired was denied and many a "God bless ye, sir," followed us with an "and America has been Ireland's best friends, sir."

THEIR WAGES.

The wage of a common laborer among these people is three shillings or a little less than seventy-five cents per day, and work is intermittent at that with most of them. They rent these miserable hovels at from fifty to eighty cents per week. Food stuff will not average much cheaper than in this country. We found butter selling at twenty-five cents per pound, meat more expensive than at home but fish cheaper and vegetables and fruit averaging not more than ten per cent less than in a city of like size in the states. Beer goes at a penny a glass but whisky costs and it is the favorite drink. Tea is used by everybody and the tax keeps the price up. Bread they buy for about one-half what Chicago does and it is better. Stale bread, tea, potatoes and fish make up the menu cards for these working folk on the hill about Shandon's tower. Of clothes they have but few and they are cheap, but cheapness helps little when you are buying but little. These items are given to show that the cost of living as compared with wages is out of all proportion to that of the wage earner in the United States. The result is a lower standard of living and all it entails in ignorance, hopelessness and social misery. The artisan receives from five to six shillings per day and having strong unions is better favored. Much of the work is away from home and the cost of living is materially enhanced thus. Compare this with the five to seven dollars paid the same class of skilled workmen here. This wage condition is not greatly different from that obtaining in all Great Britain and in Germany but work is more plentiful than it is in Ireland because of the better development of industry, though times have been hard in all Britain since the Boer war. That tragedy was not paid for by the billion it cost directly; it has cost billions to the working millions of the home land—and the end is not yet. When the business world begins to reckon with war in terms of economic depletion its hard sense will crush the serpent's head.

On one side of this slum is a pasture as rich and velvety green as a lawn that is watered daily and cared for with all a gardener's skill. Over its broad acres were scattered sheep with wool as thick and deep as the pasture they fed upon. One thought of how much more worth were these sheep than these men if the conditions under which each live is taken as a measure of their relative appraisal. At the foot of the winding steep roadway we found evidence that some one was caring for here were a group of the neat "workingmen's cottages" of which the municipality has erected to date one thousand, and counts its work but well begun. They are built of brick and concrete and on streets that are smoothly paved. There is no garden but the street is clean and broader than the ordinary cobblestone alleyways and the laws on sanitation are kept. They have one large room below which serves as the living room and is provided with good windows and doors and a neat fireplace, while upstairs are two bed-rooms. These cottages cost the city from five to six hundred dollars apiece to build in this wholesale way and are rented to artisans only at three shillings and six pence or about eighty-five cents per week with water furnished free and all taxes paid. They are very small indeed and such as an American workman would scorn to live in, but they represent so great an improvement over the hovels of the masses that they lift their occupants into another social strata.

Next week we shall tell of Slums in the Country and how the tenants live.

The Ministry of Intercession

Intercession benefits the intercessor. It teaches him trust in God and enables him calmly to leave with God the fate of those whose good he seeks. The beginning of all true prayer is the desire to identify the human will with the will of God. That is not prayer which seeks to change the eternal purposes of God. We could not be satisfied to live in a world governed by a will less firm than ours. Abiding satisfaction comes only to those who find their lives a part of an eternal order. Faith and love have their roots in the life of God, and they manifest themselves in him who learns the ways of God and follows them.

Intercession benefits the community of believers. It unites men in mind and heart. If their prayers for others are genuine, they think seriously on the problems of life and conduct and they try to distinguish between the passing and the permanent, between whims and the deepest desires of the soul. They cannot pray for the success of enterprises which have no spiritual significance. To rush into the presence of God and ask that a man escape the pain due to his sins is to display neither profound thought nor sympathy. If we really care for the soul of a man, we pray that he may have the experiences which he needs to give him knowledge of God. It may be that life has tasted so bitter to him that he needs experiences of joy. Then we ought to pray that he may see some of the brighter aspects of the common lot. If, on the other hand, he is one whose determination to enjoy himself has made him indifferent to the misery he causes others, we cannot hope to help him by asking that God deliver him from the consequences of his selfishness. He must go through trouble to peace.

The one for whom intercession is made is encouraged if he knows that men of faith are seeking his good. Of course, if he has self-respect, he is not pleased with the vociferations of those who think they shall be heard for their much speaking. He does not like to have his weaknesses proclaimed in public. It is seldom that a man is won to righteousness by public announcement of his sins. The Lord directed that the faults of a brother should receive private treatment first. The cowardice of men prevents them from abeying the Lord in matter of rebuking wrongdoers. It requires less courage to speak about the man in the presence of others than it requires to speak to him face to face. Our prayers too often show that we do not respect the sacred right which God grants to every man of thinking for himself. Jesus stands at the door and knocks for admission. He will not thrust himself into our lives. We disregard his example and try to override the wills of others.

The intercessor gives himself for those whom he brings before God in prayer. He is not thinking of the advantages he will receive if they succeed, but of the enrichment of their lives in knowledge and love and service. The sincerity of the petitioner is demonstrated by what he does. Men scoff at the unctious manner of one who has much to say to God and little to do for men. The influence of such a life is detrimental to organized religion. Abraham was generous in his dealings with Lot. We therefore believe in the genuineness of his prayer. "Oh that there were one among you that would shut the doors, that ye might not kindle fire on mine altar in vain!" It is better, then, according to Malachi, that there be no worship than that men should be lacking in reverence for the character of God.

When men come before God and pray that blessings may come to the needy, that the wicked man may forsake his way, that the sorrowful may find comfort, and when prayer is the expression of sacrificial living, is not the way open for the entrance of the divine grace that satisfies every desire of the honest soul? If we do not pray, God will not stay away from us. He will come and seek to enlighten us. But the reception of the best he has to offer depends upon our willingness of heart. No man lives unto himself, hence each of us is in a measure responsible for the attitude his neighbor assumes toward the higher things of the spirit. It is our privilege to assist in preparing the way of the Lord in this generation. We believe that he has inexhaustible treasures for his people. He will bestow them upon those who are capable of receiving them. Intercession is a means of increasing the ability of men to receive the gifts of God.

MY GUIDE.

Robert J. Burdette.

There is no path in this desert waste
For the winds have swept the shifting sands;
The trail is blind where the storms have raced,
And a stranger, I, in these fearsome lands.
But I journey on with a lightsome tread;
I do not falter nor turn aside;
For I see his figure, just ahead—
He knows the way I take—my Guide.

There is no path in this trackless sea;
No map is lined on the restless waves;
The ocean snares are strange to me
Where the unseen wind in its fury raves;
But it matters naught; my sails are set,
And my swift prow tosses the seas aside;
For the changeless stars are steadfast yet,
And I sail by his star-blazed trail—my Guide.

There is no way in this starless night;
There is naught but cloud in the inky skies;
The black night smothers me, left and right,
I stare with a blind man's straining eyes;
But my steps are firm, for I cannot stray;
The path to my feet seems light and wide;
For I hear his voice—"I am the way!"
And I sing as I follow him on—my Guide.

In the morning fix thy purpose; and at night examine thyself, what thou hast done, how thou hast behaved thyself in word, deed, and thought.—Thomas à Kempis.

We should preach God's glory day by day, not by words only, often not by words at all, but by our conduct. If you wish your neighbors to see what God is like, let them see what he can make you like. Nothing is so infectious as example.—Charles Kingsley.

Live for something. Do good, and leave behind you a monument of virtue that the storm of time can never destroy. Write your name in kindness, love, and mercy on the hearts of thousands you come in contact with year by year. Good deeds will shine as stars in heaven.—Chalmers.

Those who would be heroes if they could are heroes in the sight of God.—John Hunter.
